Preachers having charge are sometimes complained of for not administering the rule on this subject; the complainant saying, at the same time, that "the neglect of this duty, on the part of the ministry is the sole cause of the delinquency among the members in reference to class meetings." Now, I would not wish to be considered an apologist for our ministers who thus neglect their duty, or that anything I may write in these articles be construed into an extenuation of their conduct; but from this opinion I must in part dissent. That this is one cause of the delinquency of which we complain, I have no doubt, but that it is the sole cause, in my opinion, is not the case.

There is a time in the history of every pastorate when a strict administration of the discipline, with an affectionate and vigilant pastoral oversight, would do much to check the growth, if not prevent the existence of this evil to any great extent; provided, however, that other causes did not then and there exist. But when that time is suffered to pass without attending to it, which is too often the case, the evil assumes a magnitude that in many instances involves the largest portion of the membership, and to approach it in that way becomes a matter of doubtful expediency, and requires a man of no ordinary nerve to undertake it. In such cases, ministers begin to reason as to the better course to pursue; and, choosing between evils, they incline to consider forbearance the least, and seek to remedy the other by a different process. They are here situated not unlike the surgeon who was called on to amputate a diseased limb, lest the body become also diseased, but being too late, and finding other members involved, he concluded to resort to constitutional treatment, though life and limb were both risked by such a course. A desperate resort, it is true, but the only hopeful one, it will be seen, in view of the condition of the patient. How often are preachers in charge led to adopt a similar course, hoping by an extra religious effort to infuse a new spirit into the entire membership, and thus remove the evil, and save the delinquent members to the Church? With what success, we will not now pretend to say. So we see that while a proper application of rule would remedy the evil, it must be resorted to before it becomes too great. And here lies the fault with many: they do not try in time, and thus it is delinquency is tolerated, if not encouraged, and soon develops into open contumacy.

Our system of change of pastors, with all its advantages, affords a fine opportunity for those who are thus disposed to neglect the administration of discipline, and to shift the disagreeable work on to the hands of their successors. And thus the evil becomes formidable and difficult to contend with because of delay, when it might have been removed with care, if taken up at the right time, and by the proper person. The writer of this article has knowledge of a case in point, when the preacher in charge not only delayed action himself, but left a list of his class meeting delinquents (some of whom he had on hand for two years) for his successor, which gave the one that succeeded him no little trouble, in addition to the delay consequent on finding them out and making a proper disposition of them.

But there is another sense in which the ministry is involved, and may justly be held accountable as the cause, to some extent, of this wide-spread delinquency. During my connection with the Methodist Church I have occasionally found a brother in the ministry who, though a friend to class meetings, was nevertheless opposed to them as a test of membership! And, in several instances, these views have become known, and misconstrued into an opposition to the thing itself. Now, we are of opinion that such views, entertained by our ministers and made public, do no little harm, by increasing the evil of which we complain. If our brethren holding such views are conscientious, they never will, they never can administer the rule and exclude members from the Church for non-attendance to class. This fact is well understood by many of our members, and they give themselves no little latitude because of it. And should their consciences occasionally become troublesome, they find the views of the minister a very convenient and effectual palliation. They reason (and not without some plausibility) that they can hold membership in the Church with their exceptions to class meetings—taking care to let their exceptions always govern them—as well as their pastor can hold his place in the ministry with his exceptions to the rule requiring attendance a test of membership, and that a refusal to attend is no greater violation of their Church obligations than the refusal to administer the rule on his part is a violation of the vows he is under as a minister of the same ecclesiastical economy. Who is there so blind they cannot see the bad effects that flow from such a source? There are, however, some, on the other hand, who contend for the provision just as it is laid down in the Discipline, and would war zealously for its continuance in the same form, and who have promised to keep and apply it, and yet they rarely if ever hold a class meeting, or give that part of their work any more than a very superficial oversight. And from this source, too, the evil receives nourishment and strength. Thus we see that our ministry come in for no small share of the blame, and God and his Church will hold them accountable. It will be a happy day for religion and Methodism when our ministry and members will awake to the importance of this our "peculiar institution." And although this evil has assumed such an importance that it has become difficult to deal with, yet by patient care and constant effort to soften and mould anew the minds of our people on this subject, with a firm but gentle application of the rule as a last resort in every incorrigible case, the evil will be lessened, and our members become better Christians and truer Methodists.

THE MIND OF JESUS.

The mind of Jesus! What a study is this! To attain a dim reflection is the ambition of angels—higher they cannot soar: "to be conformed to the image of His Son!" It is the end of God in the predestination of his Church from all eternity. "We shall be like him!"—it is the Bible picture of Heaven.

In a former little volume we pondered some of the gracious words which proceeded out of the mouth of Jesus. In the present, we have a few faint lineaments of that holy character which constituted the living exposition and embodiment of his precepts.

But how lofty such a standard! How all creature perfection shrinks abashed and confounded before a divine portraiture like this! He is the true "angel standing in the sun," who alone projects no shadow; so bathed in the glories of the Deity that likeness to him becomes like the light in which he is shrouded, "no man can approach unto it." May we not, however, seek at least to approximate, though we cannot adequately resemble? It is impossible on earth to associate with a fellow-being without getting, in some degree, assimilated to him. So, the more we study the mind of Christ, the more we are in his company, holding converse with him as our best and dearest friend, catching up his holy looks and deeds, the more shall we be "transformed into the same image."

"Consider," says the great apostle, (literally gaze on,) "Christ Jesus—Heb., iii., 1. Study feature by feature, lineament by lineament, of that peerless exemplar. Gaze on the Sun of Righteousness, till, like gazing on the natural sun, you carry away with you, on your spiritual vision, dazzling images of his brightness and glory. Though he be the archetype of all goodness, remember he is no shadowy model; though the Infinite Jehovah, he was "the Man Christ Jesus."

We must never, indeed, forget that it is not the mind, but the work of Immanuel which lies at the foundation of a sinner's hope. He must be known as a Saviour before he is studied as an example. His doing and dying is the centre jewel, of which all the virtues of his holy life are merely the setting. But neither must we overlook the Scripture obligation to walk in his footsteps and imbibe his Spirit, for "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his!"

Oh that each individual Christian were more Saviour-like! that, in the manifestation of a holy character and heavenly demeanor it might be said, in some feeble measure, of the faint and imperfect reflection: "such was Jesus!"

How far short we are of such a criterion mournful experience can testify. But it is at least comforting to know that there is a day coming when, in the full vision and fruition of the glorious original, the exhortation of our motto verse will be needed no more; when we shall be able to say, in the words of an inspired apostle, "We have the mind of Christ!"

Odd Fellows' Anniversary.

We understand that the Odd Fellows of New-Orleans intend to celebrate the anniversary of the introduction of the Order into the United States—26th inst.—in a most imposing and brilliant manner. The various Lodges and Encampments will turn out in full regalia, and march in procession through the various streets. As there are between two and three thousand members in the city, and as all will make it a point to turn out, the spectacle will be the finest ever seen in New Orleans since the dedication of their magnificent Hall, opposite Lafayette Square, some years since.

The Louisville Courier, speaking of the celebration of St. Patrick's Day in that city, says nine Irishmen were committed to jail, and on Sunday morning the dead bodies of three others were found. One had frozen to death; another had fallen down stairs and broken his neck, and another was murdered by some one unknown.

HIGH CHURCHISM.

Episcopalian Testimony.

Although your friend, Rev. R. Abbey, has informed us that "the question is settled," and "the controversy ended," by the advocates of Apostolic Succession publicly admitting that they "have no recorded list of ordinations running back to the Apostles," yet it may be interesting to some of your readers to see what was said on this subject twenty years ago, by one of the most eminent divines of the Church of England, Dr. Thos. Arnold. I therefore send you the following extracts from his miscellaneous works, that your readers may see how strongly he reprobated the pretensions of High Churchmen.

It will be seen from these extracts that no one who has written on this subject for our Methodist journals has ever spoken with a tithe of the severity with which he condemns those Judaizing teachers.

Again, although some of those of whom Dr. A. spoke with such severity have long since gone over to Rome, and although twenty years have elapsed since he thus wrote, his language is as precisely suited to the High Churchism of American Episcopalians now, as it then was to those at Oxford. American Episcopalians are at this day only repeating, with parrot-like sameness, what their elder brethren at Oxford uttered twenty years ago.

I quote first from an article headed "The Oxford Malignants," which was first published in 1836:

"But on the character of no party does history throw so full and clear a light as on the High Church party of the Church of England—the party of the Oxford conspirators. Unlike the political Tories, who are only analagously like the Tories of the Revolution, by being as much in the rear of the existing generation as the old Tories were in the rear of theirs, these Church Tories have stirred neither actually nor relatively; they are the very nonjurors and High Church clergy of King William's, and Anne's, and George the First's reign, reproduced with scarcely a shade of difference. Now, as then, this party is made up of two elements, of the Hophni and Phinehas school, on the one hand—the more low, worldly clergy, careless and grossly ignorant, ministers not of the Gospel but of the aristocracy, who belong to Christianity only from the accident of its being established by law—and of the formalist, Judaizing fanatics, on the other hand, who have ever been the peculiar disgrace of the Church of England; for these High Church fanatics have imbibed even of fanaticism itself nothing but the folly and virulence. Other fanatics have persecuted, like the Romanists, in order to uphold a magnificent system, which, striking its roots deep and stretching its branches wide, exercises a vast influence over the moral condition of man, and may almost excuse some extravagance of zeal in its behalf. Others, again, have been fanatics for freedom, and for what they deemed the due authority of God's own Word. They were violent against human ceremonies; they despised learning; they cast away the delicacies, and almost the humanities of society, for the sake of asserting two great principles, noble even in their exaggeration—entire freedom towards man, and entire devotion towards God. But the fanaticism of English High Churchmen has been the fanaticism of mere foolery—a dress, a ritual, a name, a ceremony, a technical phraseology; the superstition of a priesthood, without its power; the form of Episcopal government, without its substance; a system imperfect and paralyzed, not independent, not sovereign; afraid to cast off the subjection against which it is perpetually murmuring. Such are the objects of High Church fanaticism. Objects so pitiful, that if gained ever so completely, they would make no man the wiser or the better; they would lead to no good, intellectual, moral or spiritual; to no effect, social or religious, except to the changing of sense into silliness, and holiness of heart and life into formality and hypocrisy.

"Once, however, and once only in the history of Christianity, do we find a heresy (for never was that term more justly applied) so degraded and low principled as this. We must pass over the times of the Romanists. We must go back to the very beginning of the Christian Church, and there in the Jews and Judaizers of the New Testament we find the only exact resemblance to the High Churchman of Oxford. In the zealots of circumcision and the ceremonies of the law; in the slanderers and persecutors of St. Paul; the doctors upon old wives' fables and genealogies; the men of soft words and fair speeches, of "a voluntary humility," all the time that they were calumniating and opposing the Gospel and its great Apostle; in the malignant fanatics who, to the number of more than forty, formed a conspiracy to assassinate Paul, because he denied the necessity of ceremonies to salvation; "the men of Mint, and Anise, and Cummin," who cared not for judgment, mercy and truth, the enemies and revilers of the holiest names which earth reverences, and who are condemned, in the most emphatic language, by that authority which all Christians acknowledge as Divine; in these, and these alone, can the party which has headed the late Oxford conspiracy find their perfect prototype."

If the reader does not fully understand what is meant by the "Hophni and Phinehas school," let him turn to the second chapter of 1 Samuel, and he will there learn.

Again, in his pamphlet on Church Reform, after dwelling at length on the corruptions tolerated in the establishment, he uses this language: "Above all we wish to dispel that cloud which, on this question, besets the minds of so large a portion, not of the clergy, only, but of the gentlemen of England; to expose some of those parrot-like phrases, which, to the disgrace of human reason, so often bind men's minds with a secret and sovereign charm. Such are the expressions we so often hear of the 'constitution in Church and State,' of its 'venerable establishment,' of its 'heroic martyrs,' its 'pious and learned reformers,' and 'of the mild and tolerant spirit of its doctrines and its ministers.' We call these parrot-like phrases, because, as they are commonly used, they are all either untrue or irrelevant. 'The constitution in Church and State!' Why it is like the feet of the image in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which were made part of iron and part of miry clay; the State strong and sound, gradually perfected by the care of successive generations, carefully watched and continually repaired; and the Church patched up in a hurry three hundred years ago, and of elements confessedly corrupted, and ever since allowed to subsist, unlooked to and unmended, as if, like the waters of the Thames, it would grow pure by the mere lapse of time. We would ask, who would wish to live under our political government such as it was when our Church government was established? And if the former since that time has required a series of improvements, can we believe that the experience and added light of three hundred years could now add nothing to the perfect excellence of the latter? * * * The Church of England has no doubt had its heroic martyrs, but so has the Church of Rome, and so have all Christian communions. And besides it is not a little preposterous to invoke the names of those who died in the cause of reformation in aid of an argument that their example of reform should never be followed again? It has had, too, its pious and learned reformers, and we wish that it would produce some more, equal in piety, and superior in progressment and enlightened views to those of the sixteenth century."

In an article headed "Tracts for the Times," he thus speaks of Apostolic Succession:

"Doubtless, if Apostolic succession be God's will, it is our duty to receive it, and to teach it; but a number of clergymen claiming to have this succession, and insisting that without neither Christ nor Christ's sacraments will save us, do, beyond all contradiction, preach themselves and magnify their own importance. They are quite right in doing so, if God has commanded it. If it be according to God, it stands alone amongst his dispensations. His prophets and his apostles had a different commission. 'We preach,' said St. Paul, 'not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, and ourselves your servants for Jesus's sake.' It is certain that the enforcing Apostolic Succession as the great object of our teaching is precisely to do that very thing which St. Paul was commissioned not to do."

In a chapter headed "The Church of England," he uses the following language:

"The government and external condition of the Church of England are full of abuses, and bear divers marks of the mistaken notions and extreme mismanagement of the times in which they were formed, and of those which neglected to amend them. Its actual governors, the bishops, appointed by the Crown, and out of all proportion too few for the extent and population of England, afford about as apt an image of primitive Episcopacy as the consuls under the Roman Empire did of the consular government of the old commonwealth. Nominated as they now are, [by the Queen,] assisted by no ecclesiastical council, accountable to no general assembly of the Church, it were most dangerous to strengthen their powers, or even to wish that they should exert to the utmost those which they actually possess."

But I am making this article too long, and I shall therefore close it with the design of sending you another next week. N.

"Father," said a boy to his paternal protector, a venerable Quaker, "I can lick that chimney-sweep."

"That may be all very true, my son; but if thee does, thee will get thy hands blacked in the operation," was the wise counsel of the peaceful Friend. A counsel which every sagacious editor sees frequent occasion to follow.

SUBMISSION TO GOD'S WORD.

Jesus said unto him, It is written—Matthew, iv., 7.

We cannot fail to be struck, in the course of the Saviour's public teaching, with his constant appeal to the word of God. While at times he utters in his own name the authoritative behest, "Verily, verily, I say unto you," he as often thus introduces some mighty work, or gives some intimation of some impending event in his own momentous life: "Those things must come to pass, that the Scriptures be fulfilled, which saith." He commands his people to search the Scriptures, but he sets the example by searching and submitting to them himself. Whether he drives the money-changers from their sacrilegious traffic in the temple, or foils his great adversary on the mount of temptation, he does so with the same weapon: "It is written." When he rises from the grave, the theme of his first discourse is one impressive tribute to the value and authority of the same sacred oracles. The disciples, on the road to Emmaus, listened to nothing but a Bible lesson. "He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself."

How momentous the instruction herein conveyed! The necessity of the absolute subjection of the mind to God's written word, making churches, creeds, ministers, books, religious opinion, all subordinate and subservient to this—"How readest thou?" Rebuking the philosophy, falsely so called, that would distort the plain statements of revelation and bring them to the bar of proud reason.

If an infallible Redeemer, a law to himself, was submissive in all respects to the "written law," shall fallible man refuse to sit with the teachableness of a child and listen to the Divine message? There may be, there is, in the Bible what reason staggers at. "We have nothing to draw with, and the well is deep." But "thus saith the Lord" is enough. Faith does not first ask what the bread is made of, but eats it. It does not analyze the components of the living stream, but with joy draws the water from the wells of salvation."

Reader, take that word as "the lamp to thy feet and the light to thy path." In days when false lights are hung out, there is the more need of keeping the eye steadily fixed on the unerring beacon. Make the Bible the urbiter in all difficulties, the ultimate court of appeal. Like Mary, sit at the feet of Jesus, willing only to learn of him. How many perplexities it would save you! How many fatal steps in life it would prevent! How many tears. "It is a great matter," says the noblest of modern Christian philosophers, "when the mind dwells on any passage of Scripture, just to think how true it is."—Life of Chalmers.

In every dubious question, when the foot is trembling on debatable ground, knowing not whether to advance or recede, make this the final criterion: "What saith the Scripture?" The world may remonstrate, erring friends may disapprove, Satan may tempt, ingenious arguments may explain away; but with our finger on the revealed page, let the words of our great example be over a divine formula for our guidance: "This command have I received from my Father!" "Arm yourselves likewise with the same mind."

AN AMOROUS AËRONAUT.—A late French journal relates the following story, which, it will be seen, is French all over, beside being immensely funny:

While Mons. Godard was filling an immense balloon in the Champ-de-Mars, he amused the spectators by sending up the small figure of a man, the perfect semblance of M. Thiers without the spectacles. The little man being filled with gas, rose majestically into the air, and was soon lost to view among the clouds. His adventures, which became known the next day, were curious. Thanks to a strong and favoring gale which impelled him on his course, the little balloon-man arrived the same afternoon in the sight of a fine country-house in the neighborhood of Bievre. It was near the hour of dinner, and the lady of the mansion, who naturally thought herself perfectly safe, was occupied in the mysteries of her toilet. It was a warm day, and she had opened one of the windows, which looked out upon the park, and was safe from any prying eyes. While tranquilly engaged, by the assistance of a corset-lacing, in reducing her waist to a size and shape that would reflect credit on her husband's taste, she was suddenly startled by a blast of wind followed by a strange noise; and immediately the casement was thrown open, and our little balloon-man entered her chamber unannounced. The lady utters a cry of terror, and throws a shawl over her shoulders. The little man, driven by the wind, throws himself upon the unhappy woman, who, screaming louder than ever, pushes him off, and he conceals himself under the bed.

Just as the wife, in a supplicating voice, says to this novel Don Juan: "Ah! Monsieur, go away, or you will ruin me!" the husband furiously rushed in, crying: "Ah! the wretch, I have him now!" and goes in search of his sword to run him through the body.

The wife, more dead than alive, reiterates in the midst of sobs: "Fly! fly! Monsieur, and save me the sight of a dreadful tragedy."

The husband arrives, armed to the teeth, followed by the whole household, who seek to mollify his anger.

While two of his friends hold the husband, a third, stooping down, perceives our little friend, who, for good cause, utters not a word, and catching him by the leg, draws him forth from his concealment, when, lo! Monsieur Balloon, no longer held down by the bedstead, raises himself erect, swells out, and rises majestically to the ceiling, to the immense amusement of the spectators, while the poor, jealous husband slinks away, sword and all, heartily ashamed of his causeless wrath.

The Love Cure.—A Sketch from Life.

BY OUR FAMILY PHYSICIAN.

I had already had some skill and notoriety in my treatment of pulmonary complaints, and traveling North one summer for health and rest, I stopped for a few weeks at a beautiful little village near the St. Lawrence, where I was somewhat known. I had only been in the village two days when I was called to see the young daughter of a wealthy farmer by the name of Summer.

Ida Summer had been the belle of the county, and, though only seventeen, her marvelous beauty had already kindled a quenchless fire in the heart of many a suitor to her favor. Frank, confiding, and at once playful and modest, arch, yet innocent, full of wild spirits, yet utterly devoid of coquetry; to see her was to love her.

I found the peerless girl, whom I had remembered from the summer before as buoyant and rosy with health, pale and wan as a summer cloud, and apparently in the last and closing stages of a deep decline. A careful investigation into the state of her lungs convinced me that her's was a mental rather than a physical consumption. I studied her case carefully, watched the various expressions of her speaking face, and at last came to the conclusion that her malady was one of the heart.

Of unrequited affection? I could not think that; beautiful and good as she was. The case was a difficult one. Tenderly and gently I, probed every sounding, but could arrive at no conclusion. Thus much I discovered: that she possessed no particular regard for any one of the youths far or near, whose name I could get hold of. And, notwithstanding all my efforts, she seemed rapidly declining.

I made minute inquiry into her past life; but cautiously, as not to let my motives be apparent. I learned that she had spent a few weeks of the winter preceding with an intimate friend in an adjoining town, and from that time had begun to fade. To that town I repaired; but by closest inquiry could ascertain nothing. To all alike she had been friendly, but nothing more.

The clergyman of the church which she had attended was a young man, but one given to study and seclusion. She had consequently seen nothing of him except in the pulpit. I had made a pretext to call on him, and found him a man altogether made after the model of what might be the highest aspirations of woman's heart. In fact, all the unengaged young ladies of his parish were well-nigh crazy about him. But to all he accorded nothing but a friendly greeting; and leaving them all, sought the privacy of his own study. He was eminently handsome, and, added to his tall, manly form and beautifully chiseled features, he possessed a benignity of expression that was nearly divine.

I had much conversation with him, and, among other things, I casually mentioned Ida Summer and her evidently dying state, enlarging somewhat on her beauty and goodness. His color deepened somewhat as he assented to my remarks, and expressed his own regrets at her untimely fate; but otherwise he manifested no emotion. I remarked, before I left him, that it was time for him to give his pretty parsonage a mistress.

"I may, many years from now," replied he, with a sudden and deepening sadness; "but I early learned to distrust the disinterested and abiding affection of our modern young women. If I marry, I shall probably marry late in life."

"A fallacy, take my word for it, Mr. Stuart. Our modern women, some of them, are as dead and true as any of the dames of old. The trouble is to find the right one." And thus saying, I bade him good-morning.

On my return I found my patient rather lower than I left her. I told her I had been to the village of ——. Suddenly and tumultuously the warm blood rushed up to her bosom and her face, and she looked at me with her soft, inquiring eyes. I told her of her friends, and casually mentioned the name of the young clergyman, Robert Stuart. To her clear, blue-veined temples the same truant blood sped with fearful force.

I had seen enough. I knew her disease, and most probably its remedy. I hurriedly wrote a note to Mr. Stuart, merely saying: "If you would save a life, lose not a moment in hastening to —— (the name of the town). I will await you at my lodgings." I signed my name, and dispatched it by a private messenger.

Sooner than I expected, the young clergyman was at my hotel. I had prepared Ida for a conversation with a clergyman, specifying, however, no one in particular. I led him to her chamber, saw her blush and start of joy and modesty.

What then and there transpired, no one but the great searcher of hearts and the two of his choicest handiwork thus brought together—a dying girl and a minister of Heaven—can answer. I left them alone as long as I thought her weak state might bear, and when I opened the door I found him sitting beside her bed, her slender hand fast locked in his, and his soul-beaming eyes pouring life and love upon her.

My eyes filled with tears as I caught a sight of her radiant face, so full of peace and serene bliss and life, but the tears I shed were the tears of joy.

My patient, with almost one bound, regained her health and strength, and the glorious representative of God's minister upon earth, changing his mind upon the subject of matrimony in favor of the "right one," is now one of the few truly happy men on earth, happy in a life-marriage with one every way congenial with him, and every way worthy of him.

THE ALPS.—My first view of the Alps was at Berne. I had taken a walk toward evening to the "Engische Promenade," as it is called, a mile or so from the city. Thence a fine view of the city is obtained, with its towering cathedral steeple, and the ambergris-colored Aar winding around it as almost to insulate it completely from the main land. I had seated myself, taken a cup of coffee, and bread and honey, was observing the people and the scenery, and occasionally casting my eyes in the direction of some huge white clouds, which seemed to hang heavily upon the eastern horizon. The thought occurred to me if those clouds were but mountains, how magnificent would they be; they would be beyond all conception or all description; they would satisfy the most intense yearnings of the imagination; they would fill forever that great desire of the mind to feel, if only once, an impression of the purely sublime.

I listened to the music for half an hour, sauntered around under the trees, and then strayed along the promenade a little farther on, away from the crowd; but my eye still continued, from time to time, to fasten itself involuntarily in the direction of those white clouds. They were the most unchangeable clouds I had ever seen; and the impression gradually grew upon me that there was something unnaturally hard and angular in their outline. Can these, then, be mountains? I confess this thought as it first darted into my mind, occasioned a kind of trembling and sinking through my whole frame. Is it possible that those clouds in Heaven, so white, so ethereal, so high above other clouds, that these are mountains?

Two peasants were coming along at the time, their coats and scythes under their arms. I walked up to them, and said: "Will you tell me if those clouds there are really clouds or mountains?" They looked at me with some astonishment for an instant, either at the energy of the action, or the singularity of the question, and then, with a bow, answered: "Mountains, sir, at your service."

And there they were, indeed, the Alps—the high Alps—like the imperishable white pillars of God's throne, piercing into Heaven, incrusted with a pure marble of snow, and faintly tinged with a ruby light, as if it were the smile of the Almighty. I had seen enough. I felt silent, and bowed before the greatness of the works of God. [Providence Journal.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1855.

Rev. Joel Saunders.—We learn from Rev. B. J. Hamilton that our excellent brother, Presiding Elder of Munroe District, La. Conf., came near receiving serious damage a few days ago, in being thrown out of his vehicle by a runaway horse, while on the way to the Minden Quarterly Conference. It gives us sincere pleasure to record his providential escape.

Southern Times.—The second number of this paper is on our table, edited by Dr. A. Lipscomb, and published in Montgomery, Ala. We should like to have No. 1 for our files, and will refer again to the Times. It is the Home Journal, with a better editor than Willis.

Burnt Out.—By mails of the week, we regret to learn that two of our valuable exchanges were burnt out—The Memphis Christian Advocate and the Central Georgian. We hope to hear of full insurance, and that there is enough of the phœnix about them to rise from ashes.

Auburn and the College.—The Auburn Gazette, 30th ult., tells of a large and spirited meeting held in Auburn, Ala., on the 24th of March, for determining the Conference College question. Judge Dougherty presided. Gov. Clopton and Revs. Dr. Jennings, [illegible] made capital speeches. The amount subscribed, in the town alone, had reached forty-five thousand dollars! The vicinity is rich and generous, and we expect to hear of large offerings. These items reach us just as we go to press, or we should copy more at length the interesting proceedings.

Tract Society.—The Second Annual Report of the Tract Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church (North) shows prosperously. It has sprung into existence manfully. Its receipts for the year past amounted to $13,623 [illegible] disbursements, $11,135 92. It has forty conference auxiliary societies, which sent out 153 colporteurs during the year. It has distributed 11,784,627 pages of tracts, [illegible] 3,040 volumes of general, religious and Sunday school books. The [illegible] received for these books and tracts is [illegible] at $39,042 60; the aggregate receipts of the conference auxiliaries $61,053 [illegible]. The colporteurs, so far as they have reported, have visited 21,753 families, with [illegible] of which they have offered prayer; 624 conversions have been traced to their labors, and they are known to have introduced 329 children into Sabbath schools.

Death of a Duellist.—Col. McClung, of Mississippi, the celebrated duellist, put an end to his own existence by committing suicide on Saturday, 24th ult., at Jackson, Miss. Personally, a generous and chivalric man; but morally, a striking example of the peaceless conscience and hard way of the transgressor.

A new Methodist Episcopal Church was dedicated a few weeks since, by Bishop Ames, near the famous battle ground of Tippecanoe—a pleasant comment on the progress of Christianity into fields stained by blood and carnage.

Louisiana University.

This department of our city has been doing a brisk business. Monday last the Annual Commencement of the Law School was held in the Lyceum Hall. The exercises consisted in conferring degrees upon the graduates, music and addresses. Twenty-two young gentlemen received their diplomas. C. Roselius, Esq., Dean of the Faculty, addressed the graduates in a brief, plain, practical, common sense manner. The valedictory was by Mr. B. F. Jonas. James McConnel, Esq., an alumnus, delivered a very racy address.

A fortnight before, the Medical held similar exercises, when about thirty were passed to M. D. One graduated in Pharmacy. As an instance of thoroughness, we state that half a dozen were refused diplomas. Dr. Hunt, the Dean, conferred the degrees; Dr. Jones made the address. We should like to see it in print.

Detention on the Isthmus.

By the following note it will be seen that the fears of Bishop Andrew and his party that they were too late reaching Aspinwall to connect with the Pacific steamers, have been realized.

Off Panama, March 14, 1855.

Brother McTyeire—We are now on board the Golden Age, off Panama, and will not sail until to-morrow. So you will see we have been detained at Panama near two weeks. This was in consequence of the Eldorado not getting in in time for the J. L. Stephens, which steamer left this port on 2d March. We are all in pretty good health, or at least as good as could be expected, when we take into account our detention at this place. Yours, J. W. Ellis.

Methodist Press.

The Texas Advocate, 31st ult., gives good news of a revival in the German Methodist Church, Galveston:

"We are happy to state that this work continues with increasing interest and success. Up to this time sixteen have joined the Church, and seventeen have professed to find peace in believing. Four of these were Catholics, and the rest of the Lutheran persuasion. Our dear brother Molling has labored with a zeal and perseverance truly commendable, and has shown himself, in the pulpit and at the altar, 'a workman that needeth not to be ashamed.' We trust he will be enabled to hold out, and that the work will continue, until hundreds are converted. The church, when the weather is not all good, is crowded to its utmost capacity."

The St. Louis Advocate speaks of revivals within the Missouri and St. Louis Conferences. The Church is extending in its compass and deepening in piety. So may it be everywhere: Amen. The Book Depository there is doing a brisk business, faster than can be supplied, in the present state of things, at head-quarters. Hence:

"We very recently opened a trade with the Harpers, of New York, and are arranging with some other houses, and as soon as we receive our first supply will notify the brethren of the kind of books, terms, &c. But for the Hymn Book and Discipline we are dependent solely on the agents at Nashville."

The same paper, noticing the minutes of the Louisiana Conference, says:

"In this Conference there is a representation of laymen from the several parts of the work to advise, assist and determine on plans for most successfully carrying on missionary operations, raising annual supplies, &c.; and, so far as we can learn, the plan works well, as we believe it would in every place, were it adopted. We hope to see other Conferences availing themselves of the valuable helps which might thus be afforded."

The Pittsburg Advocate gives interesting correspondence on the doings of the Baltimore Conference. It is under advisement to divide its territory into two or three new Conferences. About three hundred and thirty ministers belong to that Conference:

"Conference adjourned on the 21st, after a session of thirteen days. The proposition to admit lay financial delegates was adopted by the Conference. The financial committee is to consist of one preacher and one layman from each district. The laymen are to participate equally with other members in all the financial deliberations of the Conference. Missionary collections for the past year, $28,000, seven hundred less than the previous year. It was resolved to endeavor to raise, the present Conference year, $30,000."

Preaching Calvinism with an Appetite.

"It appears," says a Hartford paper, "that an unhappy dissension has existed for two or three years in the Congregational Church of Enfield, Ct., occasioned by the peculiar doctrinal views of the Rev. C. A. G. Brigham, the pastor, who was originally a Methodist but has become an ultra-Calvinist. Those dissatisfied with his preaching alleged that he held and taught—1. That Christ died only for the elect. 2. That the Holy Spirit strives only with the elect. 3. That Christians should pray only for the elect. 4. That sinners have absolutely no power to repent, though commanded to do so on pain of eternal death. As the pastor's sentiments were more frequently inculcated and become more generally understood, the dissatisfaction increased until it embraced nearly or quite half the Church, and a large majority of the ecclesiastical society. Finally, matters culminated, and the Consociation took the case in hand; and after a protracted hearing the following decision was rendered:

"Regarding, then, the case as properly and in all its parts before the body, the Consociation judge, after a full hearing of the facts and argument, that it is expedient that the relation subsisting between the Rev. C. A. G. Brigham and the Congregational Church and society of Enfield should be dissolved, and do hereby dissolve it."

The location of this affair is noteworthy. Right in the heart of old bluestockingdom—the Jebus of Calvinism. The people do not hear it there, at this day, without a protest.

The Presbyterian of Philadelphia is grieved and astonished at this thing. "Melancholy," says that paper, "must be the blight which has fallen on the churches in New England, when such a minister could be driven from his pulpit for such a cause, and when such an ecclesiastical decision could be sustained."

Dr. Lee, of the Richmond Advocate, whose wit was sharpened, doubtless, by reflecting upon the rebuffs of his uncle when attempting to plant Methodism on that soil, remarks:

"It is a remarkable instance of ecclesiastical action. Taking the Confession of Faith as the standard of Calvinism, it seems to us he was not only justified, but could not, consistently with his standard, preach any other doctrine. We once heard of a society of professed Christians, one of whose rules was to salute one another with a holy kiss. One of the young lady members one day jumped up and kissed a young man as he came into meeting. They disciplined her and expelled her—not for kissing, that was according to rule; but for kissing with an appetite. We presume Mr. Brigham's offence was, preaching Calvinism with an appetite."

A Japanese Book.—Those who bear in mind that the millions of this Empire must have the Bible printed for them, would like to know the facilities. The Baltimore Sun has received a Japanese book. It is described to be printed like the Chinese, on thin paper, and only on one side, each leaf being a folded sheet, with the fold at the edge, of course uncut, and designed to remain so. The cuts and reading matter are evidently engraved on the same plate, and the impression very much resembles lithography. The drawings indicate the slightest possible idea of perspective, while the execution of this slight idea is very imperfect.

Prizes Worth Contending For.

These prizes are offered every forty years, from the accumulated proceeds of property during that period, left for that purpose by Mr. Burnett, of Aberdeen. The first distribution was made forty years ago, when Dr. W. C. Brown competed successfully for the first prize, and Dr. Sumner, now Archbishop of Canterbury, received the second prize. Samuel Drew, the Methodist metaphysician, wrote for it, and although unsuccessful, his treatise was published in two volumes; Dr. Adam Clarke contended for its superiority over the fortunate treatises, and this view has been generally confirmed.

The Burnett literary prizes have lately been carried off; the £1,800 or $9,000 prize by the Rev. R. A. Thompson, of the Church of England, and the £600 prize by Dr. Tulloch, of the Church of Scotland. The adjudicators, Professors Powell and Rogers, and Isaac Taylor, were unanimous in their award, although they pronounced a very high opinion of six out of the 206 unsuccessful treatises, and recommended their publication. Mr. Thompson is comparatively a young man; and it is a curious fact that, during the storm at the commencement of 1854, when the posts were detained, he travelled to Aberdeen from Lawrencekirk on horseback, and delivered personally his essay to Burnett's acting trustee, at a late hour in the evening of the last day on which the treatises could be received—departing as he came, unknown. The title of Mr. Thompson's essay is "Christian Theism," and Dr. Tulloch's, "Theism," both of which are rapidly passing through the press.

Bunyan's Panorama.

It is a compliment to the taste and morality of the New Orleanais, the patronage this panorama has met with since its unrolling a month ago. Armory Hall has not had better audiences. The manager expressed fears to us, on arriving here, that his exhibition would be a failure, and the heavy expenses sink him. "If," said he, "I had a gang of black minstrels, or something so, I might calculate on large houses and large receipts; but such a quiet thing of beauty, I fear it will not take."

But it did take. There are seven thousand people here that have not bowed the knee to Baal. Appropos:

The great moral drama of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" was to be produced on the night of the 19th, at the Chesnut street Theatre, in Philadelphia. This is the first appearance of that famous work in dramatic form, though, in fact, it is intensely dramatic in its original form. But only think of the actors of the modern stage in the sacred characters of that immortal dream!

Nashville University.

We have been waiting to see or hear some explanation of the hocus-pocus trickery by which Dr. Wadsworth, the President of this establishment, has been eliminated from its faculty. The Doctor's appointment gave the institution consideration, and its prospects under his auspices, and that influence which gathered about him, were flattering.

An arrangement is about being made to attach military discipline to the Nashville University. The Banner says:

"We do not approve of this movement, if anything better can be done; but we have no hope of the success of the University except by this attachment. We have no idea that college boys can be governed in Nashville by any other system."

The plans are, as adopted, that the collegiate department be organized upon the military system as to government and discipline, retaining the usual studies, classes and degrees; and that a new department be established for the cultivation of practical science and the higher branches of learning.

Why I Take a Religious Paper.

"A Reader" of an exchange sums up substantial reasons for so doing. It reminds us of Bishop Pierce's remark before the North Carolina Conference, "That if some people were translated to Heaven, they would not be able to make a report or give any news of what the Church was doing on earth."

1. I love to hear about the Kingdom of Christ, its advancement and prospects.

2. Because I need to be often urged to duty, personal, social, public. It often warms my heart and excites to prayer.

3. Because I ought to know how to pray intelligently for the Church and the world.

4. Because I ought to know what the times require of me, how I should labor, and how I should give.

5. Because it helps me to understand many things I hear in the pulpit and in conversation.

6. Because I wish my children to be intelligent, having enlarged and liberal views.

7. Because I would have my children, for their own good, their happiness, their salvation, to cultivate an interest in the Kingdom of Jesus.

8. Because I desire my children should be trained for usefulness.

Ex-Bishop Ives.—This gentleman thus writes to one of his friends in North Carolina:

"We are now pleasantly situated here on the North River, in the summer house of Archbishop Hughes. My employment is that of Professor of Rhetoric and Pulpit Eloquence, in the Theological Seminary at Fordham, and as lecturer in two neighboring convents, while our support is ample."

It will be recollected that it was recently stated that Prof. Ives was living in great destitution.

New Publications.

Rosser on Baptism:

We have already had occasion to speak of this volume in detail. A doctrine, like any other fact, admits of many presentations. The advancement of critical, biblical and archæological science raises new objections and confirmations. These must be attended to, and thus the discussion of what sounds like a trite subject is kept up with interest and to the increasing advantage of truth. We regard this volume as entitled to this justification, and partaking of this character. That the public are of the same mind appears from the fact that the copy before us is of the third edition.

Rosser on Experimental Religion:

The views of a minister much conversant with revivals, and mourners, and protracted meetings, on the subjects of repentance, justification, witness of the Spirit, &c., have a peculiar value. Experience is constantly before his eyes, regulating speculation. His subjectivity is soundly influenced by objective truths. Mr. Rosser is known in his Conference (the Virginia) as a revivalist. We like his book, and make it pay interest by loaning it.

Rosser's Reply to Howell:

The author of the "Evils of Infant Baptism" must feel complimented by the defensive notice taken of it. We are at a loss to know whether its glaring inaccuracies or power for mischief be its recommendation to our critics. This is a neat and well spirited little volume, of 160 pages, and uses up whatever was left of Mr. Howell.

Kate Aylesford—A Story of the Refugees. By C. J. Peterson. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson, 1855. 12mo, pp. 336.

We thought, at first glance the publisher had become so enamoured of books as to turn author. On closer inspection, the author is C. J. and the publisher T. B. The story depicts Revolutionary scenes with life enough to fire up a 4th of July train. We have a copy in advance, by mail.

Marco Paul's Voyages and Travels. By Jacob Abbett. 18mo, pp. 192. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1855.

Another of the interesting series by Abbott, under the well known title as above. Abbott is our Peter Parley. McGinnis.

Harper's Story Book, No. IV.—The Little Louvre. March, 1855.

The title of this number is taken from the Picture Gallery of the Louvre, in Paris, so that the juvenile reader, by perusing these pages, will see, in fifty-two engravings, accompanied by as many descriptions, what the character is of the great works of art which have made the great Louvre so famous.

Lives of the Queens of Scotland. By Agnes Strickland. Vol. V., 12mo., pp. 333. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1855.

In the volume before us the narrative is brought down to the scenes in Lochleven Castle, where Mary is left on the eve of her deliverance by Douglas. Miss Strickland writes in a spirit of generous vindication.

Physical Geography of the Sea. By M. F. Maury, L. L. D., Lieut. U. S. Navy. 8vo., pp. 274. New York: Harper & Bros., 1855.

The path of a ship on the sea was counted by Solomon among the things that could not be found out. The way of a serpent on a rock and some other things was not more difficult of trace. Maury has come as near taking up the challenge of Solomon on this point, as Morse that of Job on the lightning. He has literally mapped off the watery waste. He has found a road for navigation. His investigations of winds and currents constitute one of the most useful contributions to modern science. Before Lieut. Maury commenced his researches, the ordinary passage to California was 183 days; aided by his charts, navigators are now able to effect the same voyage in 135 days. Here we have a philosophical account of the winds and currents of the sea; of the circulation of the atmosphere and ocean; of the temperature and depth of the sea, of the wonders that are hidden in its depths, and of the phenomena that display themselves at its surface. This volume is illustrated by a series of maps.

We have it from the publishers, through H. D. McGinnis, 36 Camp street.

We have received from the author a pamphlet copy of a "Speech of Rev. C. K. Marshall on the Necessity of Southern School Books and Home Education, delivered before the Southern Commercial Convention, New Orleans, January, 1855."

The time and place of making this speech was as happy as its delivery. It ought to open the eyes of indolent Southrons to the text books in school and College use, and reform courses of study. It will.

Ladies' Repository.—This monthly, published at the Cincinnati Book Concern, and edited by Dr. Clark, has a subscription of 22,000 and growing. It deserves to grow. In its sphere, we know not an equal—popular in style, refined in taste and moral in teachings. We must praise the artist as well as the editor. This picture man has our thanks. His lines may not be so fine, but his expressions are. Some of his pictures produce the emotions of a poem. A few numbers back was one that started many a tear, "The mother's dream." That number was abstracted from our library, (we keep them,) but not lost. It was treasured away with certain soft locks of hair and half-worn shoes of the little boy that died. What happened in our household doubtless did in many others. There is a touch of nature that makes us all akin.

Graham for April is on our table. Send three dollars and you will get therefor a beautiful magazine.

The National Magazine for April is up to itself only in promptness, otherwise this number is a decided falling off.

Godey for April is as fine as a fiddle.

Blackwood for March has been on hand long enough to be read. The old Mag. has lost its conservativeness in dealing with the Government in its conduct of the war. It is very readable. Where are the quarterlies, due by this time?

LETTER FROM REV. R. ABBEY.

Yazoo City, March 23, 1855.

Dear Brother McTyeire—I will take it as a great kindness if you will publish the following note in your paper. I hoped to have published it in the Herald, but after the question of its publication being held "under advisement," as I was informed several days ago, I am told, "it cannot be published in the Herald, nor can any notice be taken therein of Mr. Abbey or his pamphlet." What have I done?

I was also informed that my name could, under no circumstances, appear in the columns of the Herald. And yet it is most likely true that this same name has appeared in those same columns oftener than the name of any other man living, or that ever did live. It has been seen there in times past—not at my instance, however—at the rate of ten, twenty, or thirty times a week. And what is the matter now? What have I done? If any man will point out my fault, I will make amends as large and as public as may be in my power.

I asked for the publication of the note in the Herald for the obvious reason that its publication elsewhere would only to a very small extent give the desired notice. I asked its publication not for my advantage, but to my pecuniary expense to most likely a considerable amount, but for the benefit of the Herald's own subscribers. But my name can't appear again in the Herald. I ask, sir, what have I done?

The editors began a debate with me, and got me into their paper to conduct it, and then got me out of it, and then I finished it elsewhere, and then I published, not a one-sided argument, but every word of their arguments as well as my own. I published their arguments at considerable expense. Was this fair or unfair? And now my name has become so disagreeable, or so something, I know not what, that it cannot be printed in the Herald, even to a little complimentary notice to its own subscribers! Sir, what have I done? I did not know that my name was a matter of any importance or much consequence any way.

My friend in Vicksburg, when he could not get the notice published, asked for a list of their subscribers, or rather for the privilege of making a list at his own expense. This the editors promised, but the agent of the paper peremptorily refused.

All this I cannot understand. I enclose the notice referred to.

Yours, truly, R. Abbey.

To the Subscribers of the Church Herald.

From the month of July, 1853 to May, 1854, you were furnished from time to time with a lengthy discussion on the question of the Apostolic Succession, in a debate with myself; with the exception, however, of two short letters, the Herald contained but one side of the argument. In May last the debate on that side was formally closed by the editors, in reply to a publication I made in newspaper slip a short time previously. Since then I have prepared a rejoinder to their final argument, and have published the whole debate in a pamphlet of 160 pages, which I propose to furnish to such of the subscribers to the Herald as will favor me with their address: Respectfully, &c., R. Abbey.

Yazoo City, March 6, 1855.

Will the editors of the Herald, in justice to their subscribers, be so good as to give the above a place in their columns, and much oblige your friend, &c., R. A.

The New Method of Teaching Theology.—The directors of the Danville Seminary, says the Presbyterian Herald, have adopted, in their plan of the institution presented to the General Assembly, and approved by that body, a modification of the plan of instruction pursued in the other seminaries of the Church, on one point. It is thus described in the catalogue:

"The course of instruction and study occupies three annual sessions. With the exception of Hebrew, all the students are taught in one class. Ordinarily each professor meets all the students every day, and the class spends three hours each day in the lecture room. The afternoon is devoted to instruction, leaving the rest of the day for uninterrupted study. Each professor arranges his lectures into a three years' course."

This, says the Herald, is substantially, if we mistake not, the plan lately adopted in the Aberdeen School of the Free Church of Scotland; the institution which is creating so much excitement in the Church at this time.

Relation of Baptized Infants.—This article, republished by us from the Methodist Quarterly Review, was written by Rev. T. F. R. Mercein, of New York Conference, a young minister of fine talents. The London Watchman says:

"We confess we should like to see this able paper reprinted for the benefit of the British Wesleyans. If we are rightly informed, there is want both of definiteness and of uniformity of views in relation to the baptism of infants current here—as, indeed, is the case among English Nonconformists generally—no less than among our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic."

An Avalanche of Them.—The "old soldiers" are evidently "alive and sticking." Yesterday, about 3,700 applications for bounty land for them were received at the Pension Office. Three hundred other business letters were also received at that bureau yesterday. These facts will give the distant readers a fair idea of the labor performed in that branch of the Government's affairs at this point. [Washington Star, 27th.

Dr. Achilli Again.

During the week this distinguished Italian has been added to the guests of our city. We are pleased to see one so notable. He looks about fifty years old; rather below than above medium height, and more stout than otherwise; a large head, covered with raven black hair; features large and strongly intellectual.

He was born in Rome, of an old Roman family; was twice imprisoned in the dungeons of the Inquisition. In 1842 he began his protest, and established what he calls the Italian Church. The model is the old Latin—Catholicism without Popery; belonging to no sect, but comprehending all sects.

Dr. Achilli is now engaging friends and funds for his cause. Two thousand copies of his translation of the New Testament have already been published. He desires a new edition for his Italian Church; and also to publish the whole Bible, which he proclaims ready, in manuscript.

Some of the peculiarities of this work are, baptizo is translated immerse; ecclesia, congregation instead of church; angel, messenger, bishop, overseer.

The version of Diodati is thought to be defective in literalness and obsolete in much of its language.

An item which appeared in the Advocate, 24th ult., concerning Dr. Achilli, as represented by the St. Louis Watchman and other papers of the West, formed the subject of a long and exceedingly interesting interview in our office on Thursday. Dr. A. denies that he is a Swedenborgian, any more than a Presbyterian, Baptist, &c. He translated a pamphlet of Swedenborg on the commandments—this he admits, and pronounces it a beautiful thing, worthy of being read. But he desires us to say, and on his authority we do it with pleasure, that he is not a Swedenborgian. Furthermore, that he answered all such charges at the place and in the papers where they appeared.

Regarded as an exile, a martyr and a Protestant, Dr. Achilli is a notable character. We can imagine how one with his defective English and peculiar views might be misunderstood and misrepresented.

He will lecture in this city, where he proposes to tarry a week, and proceed to the Atlantic cities—Mobile, Georgia and the Carolinas. Between his own bible and Diodati's we are not prepared to give an opinion; but any bible in Italy would be a blessing, and we wish Dr. Achilli's bible was scattered broadcast over his native land.

OUR HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

Marshall, Texas, March 26, 1855.

Mr. Editor—It is now the 26th day of March, and the weather is cold, with frost every morning. No rain. The earth is as dry and parched as it is ever seen to be; roads excessively dusty, and we have no navigation. Last year's cotton crop is in the warehouses, and under sheds at the gin-houses, and provisions are so scarce in the country as to awaken apprehensions of distress. Corn is worth one dollar and a quarter or one dollar and a half per bushel, and not a bushel for sale at any price. Corn meal has been sold at $2 per bushel; flour is worth $20 per barrel. There is not a pound of meat, of sugar or coffee, for sale at any price. The river is down to low-water mark, and the heavens are brass.

Lord! thou hast promised that seed time and harvest shall not fail. Send, we pray thee, the early and the latter rain.

Thus nature pleads for railroads, and our people begin to feel the argument. An arrangement is almost completed, and probably will be consummated in a few days, to resume work on the railroad at this place with five hundred hands.

There has been some sickness in Harrison county, some in Marshall, chiefly scarlet fever and pneumonia. The Church is in a good state here, congregations large and attentive, and not often a sermon is preached without evidence that the Word reaches the hearts of the hearers. C. G. Y.

QUARTERAGE.

Mr. Editor—I noticed an article, a few days ago, in the Advocate, under the above heading, which "adzactly suits this child," for, honor bright, I have not a dime past me except $1 50 belonging to the N.O. Advocate. True, also, our first quarterly meeting has met, and the stewards brought up their quarterage, amounting to—no, I won't say; but suffice it to say, there was not enough to divide between the P. E. and P. C., and your humble servant received it all, and went home without a "red."

Now, it is a mistaken idea that preachers have no use for money until the end of the year. It is not enough to take good care of the man and horse. Neither is it sufficient to make the "chickens squall and open the new bag of flour, (which, just now, is "skase" in these parts,) and put the new quilt on the bed" when the preacher comes; for, in addition to all this, he needs some money to buy articles needful, for which he does not want to go in debt, but is compelled.

Let the brethren think about this matter, and at first quarterly meetings bring along some, be it ever so small; and by uniting their small amounts they make large ones.

Another argument in favor of paying at every opportunity, even giving it to the P. as he goes around, is, that it wont do for preachers to have too much money at one time, for some have located when "riches increased." And you know wages—our wages—have gone up "smartly;" and oh, what a pile if it all comes at once! Don't do it.

Alabama. Circuit Rider.

Sidney Smith's definition of the Popish ritual deserves a place here: "Posture and imposture, fiction and genuflection, bowing to the right and courtesying to the left, and an immense amount of man-millinery."

RELIGION—WHAT IS IT?

BY BISHOP HEBER.

Is it to go to church to-day,
To look devout and seem to pray,
And ere the morrow's sun goes down,
Befriending slander through the town?

Does every sanctimonious face
Denote the certain reign of grace?
Does not a pride that scowls at sin
Oft veil hypocrisy within?

Is it to make our daily walk,
And of our own good deeds to talk,
Yet often practice secret crime,
And thus misspend our precious time?

Is it for sect or creed to fight,
To call our zeal the rule of right,
When what we wish is, at the best,
To see our church excel the rest?

Is it to wear the Christian's dress,
And love to all mankind profess,
And treat with scorn the humble poor,
And bar against them every door?

Oh, no! religion means not this,
Its fruit more sweet and fairer is—
Its precept this: To others do
As you would have them do to you.

It grieves to hear an ill report,
And scorns with human woes to sport—
Of others' deeds it speaks no ill,
But tells of good or keeps it still.

And does religion this impart?
Then may its influence fill my heart!
Oh! haste that blissful, joyful day,
When all the earth may own its sway!

A Desirable Provision.—The Guardian Angel in Paris is a man whose duty it is to visit the drinking shops, and the moment a man gets tipsy to take him under his protection, accompany him home and put him to bed. The individuals practising this profession are picked men, who never drink themselves, who have the necessary moral authority to force obedience from the drunken creatures they are conveying home, who can defend him against attack, and more than all who can prevent him from drinking at the shops they pass on their way. The price for this service is ten sous; and there is not an instance on record of an individual thus protected home and put to bed, having failed to discharge this debt of honor. It is a rule of the drinking shops that when a man can stand he must be taken off, and the Angel straightway called. The Angel is kindly treated by the shopkeeper, whose interest is to see that no one of his customers come to harm. To receive the odds and ends of the dinner, are recommended to the neighbors when a noble man for some confidential errand is wanted. Their honesty is proverbial, and a Bacchanal with a hundred francs in his pocket, who is confided to their charge, is morally sure of finding his hundred francs where he left them when he wakes the next morning. To those acquainted with the character of the native Parisians, it is unnecessary to observe that the Guardian Angels are relics for custom principally on the English and other foreigners, who have not learned to take wine without abusing it.

Our Future.—Spanish Policy.—The New York Herald, commenting upon the recent Spanish outrages, says:

We have had enough of this. Now what is to be done? Does the Administration think to escape the judgment of the American people by simply accepting the offer of Senor Luzuriaga to negotiate upon the Black Warrior case? It will not do. The dodge is too transparent. The present European crisis affords the opportunity, the last chance for a clean and permanent settlement with Spain, upon our own fair terms, and without delay. On the other hand, there is every reason to fear that if we enforce a settlement in the meantime, that a year hence Europe this year, the next, or two or three, or ten years hence, will be followed, if not by the appropriation of Cuba between England and France in some shape, at least by the Africanization of the Island. This will place it at once and forever beyond our reach. Cuba a free negro settlement, and the annexation of the sovereign State of the empire of Soulouque would be as undesirable.

What, then, is our present policy? It is notice, by the call of an extra session of Congress, and such recommendations to the two houses as will bring about a definite and permanent settlement. Such a course, we maintain, is the only course for peace. We may dictate the law to England and France. Wait until they are relieved of Russia, and they will dictate it to us under a bolder Administration, we shall be compelled to fight it out.

We plead for peace in pleading for a prompt and final settlement. The allied protectors of Spain are not subject to our "balance of power." Spain, subjected to their must therefore succumb to our just demands. Reparations and indemnities for the Black Warrior outrage, and all others, upon our people and our ships, in and about Cuba, will not suffice. We want not only "indemnity for the past, but security for the future." Now is the time to command it.

Let the friends of the Administration who desire to see its last days better than the first—who wish the restoration of this Democratic party to popularity and power—who are in favor of a bold American policy, plead with Mr. Pierce for an extra session of Congress. It will sustain him. The country will sustain him, because justice will be with him. If the Cabinet rebel, let him get a new Cabinet. Where is the difficulty? Now is the time for this bold and popular movement. The late speech, in the Cortes of Luzuriaga, shows that an extra session was anticipated by the most sanguine, three months ago. All the continental nations will be extensively represented. In Great Britain only does the war so exclusively engross public attention as to interfere seriously with the preparations of the Paris fair. Austria alone had seven hundred exhibitors at the London fair; she will have eighteen hundred at Paris; Prussia, which had three hundred exhibitors at London, will have sixteen hundred at Paris; and even Switzerland will have more than a hundred, vouching for the dignity of her position as a manufacturing State.

The United States has the place of honor in the exhibition. On entering the building by the grand entrance the visitor will advance at once into the American section. Great Britain will have a position upon the left, and France upon the left. More than four thousand square feet of space has been assigned to the United States, and on the 23d of February last the Commissioner of American Commissioners had been notified of the intention to exhibit but by sixty-four Americans. The prospects were that the department would not be filled up at the time of opening.

Lieut. Rodman arrived at Baton Rouge on Tuesday last, to take command of the U. S. Arsenal at that place. The Gazette says that Lieut. Todd, who has been in command for the last two years, has been ordered to St. Louis, where he was stationed previously to going to Baton Rouge.

In the Mobile Register, of Friday last, we find the following paragraphs:

Capt. Graham, with his two steamships, the United States and St. Lawrence, took his departure from among us yesterday; the United States bound to New Orleans via Havana, and the St. Lawrence for Galveston.

We regret that we cannot announce the filling up of the subscription list for $100,000 wanted to ensure a monthly return of these steamers to our waters—but by no means despair of the sum being raised as soon as the committee can fairly get to work in their behalf, by presenting the subject to the personal consideration of our merchants and other men of capital.

On Wednesday night the steamer Fry, ran down a lower bay boats, while on her downward trip to the Pilot ping, struck a snag in the neighborhood of Dog River and sunk in about six feet water. She had on board about eleven hundred bales of cotton—all of which will be saved in a more or less damaged state. The Fry is an iron boat, divided into compartments, will not be easily raised when the cotton is got out of her.

The French Industrial Exhibition.—A Paris correspondent says that the approaching exhibition in Paris promises to be more brilliant and successful than was anticipated by the most sanguine, three months ago. All the continental nations will be extensively represented. In Great Britain only does the war so exclusively engross public attention as to interfere seriously with the preparations of the Paris fair. Austria alone had seven hundred exhibitors at the London fair; she will have eighteen hundred at Paris; Prussia, which had three hundred exhibitors at London, will have sixteen hundred at Paris; and even Switzerland will have more than a hundred, vouching for the dignity of her position as a manufacturing State.

The United States has the place of honor in the exhibition. On entering the building by the grand entrance the visitor will advance at once into the American section. Great Britain will have a position upon the right, and France upon the left. More than four thousand square feet of space has been assigned to the United States, and on the 23d of February last the Commissioner of American Commissioners had been notified of the intention to exhibit but by sixty-four Americans. The prospects were that the department would not be filled up at the time of opening.

The Opelousas Railroad.—We clip the following paragraph from the Franklin (St. Mary) Banner, of the 29th ult. It contains cheering intelligence. The completion of the section of road between the Fourche crossing and Berwick's Bay will be fraught with advantages of no ordinary character. Several populous and wealthy parishes will be convenienced thereby. The products of the most fertile portion of Louisiana can be brought to market cheaply and expeditiously. And the extension will open a business for the road which will enormously to its revenues, and enable the Directory to push forward the great work with zeal and expedition. Here is the paragraph alluded to:

The Opelousas Railroad Company, we understand, is determined to push the work with energy, for which purpose a large gang of negroes are to be placed on the unfinished part of the road between the Lafourche and Tigerville, with a view of completing that portion by the first of October at the farthest. The carrying of the road to this point will add much to its revenue, besides being a great accommodation to the traveling public.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT.

THE TREASURER OF THE LOUISIANA CONFERENCE MISSIONARY SOCIETY ACKNOWLEDGES THE RECEIPT OF THE FOLLOWING:

April 2, 1855—From T. Gibson, Esq., Lafourche, La., through Rev. L. A. Reed, for preaching on his plantation..... $60

Deaths.

DIED—At Eutaw, Greea county, Ala., on Tuesday morning, March 13, JOHN EDWARDS FALCONER, having nearly completed his seventeenth year. His disease having rapidly developed itself, hie death was unexpected, casting the mantle of grief over the family, of which he was a favorite member.

When quite a child, John, trained by a pious mother, and taught by her to repent his prayers, connected himself with the Methodist Episcopal Church, in whose arms he sought for protection, and nader whose fostering care he found guidance till the close of his life. He did not, however, openly make a profession of religion, though in the protracted meeting held there in the fall of 1853 he realized some comfort in the experience of his feelings. From that time up to his sickness he was regular in his private devotions, punctual in his attendance at church, and by his orderly walk hae left us not without hope that his spirit is at rest with Him who gave it. Though young, yet by reason of a sprightly mind he had acquired great ease in attending to his father's office, to whom he rendered valuable service by kindly waiting upon these, having business in the same. Under snch circumstances his death becoms the more painful; but still the piercing eye of faith may yet see the darkness of this great termination joyous light. And though a promising son, an affectionate child, the hope of his friends and the joy of his parents has been suddenly cantcled away, out down like the opening flower to wither and to die, yet the heart-stricken ones should "sorrow not, even as others who have no hope," having the assurance that all "them which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him," who by the "word of his power" "shall change the vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."

Upon these premisee let the "bruised reed" and the "smoking flax" lean for aid and comfort, and let the solemn warning eound in our ears, "Therefore, be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye thiuk not the Son of man cometh."

DIED—In Chambers county, Ala., Feb. 15, CHARLES B. RUTLEDGE, in the 50th year of his age. He had been a member of the M. E. Church about thirty years. At preaching, prayer meeting, class meeting, in the Sabbath school and at the family altar, he gave evidence of his devotion to the cause of his Master; and though he felt that he was not called to any high station in the Church, yet his disposition was to do what he could. In him, verily, the poor have lost a friend; and the heart-stricken wife and sorrowing children mourn, but not as those without hope.

The disease of which our brother died was short and violent, but when the messenger came he was ready, with his "lamp trimmed and burning." He gave repeated evidence of his readiness to die during his illness, and when it was thought by some that he was too far gone to be eensible of what might be said to him, Brother Oliver, anxious to know how he felt when so near the Jordan of death, asked him of his prospects. His soul fired at the thought, as though it had been the music of Heaven; he at once gave praise and glory to him whose grace is victory in the final conflict. He said to Brother Olivor that he wished to hear his voice once more in prayer. Prayer was made, and God was present. They embraced each other as leag and tried friends, for the last time till they meet in Heaven. The vast multitude that attended his burial to mingle their sympathies and prayers with the bereaved family, is evidence that one of no ordinnry worth has gone. S. HARWELL.

CLAYTON A. HOLT was one of more than ordinary worth; one whose life was in many respects interesting, and it is due his memory that more extended notice than has appeared be given.

He was in the 23d year of his age when death called him away, on the 19th of January last. He was blessed with a fine person and marked intellectual endowments. His mind was strong and sprightly, and finely proportioned; and his training, both mental and moral, of the proper kind.

The fact that such were some of his most striking characteristics was owing, as already intimated, and in no very ordinary degree, to his having been nurtured under the fostering care and guidance of these whose principles were correct. His parents and guardians were pious, loving the Bible, and they labored to inculcate in his mind its hallowed principles, and a part of his scholastic training had also been under men of high-toned and deep piety.

It was in his seventeenth year that he embraced religion and joined the Methodist Church.

His profession was not loud, but unequivocal, and his stand upon the side of the Lord and with his people decided. All the subsequent portion of his life evinced meet clearly the genuineness of his profession.

He was diffident, and had an humblo opinion of his own abilities and worthiness; yet his piety, like the stream of running water, was widening and expanding, as exhibited in an increase of devotedness to God and love to mankind.

He bid fair to be extensively useful as a citizen, and as a Christian. He had selected a home in the West, (Texas,) and was snatched away very suddenly, but not without preparation. He had lived the life of a Christian, and his end was peaceful. Most firmly did he rely upon the merits of Christ, and gloriously did he triumph over death. But how inscrutable and past finding out is the dispensation that has taken from our midst ons so noble, and in whom there was so much promise of usefulness.

We bow submissively to the stroke that has bereft us, with the hope that we shall meet our friend and brother in a brighter and better abode. JAMES W. SHORES.

DIED—In Sullivan county, Tenn., January 21, 1855, MOLLY MORRISON, wife of Capt. George Morrisen, and mother-in-law of the late lamented Samuel Putton, D. D., in the 75th year of her age. She was the mother of thirteen children, and the grandmother of 105, nearly all of whom are members of the Methodist Church, and all highly respectable and ueeful members of society. She herself was for thirty-six years a member of the Church and a faithful and zealous Christian.

Mrs. ELIZABETH CROZIER, daughter of Roger and Margaret Barton, and consort of Col. Arthur Crozier, died suddenly at her residence near white Plaine, Benton county, Ala., February 18, 1855.

ELIZABETH B. MOORE, daughter of James Moore, Jr., who was a lineal descendant of the Rev. Samuel Rutherford, of Scotland, whose family were taken captive by the Indians in the year 1784, was born February 25, 1818; embraced religion and joined the M. E. Church while young, and, January 20, 1855, in Russell county, Va., after a protracted illness of some weeks, passed triumphantly away to her heavenly home.

DIED—Near Pine Hill, Wilcox county, Ala., March 2, Mrs. ELEANOR THOMAS, in her 62d year. The deceased was born in Marlborough District, S. C., where she lived till the winter of 1850, when she moved to the State in which she died. Mrs. Thomas was an humble and devout follower of Christ for thirty-five years. She was looked upon by all who knew her as an example of true piety. She let no opportunity pass of doing good.

THE CASE OF BEALE, THE PHILADELPHIA DENTIST—Attempt to Bribe the Governor—The Grand Jury of the Quarter Sessions made a special presentment yesterday in relation to a fact mentioned in a recent pamphlet, published in this city, upon the Beale case. The pamphlet, which is signed by the namee of Anson Reed, James Bryan, John Chambers and others, states that a proposition was made to Mrs. Beale, some months ago, to raise $10,000, with which a person, whose name is not given, offered to procure a pardon from Governor Bigler.

The witnesses subpoened and examined by the Grand Jury were the Rev. John Chambers, the Rev. A. Reed, Mr. Daniel Steinmetz, Mr. Chas. C. Rhoads and William L. First, Esq., the last named gentlemn attending veluntarily or without subpoena.

It was clearly proved that in the month of December last, Charles C. Rhoads and a female named Mrs. Susan Turner, a sister of the wife of the prisoner, suggested and urged upon the prisoner's friends, the latter being represented by Mr. Chambers and Mr. Steinmetz, that the sum of $10,000 should be raised; that it was to be ultimately paid to two professional gentlemen, whose names were not given; but that it was not to be paid till the pardon was obtained. In other words, that the pardon was to be first obtained by the agency of these unknown persons, who were to receive this enormous sum as a fee, wholly contingent on moving the mercy of the Executive. So far there was no dispute.

It was also clearly proved that this proposition was at once and indignantly declined; but it did not appear how. As late as the 5th of January, the belief was allowed to possess the mind of this unfortunate prisoner, that the money, which his friends knew was to be given to these agents, was to be paid to the Governor; the letter in which he avows this being all the time in the possession of these friends, and now published by them.

Mr. Chambers says, on his examination, that Rhoad's statement was, "that there were two distinguished lawyers in this city who had potent political power with the then Governor of the State, Governor Bigler, whose political influence could be had for the sum of $10,000-to procure this pardon." On its being douounced by Mr. Chambers, Rhoads said: "It was a mere matter of law business, and that these men were looked upon as pleading the case before the Governor. We will not ask the money until we have the pardon, and when we hand the pardon to the agent of Dr. Beale, we will require the $10,000.

At a subsequent interview, once the inauguration of Gov. Pollock, the suggestion was renewed, and the same amount required, although then it was put on the ground of compensation for legal services.

It should here be distinctly stated that no one hinted the idea, neither Rhoads nor any one, that either Governor was aware of such a mercenary influence as was contemplated being brought to bear upon him.

The result of the inquiry made by the Grand Inquest is, that a plan to obtain $10,000 from the family or friends of a convicted prisoner, in order to procure a pardon, was devised; that this plan was urged upon the friends of this prisoner and declined by them; that the parties to this abortive case were Charles C. Rhoads and Mrs. Turner; that the individuals to whom this plan was communicated, and by whom it was declined, were the Rev. John Chambers and Mr. Daniel Steimetz; that the existence of such a plan was known to these gentlemen, and other friends of the prisoner, as far back as the early part of January, but it was not communicated to the public authorities; that it was the design of the parties to this arrangement to appropriate $5000 to the employment of counsel, who was designated, but there is no mode of ascertaining from the evidence taken what was to be done with the other $5000. General Intelligence.

ARRIVAL OF THE DANIEL WEBSTER.

The steamship Daniel Webster, Capt. J. D. Adams, left New Orleans on her regular day of sailing 14th March, for San Juan. When three days out, while passing Cape San Antonio, was brought to with a shotted gun from a Spanish sloop-of-war mounting twenty-four and papers demanded and overhauled under protest of the captain, and the only reason given for so doing was that they served all steamships that passed the island the same way, after which she was allowed to go on her course. The steamship Star of the West, Capt. Turner, came into port on the day after the arrival of the Webster, with three hundred and fifty passengers from New York. Both ships left the harbor on the 24th, with passengers from San Francisco. The Star of the West had $300,000 in specie. The town of San Juan is dull and quiet. The British war steamer Devastation was in port, officers and crew all well. Also, English mail steamer Teviot. She was to leave on the 24th for St. Thomas, etc. The American brigantine Eastern State is loading with hides and logwood for New York. The brig Hamlet was discharging coal and lumber for the Atlantic Transit Company.

The news from the State of Nicaragua is of some importance. Chomano is dead; he died on the 12th inst., and was buried the following day with military honors. Thus Nicaragua is without a President, which, it is thought, may tend to a renewal of the war; but should Carel become the choice of the people, and such a result is possible, he bring a very popular and liberal minded man, it would be the means perhaps of preventing further bloodshed and contention. The revolutionists have been driven from the vicinity of Granada, and have returned to Leon, where they have made a stand. On the fifth inst., a force was dispatched under Gen. Carel against them, and it is probable that a decisive collision has by this time taken place. By many persons, previous to the death of Chomoud, it was presumed the revolution was nearly over, and that quiet would soon be restored. Communication is now open between Granada and the Port of San Juan. The time of the transit is entirely in possession of the Government. Exportation and importation have been resumed. There is a probability of the Custom House being established at Castillo Rapids, instead of at San Juan, as heretofore. Such is the prevailing rumor.

At Sonora, on Sunday, the 4th inst., the depositors in the house of Adams & Co., after consultation, decided to make a forcible entry into the vault containing the treasure, it having been for several days in charge of the sheriff. The mob proceeded to put their resolution into effect, obtained possession of the treasure, and appointed paying tellers, who have been paying it out as fast as the checks were presented. It is said that there is in this house something like eight thousand dollars more than enough to pay all depositors there. After this was done the mob went on a general spree.

LATER FROM HAVANA.

Execution of Estrampes.

The U. S. mail steamship Cahawba, R. W. Shufeldt, commander, arrived from New York via Havana at half-past 11 o'clock Wednesday morning, having been detained several hours by a dense fog after crossing the bar. A list of her passengers will be found in another column. The Cahawba left New York on the 20th ult., and Havana on the 1st inst.

Francisco Estrimpes was garroted at Havana on the morning of the 31st ult., in the presence of some fifteen thousand persons, under great excitement from sympathy created by the noble bearing and conduct of the young man.

Mr. J. R. Felix has been sentenced to ten years imprisonment at Ceuta in Africa. A number of other persons charged with treasonable offences against the Government, have also been tried, but their sentences were not made public. Several of these persons are now residing in the United States.

The Cahawba was at Havana on Palm Sunday, the day was generally observed as a grand feast day. Business would in a great measure be suspended during the present week.

The U. S. steamship Princeton, Capt. Engle, was still in the harbor. The Fulton, Capt. Mitchell, left Havana on Saturday for Norfolk.

From New York to Havana the Cahawba experienced very severe weather. Her passage across the Gulf had been very pleasant.

La Prensa, of the 1st inst., has an extended notice of the life and family of Francisco Estrampes, garoted on the previous day. He was but twenty-five years of age, and La Prensa speaks of him in the highest terms as a man of honor, education and high-toned feeling, attributing his tragic fate to the influence and advice of evil companions. The Diario de la Marina publishes a simple notice of his execution, stating that he confessed his guilt, and that his blood must rest upon the "perfidious instigators who had taken advantage of his youth and inexperience to lend him to his ruin."

The Diario de Matanzas publishes a letter from St. Domingo, which states that much indignation had been caused in that country by the publication in several foreign journals of the supposed cession to the United States of the important peninsula of Samana, and by comments in said journals upon the present condition and character of the population of the Republic. The official Gazette and Senor Tomas Bobadilla, Minister of Justice, had united their voices in rebuking this false report.

MUTINY ON THE HIGH SEAS.—The ship Revenue, Capt. Robinson, sailed from Liverpool on the 1st of February; on the same night the ship started a small leak; the next day, the crew came aft, and ordered the captain to put back on account of the leak. At night, on the 2d, they still persisted in having the ship put back; and, on the next day, at 7 o'clock, A. M., all hands, except two refused to do duty. On the 4th, they seized Capt Robinson, tied and confined him for 16 hours in the forecastle, and knocked down the chief mate with a belaying pin; some of the men immediately picked him up and carried him aft, he being perfectly senseless. On the 5th the men came aft and ordered the mate to take charge of the ship, and carry her into some port in the channel; they ordered the ship to be put about, and refused again to proceed on the voyage, when the ship lay drifting about the channel for six days. On the 10th, they told the captain to carry her into Cork; after taking charge, the captain called all hands aft, and kept the ship off W. S. W. The crew took charge of the ship the second time, and kept her for three hours, and then gave her up again to the captain, when all hands again refused to do duty. On the 12th a part of the crew turned to, and the ship proceeded on her voyage to St. Thomas, which port she arrived at on the 0th of March, and there shipped part of a crew to make up for those who refused to do duty, and sailed again. On the 13th she arrived off the bar at the Southwest Pass, and on the 31st eleven of the crew were put in irons; four of them, however, succeeded in getting their irons off last Sunday night, while she was coming up the river, and jumped overboard; the other seven were secured and carried to prison, on the arrival of the ship last night.

LAW DEPARTMENT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF LOUISIANA.—The degree of LL B. was conferred upon the following gentlemen, graduates of the Law Department of the University of Louisiana, yesterday. We understand the occasion was quite interesting, and regret that our vacations compelled us to be absent:

A. P. Avegno, Fountain P. Austin, James D. Augustin, A. B. Bacon, E. G. W. Butler, Thomas O. Benton, A. Broussard, John A. Hammond, Charles E. Kenner, H. L. Gibson, Benj. F. Jones, Eugene Janin, Albert N. Lewis, James M. Leggett, Joseph H. Maddox, O. Labauve, Samuel Myers, Julien Michel, Samuel B. Noble, Percy Roberts, Douglas J. Wilkins, John Yoist, J. A. Ventriss.

A bill has been reported in the California legislature to divide that State, by creating a new one, to be called the "State of Columbia," and to embrace all that part of the State south and inclusive of the counties of Santa Cruz, Santa Clara, Tuolumne and Calaveras. A portion of the present State debt is to be assumed by the new State on an equitable basis. Its introduction gave rise to a warm debate. One of the speakers advocated the creation of three or four new States, in order that the Pacific might have a greater influence in Congress. A motion was made to indefinitely postpone the whole matter, but at last accounts no vote had been taken.

GREAT LONGEVITY.—A correspondent of the Providence (R. I.) Journal says:

There are living in the south part of this State, all in good health, ten persons, the children of the same parents, and the only children they ever had, whose united ages amount to seven hundred and eleven, in the following order: 81, 80, 77, 75, 73, 70, 68, 60, 83 and 58. Their name is Tucker, and they belong to one of the most numerous families in our State. The family have for a great many years occupied a tract of land in the western part of South Kingstown, known as Tuckertown.

ANOTHER AMERICAN VESSEL FIRED INTO.—We find the following paragraph in the New York papers of the 27th:

The schooner Magyar of Belfast, Me., Capt. Littlefield, sailed from Kingston, Ja., on the 4th inst., and arrived here yesterday. Capt. L. reports that on the night of the 11th inst., while near Cape St. Antonio, he was fired into by a Spanish steamer. While heaving-to the steamer fired two more shots, then piped all hands, and after hailing the schooner steamed away.

Commodore Crabb, of the African Squadron, has written a letter from Norfolk stating that the Board of Officers that held the survey have pronounced the looped-war Jamestown perfectly sea worthy and fit for any service. She will sail as the flag-ship of the squadron in eight days.

DETAILS OF FOREIGN NEWS.

BY THE STEAMSHIP ATLANTIC.

We have already published very full telegraphic dispatches of the Atlantic's news, but the following account will be found unusually interesting:

Fighting before Sebastopol.

It is clear that on the 23d and 24th of February, there was some serious fighting before Sebastopol, but the French and Russian telegraphic accounts of the affair are evidently conflicting, and probably neither of them are correct. It can scarcely be doubted that Menschikoff's dispatch, dated St. Petersburg, March 6, and Admiral Bruat's dispatch, dated Kamiesch, Feb. 24, in the Month up of the 7th, are but different versions of one and the same story, although the dates do not precisely correspond. According to Menschikoff the Russians erected, "in the night of Feb 22 and 23d, a redoubt on the left bank of the Belbec, in front of Sebastopol, which redoubt was attacked by the enemy with a considerable force, in the night of Feb. 24th and 25th."

Admiral Bruat, speaks of some important works of counter approach having been effected by the Russians in the night of February 22 and 23, on the counterfort of the plateau, which runs down towards the small Careenling Bay; and says that these were attacked by the 24 corps on the night of the 24th and 25th." So far, there is no similarity in the description of the operations on either side as to prove to a moral certainty, notwithstanding the trifling discrepancy in dates, that the same facts are intended to be spoken of. But when we come to the result, the diversity is startling. The Russian commander says the French were repulsed by two regiments with a loss of six hundred men, while the French Admiral reports that the Russians works were taken with great eclat, and that the loss is said to be "about 1500 wounded. It may pretty safely be presumed that the loss was greater than it is said to be in the Moniteur dispatch, but we can scarcely doubt that the works were really taken.

Death of the Emperor of Russia.

Despatches dated March 2, officially announce the receipt of the death of the Emperor Nicholas. The event took place this morning at 42:10. Paralysis of the lungs was the immediate cause.

The Prussian official journal publishes the following dispatches, addressed to Berlin by Lieut. Col Count Munster, adjutant in the service of the King of Prussia:

ST. PETERSBURG, March 1, 1:25 A. M.—The state of the Emperor became much worse yesterday evening. The following is the medical bulletin: "Yesterday violent fever manifested itself, with inflammation of the lungs. The fever lasted the whole night and prevented sleep. The erections continue without obstacle. A slight attack of gout is observable." I must add that the debility of the august invalid has greatly increased, and that, at least in the opinion of the physicians, the state of his Majesty is most critical. I will forward another dispatch to-day, and beg of you to communicate the present to Duke George at Strelitz.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 1, 7:40 A. M.—The state of his Majesty has not changed in any respect this morning. I will send a third dispatch. His majesty, the Empress, has had some palpitations of the heart, but is otherwise well. I beg of you to send this intelligence to Schwerin, Strelitz and the Hague."

ST. PETERSBURG, March 1, 6:30 P. M.—The state of his majesty, the Emperor, grew sensibly worse during the day. The ejectments take place with difficulty, and give indications that the lungs also are touched. Atrophy of the lungs is feared. Dr. Carell is very much alarmed At the request of the physicians, the Grand Duke, their apparent, has requested the Emperor to receive the sacraments. The Empress is well. I will send another dispatch to-day.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 1, 10 P. M.—The Emperor has declined receiving the last sacraments at present. The ceremony is adjourned till to-morrow morning. The Emperor only sees the Empress and the Grand Duke, heir apparent. The Empress is aware of the danger, and begs me to inform his majesty the King thereof, and to communicate it also to her august relations, and to Strelitz.

ST. PETERSBURG, White Palace, March 2, 6 A. M.—The Emperor has calmly received the communication from Dr. Mandt, that atrophy of the lungs is possible. He simply observed—"When shall I be paralyzed?" The physicians could not give a precise answer. The Emperor then said to Dr Carell—"When shall I choke?" The Emperor has taken the last sacraments; he has taken leave of his wife and children, whom he has blessed separately, as also the grandchildren, in a firm voice, in full possession of his intellect, perfectly collected, with great presence of mind. The pulse is still strong, but much has already been administered. The Empress keeps up, and shows resignation."

The Journal des Debats says: "The Emperor Nicholas has not died suddenly; he had been ill for twelve days before. We have before us letters from St. Petersburg of the 19th ult., which state that the Emperor then kept his bed by order of his first physician, M. Mandt. The Empress was also ill and confined to her bed, and as the apartments occupied by the Emperor and Empress are situated one on the ground-floor and the other on the first floor of the palace, they had no direct communication and did not see each other. The Emperor, however, must have called the Empress to him, as we know, from telegraphic dispatch, that before his death he had assembled round him all the members of his family present at St. Petersburg, in order to give them his blessing.

Our correspondents attribute the illness of the Emperor to a cold. Notwithstanding the severity of the weather, he continued his usual occupations; he was desirous to see everything for himself, and in the most minute details; he visited the soldiers in their barracks; he passed long and frequent reviews, forgetting the precautions which his age required in such a climate and in such a severe season. To all the observations made to him by his children and by his most devoted servants, he replied that he had something else to do besides taking care of his health. He had, however, attended to it for more than a year past, and at times felt uneasiness.

He said that he had reached, and even exceeded, the number of years which Peter had allowed to others of his race, and that his end was not far distant. He had treated himself according to his own ideas; he had insisted on his physician putting him on a regimen which would prevent his getting corpulent, of which he had a singular dread. What change has taken place since the 19th of February?—It is said that congestion took place of apoplexy or of paralysis of the lungs. This was a thing which Dr. Mandt had not anticipated, for at that time he felt no uneasiness, the language was most satisfactory. The Emperor Nicholas was, moreover, subject to attacks of gout, and at the commencement of his illness he had felt some symptoms of it,

VIENNA, March 3.—The news of the death of the Emperor Nicholas, which was known here at 9 o'clock last night, has produced an immense sensation.

VIENNA, March 4.—The Archduke William has received from the new Emperor of Russia, goes to-day with an autograph letter from the Emperor of Austria to the Emperor Alexander. The Oesterreichische Correspondenz contains an article praising the high qualities of the late Emperor Nicholas, and expressing a confident hope that the Emperor Alexander will complete the work of peace begun by his father.

The Accession of the Emperor Alexander.

The Times has published the following telegraphic dispatch, dated Berlin, Saturday morning: "The Czarevitch Alexander assumed the government at St. Petersburg yesterday afternoon, and received homage as Emperor."

The Morning Chronicle has published the following telegraphic intelligence, dated St. Petersburg, March 3: "The Emperor expired yesterday at 10 o'clock. Alexander was proclaimed Emperor the same day. He received homage to-day."

The Journal des Debats says: The new sovereign of Russia was initiated at an early age into the affairs of the empire by the Emperor, his father; he was present at all the councils; he was invested with situations which gave him frequent opportunities of rendering himself useful to the army, and pleasing to the youth of the schools. Whenever the Emperor Nicholas quitted the capital he left the supreme direction to the government of his son, and, in short, he had taken the utmost pains to prepare him to become his successor.

The Grand Duke Alexander, the heir to the crown, is very popular in Russia; he is beloved and esteemed by the people. He will not exercise the great authority of his father, for he does not inherit either his hauteur or his inflexibility. He will rather please, as the Emperor Alexander I. did, by his mildness and affability, and between the uncle and the nephew there is a very great similarity of character in numerous ways. The new Empress is also highly spoken of, and her cultivated judgment and her conciliating manners are much extolled. It is thought that she will exercise a salutary influence over the Emperor. Public opinion in Russia attributes to the hereditary Grand Duke a policy different from that of the Emperor, and particularly a more pacific one.

Manifesto of the New Emperor.

A dispatch from Konigsberg, dated the 7th inst., gives the following summary of the manifesto of the new Emperor of Russia:

The manifesto of Alexander II. has arrived. After announcing the sudden and severe illness of the Emperor Nicholas, which terminated in his death, it says that, as the deceased devoted himself incessantly for the welfare of his subjects, so do we also, on ascending the throne of Russia and of Poland and Finland, inseparable from it, take a solemn oath before God to regard the welfare of our empire as our only object. May Providence, which has subjected to us a nation calling for our guide and protector, that we may maintain Russia on the highest standard of power and glory, and our person accomplish the incessant wishes and views of Peter, of Catherine, of Alexander, and of our father. May the zeal of our subjects assist us therein. We invoke and command the oath of allegiance to us and to the heir to the throne, our son Nicholas Alexandrowitsch."

The Conference at Boulogne.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says: "Immediately after the death of the Emperor Nicholas, the Austrian and Prussian Ambassadors in Paris and London, being instructed by telegraph, represented that the situation being now so completely changed, it was highly desirable not to press on the war, but to give the new Emperor of Russia time to establish himself firmly on the throne, and to encourage by conciliatory conduct the development of his presumed pacesible inclinations. I cannot say whether or not an armistice was in terms asked for, but this much is not doubtful, that the German powers recommend that the status quo should be preserved as nearly as possible, and deprecate any assault upon Sebastopol until the Emperor Alexander shall have had an opportunity of negotiating. Very pressing representations in this spirit were made repeatedly on Saturday morning, both in Paris and London."

England Getting Uneasy.

The Liverpool Times, of the 10th, referring to the report that Louis Napoleon had said if the investigation in the English Parliament is continued, the French army will not act in concert with the English army, says:

But although we have expressed our disbelief that the French Emperor can have held the language of menace or intimidation to the British Government which the morning paper referred to imputes to him, what will be the feelings of our countrymen when it is discovered that he has actually done so—and that he may be found, moreover, the strongest opponent of peace arising out of the forthcoming Conference at Vienna!

Since the announcement of the hostilities with Russia, in which we are now engaged, Louis Napoleon has become unquestionably popular in England. The tone of the English press towards him has undergone a marked change, and newspapers which at one time painted him the incarnation of all that is vile and dishonorable, now lavish on him the most fulsome eulogies. If he was so black a couple of years since, the interval cannot have so essentially changed his character and his policy. Either we formed a very ungenerous estimate of him then, or we are doing him more than justice now. We ought not to overlook his antecedents, or the means by which he reached the throne; and as we have no clue to the future except through the medium of the past, it is just possible that we are reaching that turning point in the French alliance which will reveal the character of the Emperor in its true colors. We can state confidently that serious fears are entertained in very high quarters that the attractions to peace will proceed less from Russia than from France—that a parade at the present moment, even on the most honorable terms, and with undoubted sacrifices for the future, is not what Louis Napoleon really desires—that he feels he can find all things for the achievement of these brilliant objects which will consolidate his dynasty and rival the military fame of his uncle—and that he expects England to aid him in those wild Napoleonic schemes. If these suspicions are realized—and we know that they are entertained by persons who have access to the very best sources of information—we shall find the French alliance a very troublesome affair, which will either drag us further than we are inclined to go, or leave us in very ill-advised case with a power whose co-operation in this Russian war was hailed with enthusiasm by the people of this empire."

Spain.

MADRID, March 8.—A battalion of marines left Cadiz for Cuba, 5000 men will leave in May. The army of Havana will be augmented to 30,000 men.

The Madrid Gazette of the 27th ult., contains a royal decree, authorizing the establishment in the cities of Cuba of a bank of issue and discount, with a capital of 3,000,000 piasters. (The piaster is about 5 francs.) In 6,000 shares. The authorization is to be for twenty-five years, and may be renewed.

The Cortes voted the religious basis of the new consolidation on the 28th ult. It is as follows: The nation binds itself to maintain and protect the worship and ministers of the Catholic religion, which Spaniards profess, but no Spaniard or foreigner shall be persecuted for his opinions or belief, so long as he does not manifest them by public acts contrary to religion.

Belgium.

The Ministerial crisis in Belgium continues. M. Dedeyne had an audience of the King on Monday, which lasted an hour and a half. The Hon President of the Chamber of Representatives declined. It is said, in the most absolute manner, the line of conduct of leaving a Ministry and expressed his regret at the retirement of M. de Brouckere and his colleagues.

And her member of the Liberal section of the Chamber has been sent for by the King.

Holland.

ROTTERDAM, Feb 27.—A private letter from St. Thomas, dated 30th of January, addressed to a commercial house in this city states that the Island of Aves, which belongs to Holland, had been taken possession of by a party of Americans, and that the Dutch Government steamer, the Lynx, had been dispatched from St. Thomas, in order to compel them to evacuate the Island. The same papers that communicate this intelligence to the Dutch public contain a highly colored description of a ball given by Mr. Belmont, the American Minister, at the royal palace, and three hundred of the elite of the aristocracy in the Hague.

Austria.

VIENNA, March 5.—The Archduke William left yesterday with an autograph letter from his Majesty to the Emperor Alexander.

VIENNA, Monday evening.—Her Majesty the Empress of Austria, was safely delivered of a daughter at 4 o'clock this afternoon. A general amnesty for political offences is decreed on the occasion of the accouchement of the Empress.

Prussia.

A letter from Berlin, of the 5th, in the Post Gazette of Frankfort, says: The Emperor Alexander II. has written to the King of Prussia a letter to announce his accession to the throne, and to beg of him to continue with Russia the relations which existed between the two countries in the time of his father. The Dowager Empress has also written a letter to her brother, the King. In the dispatch which arrived here on Friday, and which announced the death of the Emperor, were the words pronounced by his majesty in French, thanking our King for his friendship and fidelity, and entreating him to persist in the same sentiments.

They began with "to tell my brother-Fritz," but these words were omitted from the official publication, from motives of propriety. One of the most moving scenes which has occurred here in connection with the death of the Emperor Nicholas, has been the celebration of the service for the dead, according to the Greek rites, in the chapel of the Russian Embassy.

The Grand Duchess Olga, dressed in the deepest mourning, was present, as was also her husband, the Crown Prince of Wurtemburg, the King of Prussia, and all the Princes and Princesses of the royal family. When the liturgy was terminated and the prayer offered up for the blessings of Heaven on the deceased, the priests extinguished the wax candles, and the Duchess Olga also extinguished the candles which, according to the rites of her church, she had held in her hand. As she did so, the Duchess, who had previously been deadly pale, threw herself into the arms of the Queen and sobbed aloud.

Russia.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 7.—The rapid decomposition of the body of the Emperor Nicholas has prevented the exhibition of the body to the public.

Intelligence has reached Paris from St. Petersburg which creates the greatest sensation in matters of great excitement. The nobles had met secretly, with a view of addressing the Emperor on the subject of carrying the serfs. They proposed pointing out to Alexander the ruin which would accompany such a step, and the internal dangers that might follow.

It was expected that St. Petersburg would be placed in a state of siege. The war party already began to threaten. The Emperor is reported to have declared his intention to follow out the policy laid down by Nicholas at the Congress of Vienna. Prince Hortschakoff's instructions have been confirmed. General Paskiewitch is opposed to the arming of the serfs, and has addressed the Emperor on the subject. The greatest confusion appears to prevail at St. Petersburg.

Later from Texas.

The steamship Chas. Morgan, Capt. Lawless, arrived Tuesday afternoon from Galveston, bringing dates to Saturday, the 31st ult.

The News has the following in relation to the weather and the effects of the drouth:

We have had a continuation of dry, cold and very disagreeable weather, generally throughout the month of March. The whole country, from as far as we can hear, has suffered and is still suffering from a protracted drouth. A gentleman who came passenger by the Houston steamer last night, and who is one among the oldest planters in Texas, informs us that he has never before known as late a spring, and he has been a planter on the Brazos for twenty years; and he says other planters, who have been in the country much longer than he has, also assert that so late a spring has never been known for thirty years past. Both corn and cotton have had to be replanted, on account of the bad stand from the first planting. In many instances planters have plowed up their ground entirely and replanted their entire crop. But the drouth continues, and there is now scarcely moisture enough to sprout the seed. The prospect is, indeed, discouraging. Never before have the rivers of Texas been known to be so low as now, at this season of the year. There was a time during the whole of last year, when they were as low as at this time. There was a little rain in Washington a week since, but it was light, and did very little good.

The continued cold weather has prevented the snow and ice in the mountains, farther to the North, from melting, and hence there is no water to supply our rivers at their sources, where alone we can look for a permanent rise.

A planter from the Brazos informs us that a young lady from above Vegas, in Burleson county, known to be a spirit medium, died about six weeks ago; and, while under death-bed, she announced that this year is going to be the most disastrous season ever known in Texas. It is reported that she predicted a severe drouth, and went into details with great particularity; also counseling those around her as to the measures they should take to protect themselves from the general calamity. Her predictions have been so far verified, that we understand they are producing a deep impression on the public mind in that vicinity, even among some who are least credulous.

Louisiana Items.

There has not been so gloomy a prospect for the sugar planters of this country as the present since the culture of cane to any considerable extent was begun. From almost every plantation we hear complaints. A small amount of seed cane was in the first place put up and much of it was thin injury it must have been planting, one half at least was rejected—in some places the whole. An unusually small amount of stubble cane remains, which in many places seems to be much injured; and of the plant-cane, none of it has yet appeared above the ground; there being scarcely moisture enough in the earth to make it sprout.

Under these circumstances it is not an unsafe calculation to say that the sugar crop of this Parish can not, under the most favorable circumstances of weather and season, reach another year within thirty-three per cent. of the crop of the past, and that shows at least twenty five per cent. of a falling off from the crop of 1853. Touching the cotton and corn crops, a large pitch has been made, and with a favorable season, a far better yield may be anticipated than the last year. The cold weather and the drouth render the prospect gloomy at present, yet there is a sufficiency of time to make as good crops as if that which was cut down by the frost of last week had been left standing.

We learn that the cold and backward spring; together with the long continued drouth, is telling fearfully upon the vacherie interests of this and the parish of Calcasieu. Within the last six weeks thousands of cattle have died from hunger and thirst. The cold and the drouth of the winter destroyed every particle of grass upon our prairies, and that being the subsistence of our cattle mostly, they become, as a matter of course, very poor. Recently the ponds in the prairies have all dried up, forcing the cattle to resort to the sloughs and bayous for water. Going into lillage, many bog and mire, and not having strength enough to extricate themselves, there perish. In this way and from extreme poverty, hundreds are dying daily.

We have the pleasure of reporting a rise in the Courtableau, being back water from the Mississippi, sufficient to allow the largest of our steamers to reach Washington. We may, therefore, expect much activity in business at that point, and heavy shipments of produce, which has accumulated there to an extent before unknown.

The Pointe Coupee Echo, of the same date, speaking of drouth, says:

There is no vegetation visible yet in our fields, the trees are still leafless, and the cattle which, in ordinary seasons, are at this advanced period of the year usually, in this parish, up to the knee in herbage, now roam about picking up a scanty sustenance merely sufficient to support life. Most of the planters who have put cane in the ground, will have to plow it up, and wait until the present ungenial influences are past. It is impossible, at the present moment, to pronounce positively on the sugar cane that has been planted. Sufficient, however, is already evident to prove that but a crop is the maximum that can be produced under the most favorable circumstances.

We learn from the same paper that Chapin, accused of the murder of Mr. J. Vaughan, has been found guilty of manslaughter.

THE ENGLISH PACIFIC MAIL COMPANY.—A letter from Valparaiso, dated Feb. 14, says:

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

A THRILLING NARRATIVE.

James Morgan was a native of Maryland, married at an early age, and soon after settled near Bryant's Station, in the wilds of Kentucky. Like most pioneers of the West, he had cut down the cane, built a cabin, deadened the timber, fenced a field with a worm fence, and planted some corn. It was on the 17th of August, 1782. The sun had descended; a pleasant breeze was playing through the surrounding wood; the cane bowed under its influence, and the broad leaves of corn waved in the air.

Morgan had seated himself in the door of his cabin, with his infant on his knee. His young and happy wife had laid aside the spinning-wheel, and was busily engaged in preparing the frugal meal. That afternoon he accidentally found a bundle of letters which he had finished reading to his wife before he had taken his seat in the door. It was a correspondence in which they had acknowledged an early and ardent attachment to each other, and the perusal left evident traces of joy in the faces of both; the little infant, too, seemed to partake of its kind parents' feelings, by cheerful smiles, playful humor and infantile caresses.

While thus agreeably employed, the report of a rifle was heard; another followed in quick succession. Morgan sprang to his feet, his wife ran to the door, and they simultaneously exclaimed: "Indians!" The door was instantly barred, and the next instant their fears were realized by a bold and spirited attack of a small party of Indians.

The cabin could not be effectually defended, and time was precious. Morgan, cool, brave, and prompt, soon decided. While he was in the act of concealing her under the floor, a mother's feelings overcame her; she arose, seized the infant—was afraid that its cries would betray its place of concealment. She hesitated, gazed wildly upon it; a momentary struggle between life and affection took place. She once more clasped her babe to her bosom, and again kissed the infant. [illegible] threw its arms around her neck and wept aloud. "In the name of Heaven, Eliza, release the child, or be lost!" said the distracted husband, in a soft, imploring tone, as he forced the infant from his wife, hastily took up his gun, knife and hatchet, ran up the ladder that led to the chamber, and drew it after him. In a moment the door was burst open, and the savages entered.

By this time Morgan had secured his child in a bag and lashed it to his back, and then throwing off some clapboards from the cabin roof, he resolutely leaped to the ground. He was assailed by two Indians. As the first approached he knocked him down with the butt end of his gun. The other advanced with uplifted tomahawk; Morgan let fall his gun, and closed in.

The savage made a blow, missed, but severed the cord that bound the infant to his back, and it fell. The contest over the child now became warm and fierce, and was carried on with knives [illegible]. The robust and athletic Morgan at length [illegible] secondary; both were badly cut, and bled freely, but the stabs of the white man were deeper and deeper, and the savage fell to the earth. Morgan hastily took up the child and hurried off.

The Indians in the house, busily engaged in drinking and plundering, were not apprised of the contest in the yard until the one that had been knocked down gave signs of returning life, and called them to the scene of action. Morgan was discovered, immediately pursued, and a dog put upon his trail. Operated upon by all the feelings of a husband and a father, he moved with all the speed of a hunted stag, and soon outstripped the Indians, but the dog kept in close pursuit. Finding it impossible to outrun or elude the cunning animal, trained to hunts of this kind, he halted and waited till it came within a few yards of him, fired and brought him to the ground.

In a short time he reached the house of his brother, who resided near Bryant's Station, at Lexington, where he left the child, and the brother took upon his view; his steps quickened, his fears increased; and the most agonizing apprehensions crowded upon his mind. Emerging from the cane-brake, he beheld his house in flames, and almost burnt to the ground. "My wife!" he exclaimed, as he pressed one hand to his forehead, and grasped the fence with the other to support his tottering frame. He gazed on the ruin and desolation before him, advanced a few paces and fell exhausted to the earth.

Morning came, and the luminary of Heaven arose and still found him seated near the expiring embers. In his right hand he held a small stick, with which he was tracing the name of "Eliza" on the ground, and his left hand lay on his favorite dog by his side; looking first on the ruin and then on his dog, with evident signs of grief, Morgan arose. The two brothers now made search, and found some bones burned to ashes, which they gathered and silently confined to the mother earth, beneath the high spreading branches of a venerable oak consecrated by the purest and holiest recollections.

Several days after this, Morgan was engaged in a desperate battle at the Lower Blue Licks. The Indians came off victoriously, and the surviving whites retreated across the Licking, pursued by the enemy for a distance of six and thirty miles. James Morgan was among the last who crossed the river, and was in the rear until the hill was descended. As he beheld the Indians reappear on the ridge, he felt and saw his wrongs, and recollected the lovely object of his affections. He urged his horse and pressed to the front. While in the act of leaping from his saddle, he received a rifle ball in his thigh, and fell; the Indian sprang upon him, seized him by the hair, and applied the scalping-knife.

At this moment Morgan looked up and recognized the handkerchief that bound the head of the savage, and knew it to his wife's. This added renewed strength to his body, and increased his activity to fury. He quickly threw his left arm around the Indian, and, with a death-like grasp, hugged him to his bosom, plunged his knife into his side, and he expired in his arms. Disengaging himself from the savage, Morgan [illegible] under a small oak, on an elevated piece of ground, a short distance from him; the scene of action [illegible], and he remained undiscovered and unscalped, an anxious spectator of the battle.

It was now midnight. The savage band had, after taking all the scalps they could find, left the battle-ground. Morgan was seated at the foot of the oak, its trunk supporting his head. The ragged and uneven ground that surrounded him was covered with the slain, the once white and projecting rocks, bleached by the sun and rain for centuries, were crimsoned with blood that had warmed the heart and animated the bosom of the soldier.

The pale glimmering of the moon occasionally threw a faint light upon the mangled bodies of the dead; then a passing cloud enveloped all in darkness, and gave additional terror to the feeble cries of a few still lingering in the last agonies of protracted death, rendered doubly appalling by the hoarse growl of the bear, the loud howl of the wolf, and the shrill and varied notes of the wild-cat and the panther, feeding on the dead and dying. Morgan beheld the scene with heart-rending sensations, and looked forward with the apathy of despair on his own end.

A large ferocious looking bear, covered all over with blood, now approached him; he threw himself on the ground, and silently commended his soul to Heaven, and, in breathless anxiety, awaited his fate. The satiated animal slowly passed without [illegible] him. Morgan raised his head, and was [illegible] to offer his thanks for his unexpected [illegible]; when the cry of a pack of wolves [illegible] upon him, and awakened him to [illegible] danger. He placed his hands over [illegible] all on his face, and in silent agony [illegible] fate.

[illegible] rustling in the bushes; steps [illegible] chill ran over him. Imagination, [illegible] busy imagination, was actively employed; [illegible] the most horrible awaited him, his limbs would in all probability be torn from him, and he devoured alive. He felt a touch; the vital spark was almost extinguished. Another touch, more violent than the first, and he was turned over. The cold sweat ran down in torrents; his hands were violently forced from his face. The moon passed from under a cloud; a faint ray beamed upon him, his eyes involuntarily opened, and he beheld his wife, who, in a scarcely audible voice, exclaimed: "My husband! my husband!" and fell upon his bosom.

Morgan now learned from his wife that after the Indians entered the house they found some spirits, of which they drank freely. An altercation soon took place; one of them received a mortal stab and fell; the blood ran through the floor on her. Believing it to be the blood of her husband, she shrieked aloud, and thus betrayed the place of her concealment. She was instantly taken and bound. The party, after setting fire to the house, proceeded to Bryant's Station.

On the day of the battle of the Blue Licks, a horse with a saddle and bridle rushed by her, which she knew to be her husband's. During the action the prisoners were left unguarded under their escape and lay concealed beneath some bushes near the bank of the river. After the Indians had returned from the pursuit, and left the battle-ground, she, with some other persons who escaped with her, determined to make search for their friends, and if on the field, and living, to save them if possible from the beasts of prey. After searching for some time, and almost despairing of success, she fortunately discovered him.

The party of Col. Logan found Morgan and his wife, and restored them to their friends, their infant and their home.

RATTLESNAKES.—We wonder what wise man and profound Herpetologist wrote the paper on "Rattlesnakes" in the March number of Harper's Magazine. He informs his readers, in these words, as to the reproduction of the venomous rattler:

"In the warm climates the rattlesnake trusts to the heat of the atmosphere for the development of its young in the egg, although it would seem, that, in extreme northern climates, the production of the egg is followed by the instant appearance of the young breaking from the membranous shell."

We shall expect, in a future number of this reliable magazine, in a learned article upon "The Buffalo," something like this: "The Buffalo, or, as he is called by the Indians, the Bisoe, is a native of the Arctic regions, though occasionally found in the State of Bangor, Cincinnati and Salt Lake, where he is trapped for his feathers, which are excessively used in the manufacture of mattresses. His flesh resembles that of the pig, but is only eaten by the Indians and Mormons—a race of beings supposed to be descend from Solomon. The Buffalo spawns in January, at which period the females climb the highest accessible icebergs, and leave their roe in the crevices of the ice, where subsequent frosts burst the thin shell, and the young are liberated."

Or, such a description as this, of the Viverra Mephitis: "This is a small and exceedingly beautiful animal, found in the wilds of some portions of America, and frequently kept as a pet by the ladies and children of those regions. It is lively, amiable and affectionate, and when playful, emits a mild and most agreeable odor, for which it is highly prized. It lays three eggs, but often abandons its nest, which is then occupied by Dame Partlett, who frequently may be seen clucking at the head of a mixed brood of chickens and their foster-brothers and sisters, the young Viverrae." This would be illustrated—as Harper places great stress upon the elegance and accuracy of his pictures—by an engraving of a solemn old hen, a sort of Mrs. Cass of the poultry-yard, suckling a family of chicks and polecats in amiable fraternity!

Seriously, is it not a shame, that a magazine with the circulation and influence of that mentioned, should put forth as truth the statement that rattlesnakes lay eggs! The crotalus is a viviparous animal, and don't lay eggs any more than Mayor Harper, or the Reverend Napoleon Abbott. Buffalo Democracy.

A GREEK BEAUTY.—An officer, who was wounded at Inkermann, having gone to a Greek village for health, writes thus of a Greek disconsolate family:

"I tried to console them with the idea of meeting their friends; but they were entirely overcome with the thought of leaving their homes in the hands of strangers, and having to seek others, where they knew not, for they were poor, and the poor make no new friends. One young girl, the youngest of four sisters, of whom three were married to soldiers in the Russian army, was the only one who tried to keep up the spirits of the rest. The whole family wore very beautiful, but she was of the transcendent beauty which one rarely sees, except in statuee or paintings. She led an old creature, past ninety, almost imbecile, who followed from instinct, as it were, and walked along, trying to sing some of the songs of her country to cheer up the rest. Poor girl! had I belonged to any profession other than my own, my dear ——, I would have had a wife beautiful as the first flowers of spring, with eyes like a gazelle, and a face and a figure resembling that of a Hero or Helen of old. I pressed what coin I had into her hand as I put her into the boat, so that she and her sistere at least might not want for bread on landing, and rode back to my tent well contented with what I had done, and I knew the good God who takee care of little fishes will not forget it, and will give me a lift in rough places when I may require it, as the saying is in India.

A HORRIBLE PICTURE.—The Dublin Nation contains a horrifying account of the condition of Ireland, from the pen of Mr. Duffy. He says:

No words printed in a newspaper or elsewhere will give any man who has not seen it a conception of the fallen condition of the West and the South. The famine and the landlorde have totally created a new race in Ireland. I have seen on the streets of Galway crowds of creatures more debased than the Yahoos of Swift; creatures having only a distant and hideous resemblance to human beings. Gray-haired old men, whose idiot faces had hardened into a settled leer of mendicancy, simious and semi-human, and women filthier and more frightful than the harpies, who, at the jingle of a coin on the pavement, swarmed in myriads from unseen places, struggling, screaming, shrieking for their prey, like some monstrous unclean animals. In Westport, the sight of a priest on the street gathered an entire pauper population, thick as a village market, swarming around him for relief. Beggar children, beggar adults, beggars in white hair; girls with faces gray and shriveled, the grave stamped upon them in a degree which could not be recalled; women with the more touching and tragical aspect of lingering shame and self-respect not yet affected; and among these terrible realities, impostures shaking in pretended fits, to add the last touch of horrible grotesqueness to the picture! I have seen these accursed sights, and they are burned into my memory forever. Away from the town, other scenes of unimaginable horror disclose themselves. The traveler meets groups, and even troops, of wild, idle, lunatic-looking paupers wandering over the country, each with some tale of extermination to tell. If he penetrate into a cabin, and can distinguish objects among filth and darkness, of which an ordinary pig-sty affords but a faint image, he will probably discover from a dozen to twenty inmates in the hut—the ejected cottiers—clustering together, and breeding a pestilence. What kind of creature men and women become, living in this dung-heap, what kind of children are reared here to grow up into a generation, I have no words to paint.

MAIL ROUTE BETWEEN ST. LOUIS AND SAN FRANCISCO.—Col. Benton writes to the St. Louis Democrat that he procured the insertion of a clause in the general post road bill, for a direct route between St. Louis and San Francisco, by the mouth of the Huerfano and the Little Salt Lake to Stockton, on the San Joaquin River, in the Valley of San Joaquin, where it will connect with the permanent steamboat navigation of the Bay of San Francisco, and also of the Sacramento River, and where it will also connect with the telegraphic system, and the whole post road system of California. This new mail route will absorb several routes which are independent now, and supply their places by short cross routes. Thus the Santa Fe mail can branch off at some point on the Upper Arkansas. The Great Salt Lake mail can branch from Little Salt Lake, only 260 miles over a level country, and a well-made Mormon road, now in use, and the present mail to Los Angelos and Southern California can branch off at Las Vegas de Santa Clara. Col. Benton says in his letter that he also procured the passage, in another bill, of an amendment granting preemption in stations to all the mail contractors in the territories through which his mail road would pass, and this he regards as a most important provision, for its effect will be to enable the mail route to go into operation and be carried on; it will make a chain of stations across the continent, which will quickly become a line of settlements; and what is equally essential, it legally recognizes the existence of the central route to the Pacific, and virtually establishes it for the railway.

A young married lady, named Girard, committed suicide in New York on the 29th ult., by cutting her throat with a razor. It was said she was insane at the time.

FURTHER CALIFORNIA ITEMS.

BY THE DANIEL WEBSTER.

The dates from San Francisco are to the 9th inst. We clip the following items from a file of the Herald up to that date:

MEETING OF DEPOSITORS OF WELLS'S CALIFORNIA.—The depositors of the Miners' Savings Bank, to the number of one hundred, assembled in the Recorder's court-room yesterday afternoon, for the purpose of devising a plan for immediate relief. The meeting was organized by calling to the chair Mr. R. Hendrie. After considerable discussion, it was agreed to submit a proposition to Mr Wright, permitting him to resume business, on condition that he agree to pay 25 per cent of deposites at the expiration of every succeeding two months, until the whole is paid; provided, also, that he will furnish paper security for the faithful performance of said agreement. Messrs Hendrie, Major Gardiner and W. Green were appointed a committee to carry out the object of the meeting, with instructions to report on Saturday next, at 4 o'clock P. M.

FIGHT WITH THE KLAMATH INDIANS.—A correspondent of the Yreka Herald, writing from Bestville, on Klamath river, under date of Feb 19, says:

I hasten to contradict the rumor circulated in and about Yreka, to the effect that Capt Best, John Chapman and —— Woodward, had been shot by the Indians. The report is entirely without foundation. Nothing of the kind has happened, as I have just been informed by a gentleman from Orleans Bar. He reports that on last Monday a battle was fought with the Indians, in which thirty-three volunteers were engaged with vastly superior numbers of Indians. Thirty-three Indians were killed and twelve wounded. No damage was done the other side, with the exception of the man wounded. John Hughes was shot through the arm with a rifle ball, but it was only a flesh wound.

The election for city officers took place at Marysville on the 5th inst. There were in all 1089 votes cast for Mayor. Majority for Gen Allen, independent, over Fowler, Union, 466; majority for Anderson, independent, over Ripley, Union, for Marshal, 488. All the Independent Aldermen were elected by large majorities.

NOTICE TO QUIT.—A dispatch from Sonora, in the San Joaquin Republican, says: A committee appointed to investigate the affairs of Richardson, Page, Bacon & Co's and Wells, Fargo & Co's agent, at Jamestown, concluded, after a thorough investigation of his papers, books, etc., to give him a polite invitation to leave town within twenty-four hours. Mr. Richardson asserts that he spent the money, and produced vouchers in proof.

An exciting riot had occurred at San Francisco among the seamen, they having struck for higher wages. Several vessels were cut, a-trift and other lawless acts committed, but the rioters were finally arrested, and quiet was restored by the exertions of the City Marshal and police force.

The trial of John Blake, for the murder of Lyman Newry, was concluded at San Francisco on the 8th, and resulted in the conviction of the accused.

It is said that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company intend setting their old boats, the California, Oregon, etc., to carrying freight from the Panama Railroad to San Francisco. The new boats to carry mails and passengers. There is to be a great reduction of fare also in a short time.

A lump of gold weighing sixteen pounds, is now on exhibition in Rhodes & Co.'s office, in Yreka. It was taken out of a claim on Scott's Bar.

A murder was perpetrated at the mouth of Middle Creek, on the night of February 28th, by Jeptha March, from Missouri, had a dispute with Hamilton Timmons, during the day, about some liquor. The difficulty, however, was adjusted over "drinks," and the parties retired to their respective cabins. The same evening, after dark, while Timmons was eating supper with his partners, March came in, spoke to all of them with a smile on his countenance, and then shot Timmons through the heart.

While Messrs. Rusk & Co were mining at the head of Humbug Gulch, says the Yreka Herald, they took out a live toad at the depth of twenty-five feet from the surface, imbedded in solid clay. His toadship, after basking in the sun for about an hour, opened his eyes, and notwithstanding "walked off."

From Korn River.

Mr. Stelle, of Stelle's Express, has furnished the editor of the Mariposa Chronicle with a couple of letters, received by him from a gentleman at the Korn river mines, from which the following extracts are given:

I have visited most of the different mining localities in California, and from my experience since I have been in this place, I regard the diggings in the many gulches emptying into Korn river, superior to any that I have seen in the State. The success and smiling faces of the miners remind me of the good old days of 1850.

Worland's Store, which is the grand rendezvous, is situated on Worland's Flat, near the head of Greenhorn Gulch. A good road to this place can be had—cutting off some twenty miles—by passing up Deer creek and by Lhuin's ranch.

The diggings here resemble those in the vicinity of Sherlock's, Agua Frio and Mariposa. Reports are coming in hourly of more discoveries extending along the north fork of Korn river. Water can be had in many of the gulches, and if we are blessed with a good rain, more gold will be taken out here than ever was in any part of California.

Two weeks ago, at Worland's store—on Sunday—I saw more gold dust exhibited than I had ever before witnessed in any trading-post in the State, and there is the same disregard of economy that prevailed in 1849-'50.

Crowds are coming in daily, and the Flat begins to resemble a town or village. I would advise you to establish an office there at once.

A Mr. J. M. Brown, writing to the San Joaquin Republican, says: "I found on my arrival at Greenhorn Gulch, where the first discovery was made, all the miners were very busy at work on their claims, which were paying very well, ranging from eight to fifty dollars per day. Claims could not be bought, unless at very extravagant prices. The day of my arrival one party of two, at the head of the gulch, took out fifty dollars; but as they had been making from two to three ounces daily since they commenced working their claim, to them it was but a common occurrence. Another party, lower down, on the same day, made an ounce to the man; and a party at the mouth of the gulch, consisting of four men, took out one hundred dollars. The entire gulch is already taken up, and by a few men only, each one being allowed two hundred feet. New comers go about fifteen miles higher up, where they are making from eight to sixteen dollars per day. It is reported at the gulch, and firmly believed, that a party of five or six shot forty miles higher up, in the mountains have been making one hundred dollars a day to the man, for the last month; and the very day of my arrival, a company went out to look them up, as they had not disclosed their whereabouts.

From the Sandwich Islands.

The San Francisco papers have advices from Honolulu to the 9th of Feb. A grand review was held on the 9th in honor of the king's birthday. About 500 troops were mustered. Some ten thousand persons were present. There was a soiree in the evening. Several changes have been made in the Government officers. The American bark, What Cheer, arrived on the 5th of February, from Hong Kong, with one hundred and eighty-three Coolies, who are to be employed as laborers on the islands.

The King had issued a proclamation of neutrality in the war now impending between the Allies and Russia. He had also issued another proclamation, as follows:

Whereas, it has come to my knowledge from the highest official sources, that my Government has been recently threatened with overthrow by lawless violence; and whereas, the representatives at my Court of the United States, Great Britain and France, being cognizant of these threats, have offered me the prompt assistance of the naval forces of their respective countries, I hereby publicly proclaim my acceptance of the aid thus proffered in support of my sovereignty. My independence is more firmly established than ever before. KAMEHAMEHA.

From Oregon.

The Oregonian learns from General Palmer, Superintendent of Indian Affairs in Oregon, that a convention and arrangement for the extinguishment of Indian title to all the lands in the Willamette Valley has been entered into. The Oregonian says:

The country embraced in this treaty is over seven and a half millions of acres. The cost to the Government will probably be about three cents per acre.

The treaty secures to the Indians the right to occupy such tracts as may be designated by the Superintendent, within the limits of the country purchased, until such time as a permanent home be selected, and the proper improvements made thereon, when they agree peaceably to vacate the ceded country and remove to their new home, without any additional cost to the Government other than is provided for by this treaty.

The Whigs and Democrats will hold conventions in April—the latter on the 10th, and the former on the 18th—to nominate candidates for delegates to Congress.

DEATH OF COL. ALEXANDER K. MCCLUNG.—Our community has rarely ever sustained a greater shock than when on Saturday last it became known that Col Alexander K. McClung had come to his death by his own hands, at his lodgings at the Eagle Hotel. The weapon used was a pistol—the ball entering behind the right ear. Its report was indistinctly heard by some of the inmates of the house, but it did not awaken suspicion of a serious occurrence. Some half hour afterwards a servant had occasion to visit his room, when life was found to be extinct. Those with whom the deceased had conversed during the day had received from him no intimation of his intention, and all he leave behind him any explanation of the some which prompted the melancholy act.

The deceased was about forty-one or two years of age. When a lad he enlisted in the Navy and soon won admiration by his high spirit and lofty bearing. Leaving its pursuit before he had attained to years of manhood, he studied law in his native State of Kentucky, and when he had obtained license to practice he took up his abode in Mississippi, where he has ever since resided, except when absent on public duty. We will not attempt a sketch of the incidents and episodes of his life. His talents were of the highest order. His genius was great and original. To a rich and vivid imagination, sparkling with withering satire, and a cultivated taste, he added a logical and intensely severe precision of thought. There was nothing commonplace in anything which emanated from his brain. Whether as a writer or an extemporaneous speaker, the same pre-eminence marked his productions. But the profession of arms best suited him. He was a soldier by nature. In 1846, when the war with Mexico broke out he was among the first to tender his services, at the head of the "Yazoo light volunteers." From the captaincy of his company he was elevated by the 1st regiment to the second in its command. At the storming of Monterey, while gallantly leading his column, he was severely wounded.

In the political canvass of 1845, he was an elector for the State at large on the Whig ticket, and distinguished himself as an able and popular debater. On the election of Gen. Taylor he was appointed U. S. Charge to Bolivia, but resigned the office after a service of two years. Since that time he has resided principally in this city. His last and greatest studied production—one which has wedded his name to immortality more than any other of his literary efforts—was his splendid eulogium on the life and character of Mr. Clay, pronounced in the State Capitol in 1852.—[Jackson Mississippian, 26th.

Col. McClung's remains were conveyed to Vicksburg for interment.

A correspondent of the Missouri Republican states that the city of Chicago derives its name from a small river flowing through it, which was called by the Indians "Shi-kee-ko," which means a polecat or skunk. The Chicagonians, therefore, should call the place by its original name: Skunktown or Polecatiana.

DEBATES IN THE SPANISH CORTES, ON OUR CUBAN RELATIONS.—The following extract from a recent debate in the Spanish Cortes upon the relations between Spain and the United States, is translated from the official Government organ at Madrid:

SENOR RAMEZ.—My purpose is to draw from the Minister of Foreign Affairs some explanation sufficient to counteract the effect of certain facts which have coincided with the departure from this court of the Minister from the United States, Mr. Soule. By some respectable members of this chamber an article has been published, which ascribes to Mr. Soule the slander or belief, that the future strong relations with the United States is inevitable; and the pretext for such an extreme case is supposed to be the slight with which Mr. Soule and the country he represents have been treated by the Spanish Government—Coinciding with this fact, in itself very important, a pamphlet has been published, with the express purpose of attributing to the Spanish Government all the various difficulties now existing between the two governments, or at any rate, the responsibility of not having settled them; and Mr. Soule is so praised in it for his benevolence towards us that you would almost think that he gave up the interest of the country he represented. Besides, in some papers, information has been given about Mr Soule having received in the latter days of his stay several slights from the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

These facts have urged me to ask the Minister for some explanations. I believe that, considering the especial circumstances of the case, and the serious and immediate interest which our country has with them, since it is the only international question we have pending, it is expedient to correct the effects which may be produced by the above facts. The best means of rectifying public opinion, both here in the United States, where it is very important to place it in the right, as far as it is possible, as the facts will be enhanced by distance, and as usual made fruitful by the American ex-Minister, who will be anxious, doubtless, to repair, in some measure, among his friends and partizans the failure of his unfortunate diplomatic campaign in Spain—the best means to arrive at this object would be for the Government, in view of the particular circumstances of the case, to bring to the chamber the documents and correspondence which may intervened in the course of this matter between both countries.

I know that the Minister of Foreign Affairs will not grant this, and will be unwilling to put aside the custom called diplomatic secrecy, and which we observe to an excess in my opinion, etc. Therefore, with due respect to the right of the Government to exist subjects, I limit my request, to ask the Minister if he thinks that the reasons and facts I have exposed possesses the gravity which I attribute to them, to give some explanations sufficient to prevent the consequences which I anticipate.

Senor Lustriago, Minister-of-Foreign Affairs, replied; he expressed his pleasure at the opportunity offered him to make explanations, to satisfy public opinion in Spain, and in the United States. He denied any slight from motives of courtesy and duty. He said he had no time to read what may have been published on the subject. He took for granted that the publications having been participated in by members of the Cortes there would be in them nothing unbecoming. That the Government of the United States determined on the 15th of January to replace the Minister at Madrid. When the news reached Madrid, Mr. Soule had left, but the Government of her Majesty had learned by a perfectly regular channel the language in which it is officially announced to the Spanish Court, which is in harmony with the relations of peace, amity and good understanding which exist between the two Governments. "In this state of the case," adds Senor Lustriago, "the Government of her Majesty, who, in the sight of all, may now act of its own free will, from its own impulse, after having received this news has ordered that all pending difficulties with the United States be submitted to a new investigation, instructing especially those charged with it not to search for arguments to reject the claims of the United States, but to study simply to ascertain what is just, in order to grant it spontaneously, freely, as it becomes the people whom it governs. It is resolved by its own impulse, to grant whatever is just, without any pressure. The Government is confident that the same feelings will be found in the Government of the United States. The President announced it so to the House of Representatives, saying that his sole object was justice. We are, therefore, perfectly agreed, and since there will be doubtless, the same sincerity in both parties, the Government cherishes great hopes of arriving at an entirely peaceful solution." He concluded, protesting his devotion to good sense, justice and reason, but did not enter at all into the merits of the case.

INTERESTING FROM JAPAN.—Another interesting letter from Silas E. Burrows, appears in the Alta California, which we condense as follows:

While in California Mr. B.'s commercial business enabled him to obtain various specimens of sculpturing from the natives of Queen Charlotte's Island, in latitude 54 N. The natives take slate rock from their mountains and sculpture it, with a beautiful polish. He was impressed with the great resemblance of this work to that of Japan, and took with him to Japan various specimens. When in Jeddo Bay, with the Vice-Governor of Uraga, and many of the other men on board, he had these labors of the sons of Queen Charlotte's Island placed on the table, without a remark being made.

The Japanese, with evidently great surprise, (as they had their police regulations so perfect that nothing could come on board the ship without their knowledge,) said, "Where, Mr Burrows, did you get these Japanese articles?" He replied, "Are these Japanese?" "Certainly they are Japanese," said several of the party, and anxiously looked at him to ascertain in what manner they had been brought on board.

Mr. B. replied, "It is with great pleasure, and this alone repays me for coming to Japan, that you recognize these articles to be the workmanship of your family, but the workmen were not born in Japan, but in America." The position of Queen Charlotte's Island was then pointed out to them on the charts, and when they again examined the sculpturings, and saw how perfectly Japanese they were, all were satisfied that the inhabitants of Queen Charlotte's Island were their descendants.

The noble specimens of the North American Indians, Tecumseh, Logan, Uneas, King Phillip and Pocahontas, were perfect specimens of the Japanese, and were no doubt of the same blood and family.

The proof presented, Mr. B. thinks conclusive evidence that the red men of America came from the family of Asia.

Many of the habits and customs of the Japanese have survived the wreck of ages. The Japanese have a tradition that many years ago, their vessels had a communication with the land of the rising sun, now called America, and I hope your readers will feel the same interest in the subject as I do, as it lessens in some degree the speculation so long existing as to man's creation.

When Columbus first conveyed to Spain the natives of America, who appeared so different from the inhabitants of Europe as to impress all that they were a distinct creation of man, could they have been accompanied by the Japanese of Asia, they would have ranked as the same family.

The Japanese made it a perfect jubilee during the time we remained in Jeddo Bay, and had not the Emperor interfered to arrest the intimacy, the Japanese would soon have been Americanized.

Never were a people more desirous of the closest intimacy; but the Emperor and Prince prefer the old state of things to the new, and time will be required for the change.

THE NEW POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.—The following official letter, recently written by Horatio King, Esq., First Assistant Postmaster General, to the Postmaster of New York city, tells the story. We advise the reader to cut it out and paste it somewhere to be constantly within his reach for reference, until habitual compliance with its requisitions in his transactions with the Post-office shall have sufficiently familiarized him with its explanations:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
APPOINTMENT OFFICE, March 22, 1855.

SIR—Your letter of the 28th inst is received. In answer, I am directed by the Postmaster General to inform you,

1. The act of 3d of March, 1855, making no provision for unpaid letters to places within the United States on the same or any following any such unpaid letter or letters being put into a Post-office, the Postmaster thereof will post up conspicuously in his office a list of the same, stating that they are held for postage. If not attended to, such letters must be returned monthly to the Dead Letter Office.

2. Letters postpaid should be dispatched, charged with the additional postage due at the prepaid rate according to the distance established by said act, except where the omission to pay the correct amount is known to have been intentional, when they should be treated the same as letters wholly unpaid.

3. It is proper to forward a letter when requested by writing. When forwarded, no additional postage should be charged if the letter, contrary to its address, has been mis-sent. If it has been sent according to its address, and then forwarded, it must be charged with additional postage at the prepaid rate, according to distance, established by the act of March 3d, 1855, aforesaid.

4. Ship letters, as they cannot be prepaid, and are not supposed to be embraced in the new act, will continue to be dispatched agreeable to the provisions of the fifteenth section of the act of March 3, 1855.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

HORATIO KING,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

BANK ROBBERY.—Unparalleled Audacity.—The Branch of the Bank of the State of Georgia, in this place, was entered through the front door, opening on the public square, between 7 and 8 o'clock Wednesday morning last, and robbed of fifteen thousand two hundred and twenty-five dollars in bills, all of which were payable in this place. The teller had just been in the room, and removed the till from the vault to its usual place in the counter, preparatory to the day's business, and retired to breakfast, leaving the side door leading into the passage after him, and supposing the front door secure, as it had been locked the evening previous. A negro boy, whose business it is to sweep out the banking room every morning, while the teller is present, has been arrested, and confesses that by agreement with a white man the night before, he secretly turned the key in the front door while sweeping. The robber, all this while, was secreted in the privy at the corner of the building, and but a few steps from the door. As soon as the bell rang for breakfast, he emerged from his hiding place, entered the building, secured his booty, and effected his escape unseen. The robbery was discovered a little over an hour after it occurred, yet all attempts to track the villain failed.—[Wilkes Republican, 29th ult.

SIGNOR BLITZ AMONG THE INSANE WITH HIS MAGIC AND CANARY BIRDS.—On Thursday afternoon Signor Blitz gave an exhibition of his wonderful powers before the inmates of the Pennsylvania Hospital for the Insane. The effect upon the minds of the unfortunate spectators was calculated to excite the attention of the curious and those interested in the study of mental phenomena.

Some who were impressed with melancholy, and were never known to laugh since being admitted into the institution, became quite mirthful. One person seemed to enjoy several of the tricks, and, finally said, to a fellow inmate, "my dear sir, that man is a very devil, and I will not look at him any more." He then buried his face in his hands, and preserved the utmost silence during the remainder of the exhibition. The learned canary birds were objects of their wonder, whilst the ventriloquial powers of the Signor caused the greatest consternation. The general effect was happy indeed, and no one seemed to enjoy it more than the Signor himself, whose heart ever throbs with sympathy for the more unfortunate of his fellow-creatures.—[Philadelphia North American.

THINGS IN KANSAS.—We find the following telegraphic dispatch, dated the 23d, in the St. Louis papers:

Thousands of actual residents have gone from Missouri to Kansas. Hundreds from Cooper, Randolph, Howard and Saline, are passing here daily. Weather mild; river falling fast.

The excitement in Kansas, and all along the counties bordering on that Territory, is intense. It is charged that Governor Reeder communicated to the New England Abolitionists, a month or more ago, the precise time when the election of members of the Legislature was to take place, but kept the same intelligence concealed from the people of Kansas, and of Western Missouri, and they are justly indignant at the trickery. There will be tremendous excitement at the election on the 30th inst.

A FORMIDABLE UNDERTAKING.—A contemporary puts the tobacco question into the following shape: "Suppose a tobacco chewer is addicted to the habit of chewing tobacco fifty years of his life, and each day of that time he consumes two inches of solid plug. It amounts to six thousand four hundred and seventy-five feet, making nearly one mile and a quarter in length of solid tobacco, half an inch thick and two inches broad. Now, what would the young beginner think if he had the whole amount stretched out before him, and were told that to chew it would be one of the exercises of his life, and also that it would tax his income to the amount of two thousand and ninety four dollars?"—Life Illustrated.

THE METHODIST DENOMINATION has long felt the need of a suitable Music Book, for Church, Conference, Social and Camp Meetings; one of suitable size, to be conveniently handled, and one which should comprise the best Hymns, familiar to the denomination, set to appropriate music. We have the pleasure of announcing that such a book has been prepared, with much labor, and care, by B. Hubbard, Esq., author of "Songs of Canaan," Musical Gems, Temperance Melodist, etc., etc., assisted by Rev W. McDonald, of the Maine Conference, author of the Wesleyan Minstrel. The book bears the title of

THE WESLEYAN SACRED HARP.

The authors say in their preface: "Our object in compiling this book, is to supply a denominational want which is felt, and often expressed by our preachers and people. * * * We commit the work to God and, his children, praying that all who sing from these pages on earth, may sing the new song in Heaven forever."

We are pleased to know that so far as it has been examined, the Harp meets the strong approbation of the denomination, and we trust that it will soon be in general use.

Zion's Herald, Boston, speaks thus of this work: "This book is, without doubt, one of the very best of its class. We like it because its pages are not disfigured by the light doggerel which sometimes finds its way into similar works. The hymns in this volume are mostly from our own hymn book. We cheerfully recommend it to all who feel the need of such a work."

From the Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati, Ohio: "We commend the Wesleyan Harp most cordially to the singing members of the church, especially all such as believe in praising God."

Price single, 50 cents half bound; 62½ cents full cloth. Also, per hundred, $40 half bound; $50 full cloth.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gears and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of using the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

HIGH CHURCHISM.

Episcopalian Testimony.

Dr. Arnold thus describes Episcopacy as it exists in the established Church of England, contrasted with primitive Episcopacy:

"Episcopacy then was instituted for the general ends of good government; and, like ordinary civil offices, its identity appears on continuing to exercise an equal influence on the body connected with it. If, then, its mode of appointment be wholly changed, and its relation to the Church greatly circumscribed, still more if the whole society to which it belongs has assumed a different aspect, it is hard to conceive how it can continue essentially the same. Now the primitive bishops were appointed by the members of their own order, with the approbation of the people of the diocese; bishops in England are appointed solely by the Crown. The primitive bishops could legislate for the church, laity as well as clergy; the bishops of England can legislate for no one without the consent of the Crown; and if they are allowed to meet in synod, they can legislate only for the clergy, over the laity their canons have no authority whatever. The primitive bishops fixed the doctrines of their churches and ordered their ceremonies; no single bishop, nor all the bishops in England, united, can order a single prayer to be added to or taken away from the Church service, nor can they do so much as alter a single expression in its language. No bishop can ordain any man unless he will take certain oaths imposed by act of Parliament. No bishop can refuse to institute any man regularly ordained to any cure of souls in his diocese to which he may be appointed by the Crown."

To see the practical working of this last abuse, it is only necessary to remind the reader that "church livings," or benefices, are bought and sold in the markets of England just as any other property, and he who purchases one has the right of appointing a pastor for that benefice, and out of the rents and church rates the patron pays the pastor a certain sum. Every one will see at once that Dr. Arnold very justly considered this as a great source of corruption. Whatever might be the character of the clergyman selected by the patron, the bishop was bound to institute him.

Romanists and High Churchmen teach the duties of a priesthood as being perpetuated from the Jewish to the Christian Church. On this subject Dr. A. uses the strongest language in condemnation of the error:

"For, by a happy fertility in evil, it has united the bad tendencies of two opposite descriptions of characters, encouraging, on the one hand, superstition, fraud, uncharitableness and tyranny, and on the other hand leading to a general carelessness of principle, profaneness, and all licentiousness. This error is the confounding the Christian clergy with the hereditary priesthoods of Judaism and Heathenism; and this conceiving of the clergy as of an order preserving its identity by perpetual succession, and being invested with certain indefeasible powers, which were neither derived from human authority, and which no human law can modify or take away."

"It is well known that Episcopalians generally speak in the most extravagant terms of the sacredness expressing their admiration for the liturgy of the Church. Dr. A. did not seem much pleased with it. Hear him:

"Their admiration of the liturgy and articles of our present constitution would be—and almost said less idolatrous—than it was to be now; but it would be more sincere and better grounded. True it is, that in following that both additions and omissions were made in the original articles of the Church of England within ten years of their first publication, they would probably judge of the lapse of two hundred and seventy years must have made other additions and alterations expedient now; remembering that the liturgy was altered several times in Christian spirit—that the last nominal revision, in 1661-2, was the mere mockery of a triumphant party, and that the revision attempted in 1689 by some of the best men in the Church was frustrated by the influence of the same party, they would probably desire another revision in the spirit of 1689 to be carried into effect now."

In the following paragraph Dr. A. gives us a pretty good description of the High Churchmen of our day. Indeed, it is so "true to nature," that it would not be easy to describe them better:

"It (circumcision) was not only harmless, but becoming to the Jewish Christians, so long as they observed it as a venerable institution handed down to them from their forefathers, and formerly, under different circumstances, commanded by God himself. But it became injurious, nay, subversive of the souls of men, when it was put forward as necessary to salvation, and attempted, in the spirit of fanaticism or worldly ambition, to be urged upon the acceptance of all Christians. Nor could St. Paul forbear the language of the strongest condemnation when these Judaizers attempted to shake the lawful government of the Christian Church, because it had interfered with their selfishness and superstition. They disputed St. Paul's apostleship as irregular, because he had not, like Matthias, received his appointment through the medium of the apostles of Christ; because, in defence of the essential liberty of Christ's Gospel, he had resisted the highest human authority, and reproved even Peter himself. Such is over the nature of superstition; anarchial at once, and tyrannical; virulent in proportion to its ignorance, and lax in matters of principle, consistently with its intolerant strictness on points of form. Such is that spirit which, incapable of comprehending the pure and loving bond of Christian union, spares no pains and scruples at no means to make proselytes to its own paltry party, and on which our Lord himself, who, in true zeal for God's service, as in everything else, is alone our perfect pattern, has pronounced one of his heaviest sentences of condemnation!"

In this quotation there is direct reference to a strange peculiarity among High Churchmen—that peculiarity is this: They are careless to a fault about the doctrines of the Gospel, and most readily tolerate the greatest extremes of Arminianism and Calvinism, of High Church and Low Church; they are careless about what a man believes and teaches, provided always that he conform strictly to the forms and ceremonies of the Church himself, and is careful to teach all others that they are essential to the existence of the Church. He may be a Puseyite of the deepest dye, and he may openly propagate the superstitious errors of Romanism without a word of censure, but he may not, under any circumstances, depart from the forms of worship. They can tolerate many things among their ministers, but the idea of one of them officiating without the gown, is absolutely intolerable—a sin not to be forgiven. Their people may spend their nights in dancing, and an apologetic article will be published in the "Herald of the Church," if any be so bold as to speak against the sin of dancing. But if any of their more spiritual members endeavor to institute a weekly prayer meeting, without conforming literally to the liturgy, they are forthwith lectured about it in the columns of a Church paper, and admonished of the dangerous tendencies to sectarianism. Thus it would seem that in the opinion of High Churchmen dancing parties are so harmless as to be, in some sort, taken under the protecting wing of the Church, while the sinful tendencies of a weekly prayer meeting are so great that those who would attend them must needs be reproved for so doing.

Dr. Arnold uttered a strange truth, but a truth nevertheless, when he said of High Churchism, "virulent in proportion to its ignorance, and lax in matters of principle, consistently with its intolerant strictness on points of form." Well may he say that High Churchmen are the men of "Miat, and Amise, and Cummia," blind guides, which "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." He is even excusable when he declares that "the fanaticism of the English High Churchman has been the fanaticism of mere foolery—a dress, a ritual, a name, a ceremony, a technical phraseology, the superstition of a priesthood without its power."

Again, he bears this testimony of the High Church party of his day: "It spares no pains and scruples at no means to make proselytes to its own paltry party." In this respect the High Churchmen of our day have certainly not degenerated, they are the living and faithful representatives of the past generation; and, whatever else may be said of them, it cannot be said that in this work they have grown weary. TO-DAY.

On one occasion, the late Rev. W. Blunt requested a lady, whom he thought qualified, to undertake some charge in district visiting, or some kindred engagement. She answered him, rather declining the proposal, "My stay here will probably be too short for me to be of any use. I do not know that I shall be here three months." His answer was brief, very calm and solemn. "I do not know that I shall be here one!" He alluded to his time and life in this present world. She saw his meaning, answered no more, and heartily embraced the work offered her to do. In God's sight, time has in reality no remnants, no shreds, no patches to be thrown away; and the habit of speedy and ready application of our faculties is one of the most important acquisitions which can possibly be be formed.

CLASS MEETINGS.

NO. III.

In addition to other causes that operate against this institution, and to the increase of delinquency, some of which are briefly referred to in our previous article, I would here mention another, though more remote, yet not wanting in efficiency in producing a prejudice in the minds of some of our people against this means of grace; and that is, the influence of ministers and members of other denominations.

There are numerous instances in which, owing to the social and domestic relations of life, ministers and members of other denominations have immediate access to and contact with many of our members, and in most instances they fail not to avail themselves of the opportunity to assail them, that, if possible, they may so influence them as to alienate their feelings from their own Church, and thereby the more easily win them over to other denominations. Abundant evidence of this we have always at hand. That there is a degree of jealousy, if not envy, among some belonging to other churches towards Methodism, is too plain to require of us any proof or to admit from them a denial. And the spirit of proselytism thus engendered is so well developed in the present day, that it hesitates not to make the most daring advances, and to employ every means that bigotry, combined with no small amount of impudence, can suggest to accomplish its end. And while from one source our ordinances are assailed, from another our ministry is attacked, as warring in the right to exercise the sacred functions, and the consequent invalidity of our sacraments, at the same time all seem to combine against this peculiar institution of Methodism. It is often assailed with a degree of bitterness and ridicule for which no apology can be found other than an undisguised hostility to our Church. However variant their opinions and actions may be in regard to other things, in this they agree. In this war Herod and Pilate make friends.

With the lukewarm and unstable this course of procedure is too often successful. This is their vulnerable point, for the reason that a close searching scrutiny into Christian experience, with pertinent and personal inquiries in reference to their spiritual condition, is a very painful ordeal to a half-backslidden professor of religion. And to be relieved of this, with many, is a desideratum. And when these arch agents of sectarian interests can succeed in exciting this state of feeling to such a degree as to induce the total neglect of this means of grace, they have well nigh accomplished their object. Their victim, then, is easily enticed to scenes and sources of amusement forbidden by our Church, but tolerated by theirs, and then it is the door of their fold is thrown open as a place of refuge, and they are pressed to enter where their consciences will never again be disturbed by any inquiries about their religious condition—where the forms of a lifeless liturgy are substituted for vital godliness, and high sectarian prejudices for holy zeal.

In this way inducements are held out to our people to neglect their duty, and to violate the rules of our Church; and a warrant of exemption from anything pertaining to experimental religion and non-conformity to the world is offered to every backslidden Methodist. If they fail in the accomplishment of their end, which is sometimes the case, they leave the object of their efforts in such a condition that they rarely ever enter again so fully into all the exercises of the class room, and their negligence becomes habitual, and thus the number of delinquents are increased.

There are other causes, however, operating to the same end, though not so certain and direct. They are incidental to the conduct and management of the institution itself, and may be found among the leaders. There is no position or office under the economy of Methodism, after the ministry, more important to the well being of the great body of the Church, and more responsible than that of class leader. They are to the class very much what the pastor is to the whole flock, and they have not inaptly been styled sub-pastors. While their field is more limited their ministration is often much more immediate and frequent than the pastor's can possibly be, especially where the membership is large and the labors diverse. How difficult it is to get men to fill this office, as it demands, every one knows. Many have the zeal and piety, but have neither the gifts nor the necessary knowledge; while others have the piety and intelligence, but not the disposition to engage in this work. So it often happens that we have to make up this department from among the available, more than from among the best qualified. It must therefore follow that many are defective, if not incompetent, and fail to interest and profit their members, and thereby neglect becomes more common. But there are many among the leaders who are every way competent, but so engrossed in their secular interests that they fail in the performance of other duties that belong to the office besides the bare meeting in the class room once a week, and thus it is delinquency grows in the hands of some of our best and most gifted leaders. How few are there in this money-loving and money-making age that can be induced, in addition to the Bible, to take time to read some standard works on Christian experience and kindred subjects, and thus furnish their minds that they may be the more useful to those under their instruction and care! Every class leader ought to be conversant with Mr. Wesley's sermons. But how few are there that read them even occasionally, say nothing of regularly, and of that patient study so necessary to a proper understanding and use of them! And yet information of this kind is indispensible to the class leader, if he would meet and minister to every phase of experience that may be developed under the multiform trials and temptations of our probationary state.

How many of our leaders can be induced to appropriate one hour in each week to the looking after their members, and finding out the cause of their absence, and thus prevent that willful and habitual neglect of class meetings that now characterizes many in our communion! And yet how important is such a work!

How many are there who, for want of this kind of care are hopelessly lost to the Church, if not lost forever! Where are the Carvossos, the Roeses? On whom have their mantles fallen! Would to God we could see a manifestation of the same faith and zeal among our leaders of the present day that characterized those holy men whose names will long be remembered as the honored instruments, in their sphere as leaders, of saving scores and hundreds of precious souls! We might enumerate other causes and enlarge on these, but we leave them for another aspect of the subject, with which we shall close these articles.

IF I PERISH, I PERISH.

ESTHER, 4: 16

I can but perish if I go,
I am resolved to try it;
For if I stay away I know
I must forever die.

But you will not perish, weeping, trembling soul. He has told you you shall not. He has sworn by his own name that you shall not. He loves you too well to let you perish. He has bought you with too dear a price to deliver you so easily to the power of the enemy. Go to him, he will recall Calvary; go to him with your doubts, he will remember Gethsemane; go to him with all your temptations and fears, he will recall the wilderness, the pinnacle and the mount. No, you can never perish with such a sympathizer, such a compassionate friend, such an Almighty Saviour to befriend you. Then let not the light of hope so soon fade. Did he ever reject one yet! Did ever poor, trembling sinner come to him on earth, and go away refused of his petition? And does he not himself say that he is the same yesterday, to-day and forever? The same in his almightiness to rescue; the same in his power to uphold; the same to pity, the same to love, to guide, to accept, that he ever was. You are not worse than a thousand others. Paul was more blasphemous; Magadalene was more corrupt, the dying thief more abandoned—and were they refused? Our desire to go never equaled his desire to receive us. Our wants of grace never surpass his readiness to supply. Our wish for happiness is always behind his willingness to bestow it. Go, then, he will not refuse. Go and be blessed. Go and touch the extended sceptre and rejoice, and all Heaven will rejoice with you; the angels of God will tune a higher note of praise on their harps of gold, and star will whisper it to star, till the whole of God's bright universe shall sing with joy at the return of a long lost soul.

TURN THE BIBLE INTO PRAYER.

Robert Murray McCheyne, in writing to a youthful parishioner, uses the following language: "You read your Bible regularly, of course; but do you try to understand it, and still to feel it? Read more parts than one at a time. For example, if you are reading Genesis, read a psalm also; or, if you are reading Matthew, read a small bit of an epistle also. Turn the Bible into prayer. Thus, if you are reading the first psalm, spread the Bible on the chair before you and kneel and pray: 'O Lord give me the blessedness of the man that walketh not in the council of the ungodly.' 'Let me not stand in the way of sinners.' 'Let me not sit in the seat of the scornful,' &c. This is the best way of learning the meaning of the Bible, and of learning to pray."

A GENEROUS CHRISTIAN.—The Home and Foreign Record announces that the gentleman who last year gave five thousand dollars to assist in establishing and sustaining parochial schools, has made a similar offer for the year 1856. Would that many more of our rich Christians were like-minded.

THE BIBLE IN THE FAMILY.

An incident has come to our knowledge which strikingly illustrates the daily rending of the Bible in the family upon the conscience and the moral affections of childhood. In the ordinary course of family worship, a Christian father read the 32d Psalm, accompanying the reading with such brief and simple remarks as would make plain the meaning of the psalm to the family. "Now children," said he, "you see that David had done wrong, and tried to hide it. But he knew all the while that he could not hide his sin from God. He was troubled and unhappy. His conscience gave him pain. Sometimes the thought of the wickedness he was trying to conceal would trouble him so that he could not sleep. His burden ached with the ache that he felt in his heart. At last he made up his mind to confess his sins to God; and no sooner had he done this than he felt relieved and happy, for God had forgave him. Let us learn from this never to hide our sins; but whenever we do wrong to confess our sin and to seek the forgiveness of God."

These remarks were not called forth by any incident in the family but grew naturally out of the psalm itself. When prayers were over, one of the children, a little girl, some eight years old, desired to speak with her mother alone. "My dear mother," said she, in tones of deep sorrow, "I told you a falsehood once, a great while ago, and I have never confessed it. I have felt sadly about it a great many times; and sometimes, when I went to pray, I could not, because I kept thinking of that lie. It has made me very unhappy. So to-night, when father was reading, I made up my mind to tell you all about it."

On recalling the incident, the mother remembered that she had suspected the child of an untruth at the time, but having no means of detecting it, had let the matter pass. The lie was told about some little thing more than a year ago. The child was suspected of some slight misdemeanor; and, on being asked kindly about it, had denied the fact. The subject was never referred to afterwards. Yet for more than a year that little heart had borne the burden of that falsehood. At length, hearing an exposition of the duty and blessedness of confession, she determined to open her whole heart to her mother, and to seek forgiveness of God.

What a testimony is this to the power of the Bible as an educator of the heart and conscience. And yet how little do parents realize in the daily reading of the Scriptures in the family that they are addressing to the susceptible minds of children truths adapted to quicken their moral nature, to develop in them a sense of their responsibility to God, and to educate their whole being into holiness. How often is the reading of the Bible in the family a mechanical process, a dull formality, upon which children are expected patiently to wait, but in which they are hardly imagined to feel a present interest. Yet in this daily reading of His Word, God has committed to parents a power over the delicate, sensitive, thoughtful, impressible soul of childhood, which is beyond comparison the most potent of all moral influences in forming that soul unto a holy character. Let the thought of this invest the daily reading and exposition of the Scriptures in the family with the momentous import of a personal address from the living God to souls made eager and susceptible by his quickening Spirit. Let the parent by his own earnest and believing attention to the truth, ever make it manifest to his children that this is indeed the voice of God. Why should we wait for children to grow up into open enemies of God before we think of them as proper subjects of his renewing and sanctifying grace? Why look so eagerly for tokens of the Spirit at missionary stations, and in revivals at home, when the Spirit is waiting upon our daily ministry in the household, if only we have faith to seek is blessing or to discern his presence?—Independent.

Middle Aisles.

We know a minister, now of some experience and position in the Church, who cannot look his congregation in the eye. He says he tries, knows that it is no mean element of effectiveness, not to speak of elocutionary propriety; but he can't do it. His eyes will wander blankly about or stare on vacancy. This calamity he seriously attributes to the pulpit of the first station he served at for two years. It looked down an aisle, a broad, empty space. The view opened upon vacancy; instead of fronting upon an intelligent area of human faces.

The Congregationalist, in some criticisms on the impropriety of having a middle aisle in the construction of churches, uses these words: "No man wants to have the best position in his pulpit naturally face nobody, as it must if the pulpit front a vacant aisle of four or five feet in width."

AMERICA—ITS AGE AND ITS ANTIQUITIES.

The only knowledge which the PRESENT has obtain of the PAST, anterior to written history, must be gathered from the lessons taught by the monuments that have survived the devastating wars of ignorant and infuriated man, the crash of the elements, and the slow corroding power of untold time. The two continents of this Western hemisphere abound with these ante diluvian records. The Lehors of the antiquarians in Asia, Africa and Europe have disclosed monuments of art, now in ruins, that were reared by a people whose history has passed down to us in written records. With the general history of the Assyrians, the Israelites, the Egyptians, the Carthaginians, the Greeks and the Romans, we are already acquainted, and all the discoveries made by antiquarians in their researches in those countries, among the ruins of ancient palaces, temples and cities, serve but to illumine some portions of written history that are now dark, or illustrate others that are imperfectly detailed. But, such is not the case in America.

The antiquities of America extend from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, and from the great lakes and British Provinces to Peru and Brazil, in South America. These ruins are not illustrated, or even alluded to, by any written history. Their origin is lost to view behind the impenetrable veil imposed by unnumbered cycles of unchronicled centuries. Immense forests growing over the ruins of large cities and the gigantic size of the trees, with indications that other generations of trees sprung up and grew and decayed before them, prove that these ruins preceded the Christian Era. Neither history nor tradition indicates the origin or the rise of those vast mounds that are found scattered over the North American continent. They stand in silent grandeur, monuments of a race of people that have long since passed away, leaving no other trace of their existence.

It is fashionable to speak of the Eastern continent as the Old World, yet it is not known to be entitled to this appellation. Who can say that the Andes and the Sierra Nevada are not the seniors of the Alps and the Himalaya? Who is prepared to prove that the ruins of Uxmal and Palenque, and the pyramids of Cholula, in Mexico, do not take precedence in age of the sphinxes and pyramids of Egypt, or the winged lions of Assyria? History traces the rise and fall of Nineveh, of Babylon and of Thebes; but we have no record of the rise, progress or fall of those great cities in Central America, which the laborious researches of Stevens and Catherwood brought to light. There the human-faced bulls and the winged lions of Nineveh find their equivalents in the grotesque carving in stone of hideous forms of men and animals. Who can say that these rude sculptures of America did not precede those of Asia?

But we will not speculate on a subject that offers no basis on which even a plausible argument can be erected. The existence of numerous and immense ruins in America of what were once large cities is a fixed fact, and we must be content to remain in utter ignorance of the epoch in which they flourished. The most extensive of these ruins are to be found at Uxmal and Palenque, in the southeastern part of Mexico. At Uxmal are immense pyramids, coated with stone, and quadrangular stone edifices and terraces. The highest of these pyramids is 130 feet, and on the summit it supports a temple, on one of the facades of the temple are four human figures cut in stone with great exactness and elegance. The hands are crossed upon the breast, the head is covered in something like a helmet, about the neck is a garment of the skin of an alligator, and over each body is a figure of Death's head and bones.

At Palenque are immense ruins—a city of great extent, with the remains of a royal palace. One temple, that of Capan, was 520 feet by 650, and is supposed to have been as large as St. Peter's at Rome. Another temple of great dimensions is here, having an entrance by a portico 100 feet long and 10 feet broad; it stands on an elevation of 60 feet. The pillars of the portico are adorned with hieroglyphics and other devices. Different objects of worship have been found, representatives of the gods who were worshipped in this country. These temples, with fourteen large buildings and many other objects of curiosity, stand here as monuments of ancient greatness, to remind us of the remote origin of a mighty empire. This city has been described as the Thebes of America, and travelers have supposed that it must have been sixty miles in circumference, and contained a population of 3,000,000 souls.

It is in Mexico that we must seek the largest pyramid in the world. The tourists, the historians and the geographers have made us familiar with the pyramids of Egypt, among which that of Cheops looms up a wonder among wonders. But Cheops is a pigmy compared with that of Cholula, in Mexico.

The pyramid of Cholula is described as covering forty-four acres of ground. On its summit was a temple, and in the interior has been discovered a vault, roofed with beams of wood, containing skeletons and idols. Several smaller pyramids surround this large one. It appears to have been formed by cutting a hill into an artificial shape. Its dimensions are immense, being nearly three miles in circumference and about four hundred feet high. It is divided into terraces and slopes, covered with platforms, stages and bastions, elevated one above the other, and formed with large stones skillfully cut and joined without any cement. In some respects the style of architecture resembles the Gothic, being massive and durable; in other respects it resembles the Egyptian; yet the general construction, manner and style of architecture are different from any thing hitherto described in the world.

The wave of immigration which has planted the Anglo-Saxon race on the shores of the Pacific can not fail to be favorable to the advancement of knowledge among men. The well-known activity, enterprise and inquisitive character of the race will naturally prompt them to explore the ruins which are so profusely scattered over Mexico and South America, and it yet may be the destiny of some restless Yankee to trace in the ruined temples and cities of this strange land a history which has hitherto lain hidden under the rubbish of countless centuries. [Louisville Journal.

REMINISCENCE OF JEFFERSON.—Mr. Jefferson's great height and slender figure exposed him to much ridicule from his opponents. His combat with them was "Long Tom;" and when his famous project of the substitution of gunboats in place of the navy was adopted by Congress, and the attempt was made to put it into practice, the cannon, disproportionably large, with which each of the ill-constructed craft was burdened, obtained, in contempt, the name of a "Long Tom." Nothing could present a more singular contrast than the figures of Mr. Jefferson and Gen. Knox; the one very short, as thick as he was long; the other lank and lean, and unusually tall. They happened to meet one morning on the steps of General Washington's lodgings in Philadelphia. The two gentlemen approached contrariwise, and arriving at the same moment, a contest in etiquette took place. The General at the head of the army, and full of its chivalrous politeness, could not think of passing in before the equal head of the Department of State; while the civil officer of government was equally averse to take precedence of the military, and they stood for some moments, each drawing back and waving the other forward. In the midst of this somewhat entertaining scene came up, directly in front, the notorious Judge Peters, the greatest wit of his day. Perceiving how matters stood, and casting a sly glance from one to the other, he pushed boldly between them, exclaiming as he passed: "Pardon me, gentlemen, if in my haste I dash through thick and thin!"

VISIT TO A VOLCANO.

The next morning by 9 o'clock we were off for Vesuvius. By the same carriage road as the day before, and with many of the same sights around us, we drove to Resina, where we were met by the noblest and sturdiest set of guides, beggars and boys, we had yet encountered. The guides were ready to furnish horses and conduct us to Vesuvius. The beggars wanted money, and the boys would ask us sticks to walk up the mountain, or they would go along and help us. We had been advised to find Vincent Cozzolino, who had conducted Ross, Forbes, Humboldt and other great men, and was, therefore, the man for us! We inquired for him, and one guide claimed to be his brother, and another his cousin, but the real Cozzolino was not to be found. His horse was near, and thither we went. He was absent, but we found his son, a smart young fellow, who produced his book of certificates, and among them one from Professor Silliman, whose commendation was all sufficient, and we committed ourselves at once to his care. Giovanni, for that was his name, supplied us at once with horses, and we set off with the whole gang of boys, beggars and guides in full cry after us. They assured us that one guide would not be enough; we should need help in climbing the mountain, and each one had some particular service to render which was quite indispensable to our success.

By dint of hard riding we managed to get away from them, and, by a road that was well payed, and had been for a thousand years, we rode on for an hour, and then commenced an ascent by a winding but easy path, which, after another hour, brought us to the table-land, where stands the Hermitage with refreshments for travelers. Our way led us through fields in which men were at work, and many women saluted us as we passed. Vast strata of lava were lying in great ridges, along the sides of which the vines were growing luxuriantly, where the waves of liquid stone had once flowed and cooled, now stretching in long rows, like rivers from the mountain to the sea. We often paused on our upward way to look back on the enchanting prospect—the neat white cottages on the hill-sides, the villages on the plain, the city, the bay, the islands and the blue sea. A glorious vision, every moment growing more beautiful as we ascend and take in a wider view. Now we observe successive layers of lava, with the common earth between; on the border of a ravine we could thus count four strata deposited by as many overflows of the boiling caldron.

After leaving the Hermitage we crossed immense fields of lava, over which a path for the horses has been made, and in single file we made our way to the foot of the cone of Vesuvius. We are now between Monte Somma and Vesuvius. They were one in olden times, till the great eruption of A. D. 79 left this valley after the mountain had thrown down in the plain and the sea, and buried the cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii. At the base of the cone a dozen fellows were awaiting the arrival of travelers, and with sedan chairs would carry those to the summit who preferred that to walking, and when we all refused to be carried, they followed us, insisting that we should allow them to haul us up with a handkerchief about our waists.

Taking the track along the side of a ridge of lava, now and then leaving it for the ashes, into which we sank and slipped back about as fast as we got up, we climbed as perpendicularly as up a ruined stairway of some old castle. From time to time I was obliged to sit down on the ragged piles of lava, and gather strength for the ascent, for the summit seemed to recede as we approached it. But we did it in forty minutes from the base of the cone. Now on the rim of the crater, the ground on which we are treading is opened with seams or cracks, from which smoke or steam issues continually, and if we listen we can hear the roar of the internal fires beneath our feet. We went a few steps below the verge to get some protection from the cold winds that blew too freshly on us in our heat, and there we placed a lot of eggs in the crevices of the earth, and made Vesuvius cook them for our dinner. Refreshed and rested, we descended a hundred feet into the crater, and, standing on a ledge of rocks, we could see down into the lower depths, from which the smoke was rising, but no fire was perceptible.

After the interior of the crater has been cleaned out by a great eruption, it is gradually filled up by the upheavings of the boiling mass, and when full it flows over and runs in rivers down the mountain sides, or a mighty eructation throws it into the air, to descend in a storm of red hot stones and scoria. Enveloped in the thick sulphurous vapor that rose from the abyss, we were sometimes unable to see up or down, and appeared to ourselves to be lost in some purgatorial cavern, from which deliverance was doubtful. For a few moments the cloud would clear away, and we then launched huge stones into the abyss, listening to hear their roll and their bound after they had passed entirely out of our sight.

I write these lines sitting on the rocks as near the bottom of the crater as I could reach. It was harder to get out of it than in. But once more on the verge above, we pursued our footway around the crater, perhaps a mile and a half in circumference; but the strong sulphur clouds of smoke and steam so nearly choked me, that I was obliged to cover my face with my handkerchief, and trust to the guide to lead me through. Happily the wind was favorable, and when we came round to the western side we were relieved, and could look off on the magnificent prospect which the summit of Vesuvius commands. It was an entrancing sight. There is no other like it on the earth. If this has been said of a score of other scenes, let them all be unsaid, that the view from Vesuvius may bear the palm. We can now look far off into the country, where cities have been, and white villages now are, and smiling vineyards, down into whose bosoms these black streams extend from the sides of the mountain. And here is beautiful Naples, girdling the sea with its suburban villages; and there lie the islands of Capri and Ischia, and this "great and wide sea."

But we must not be looking off. We plunge our walking-sticks into the ground, and out rushes the smoke and sulphurous gas. We walk on and find new openings, and hot steam issues, before which we could not hold our hands. We step across wide fissures from which the scalding vapor was ascending, and we could distinctly hear the roar of the boiling caldron below. At last we completed the circuit of the crater's rim, and sat down again to rest and think. What a wonderful past has been around this burning mountain! Before the Phœnicians came hither these flames had been burning, and the Syrian language gave the volcano its name. Jupiter Tonans, the Thunderer, once had a temple on the summit—Jovi Vesuvio sacrum, D. C. Pliny's graphic story of that awful eruption, which destroyed the cities of the plains, we read while in full view of all the localities which he describes. It gave a terrible reality to the scene. Other cities are now lying nearer to this crater than Pompeii, and are thoughtlessly treasuring up wrath against a similar day of wrath. May God save them from such a doom!

It is time to descend. The sun is on the down-hill side, and we have a buried city yet to see. Away we went through the soft ashes which had been soaked by a heavy rain the night before, and now made a yielding bed for our feet, as by successive leaps of ten or fifteen feet at every bound we came down, and never paused to look back, and had no need to rest till we were at the foot of the cone. This operation did not occupy more than ten minutes, and was full of excitement. [Travels in Europe.

Impostors Out!

From several exchanges that have been forwarded us with special request to put the public on their guard by copying, we condense the following. One or more of them is about.

A man calling himself A. Armstrong, and claiming to be a Methodist minister. He is about five feet six or seven inches in height, is an Irishman by birth, and has a little of the brogue in his accent; twenty-five to twenty-eight years of age, high, dark skin, black or dark brown hair; rather spare features and build; opens his lips slightly when listening; stoops a little when walking, and has the smile of a villain when off his guard; when speaking, has a clear, good voice. Let everybody look out for him.

Another, Charles Wesley Scott, said to be a son of Orange Scott. Charles is prepossessing in his appearance, and tells a plausible story. He is of medium stature, light complexion, and talks very smoothly. Usually, he has "lost a pocket-book," "is always from home, with a wife and child," "needs a loan until he can arrive there," &c. By this means, and with this false pretence he obtains from five to ten dollars, and twenty dollars, and even more, from individuals who supply him liberally for the sake of his father. This terrible swindle, it is now believed, he has been practicing for years, and must have realized hundreds, if not thousands of dollars by it.

Another, representing himself as a German Methodist preacher, alias Dr. Mann. He has a letter purporting to be from Dr. McClintock, editor of the Northern Quarterly Review, and also credentials as a Methodist preacher, signed by brother Jacoby, Missionary in Germany. He is a real German in language and appearance; wears a pair of gold spectacles; cross-eyed; light auburn hair; pleasant manners; is very intelligent; about twenty-five years old; has evidently seen much of the world; speaks English pretty well; says he was educated in Berlin; and converted under the ministry of brother Jacoby. He is represented as an arrant imposter.

LONG SERMONS.

The late Dr. Bogue said to some of his students, "Do you suppose that people have nothing to do but to listen to your emptiness by the hour?" a rebuke pettishly given and too severe. But there is propriety in Lamont's remark. There is no excuse for a long sermon; if it be good, it need not be long; and if it be bad it ought not to be long. * * * Queen Anne, after hearing Dr. South, said, "You have given us an excellent sermon, Dr. South; I wish you had had time to make it shorter." * * * * Whitefield and Wesley, and most of the early Methodists were short. Why do not many of their successors follow their example?

RELIGION IN MOBILE.

Mobile, Ala., April, 9, 1853.

Dear Brother—There is considerable religious interest in Mobile. The St. Francis street Baptist Church was first visited with revival influence, then the Presbyterian, N. S., on the Spring Hill Road. At a protracted meeting at West Ward, which still continues, there have been twenty-one accessions to the Church, and as many conversions. There is a revival in progress at Brother Peebles' church (Wesley Chapel) also. Brother Hilly likewise has an interesting meeting at Turnerville. Yours, in Christ,

Henry Urquhart.

THE METHODIST DISCIPLINE IN FRENCH.

Franklin, La, April 6, 1855.

Dear Brother—As we are getting up a book establishment proper for our Southern branch of the M. E. Church, would it not greatly promote the spread of a pure Christianity, in many portions of the work, to spread as widely as the necessity of the case requires our Discipline in the French language? Many of the people who read and speak this language frequently attend our gospel administrations, laboring under prejudices that might be removed by reading for themselves our book of discipline published officially in their tongue.

Suppose the edition did not pay for itself, which is not certain, we think the prospect of doing good would justify the outlay of money. We have some members of this class who would be greatly profited by this move, and in our intercourse with them we are informed that with such assistance they could gain access to many, and bring them into our Church. Please consider this subject and give to it such support as you think it deserves.

Exhibition of the Public Schools.

Fourth District.

The public, free and common school system of our city is the institution. The most of last week and Monday and Tuesday of this, have been devoted to the examination of the various schools and classes of the Fourth District; that part of New Orleans formerly known as Lafayette.

We were unable to attend the examination of any of them, but have been informed that the examination was close and thorough, from the lowest to the highest departments, and that they gave universal satisfaction.

We specially regret not being present at the examination of the Girls' High School, on Monday, and the Boys's High School, on Tuesday.

The exhibition at the Felicity street chapel, on Wednesday, was everything that the friends of public education amongst us could desire. It was not unlike a college commencement, with this pleasant exception, that the youth of both sexes took part in the exercises. The compositions of the young ladies were neat and tasteful productions, and, for the most part, were read with becoming grace and modesty.

The addresses of the boys, both in matter and delivery, were equal to those of the college commencements. Indeed, they pleased us better than anything of the sort that we have ever heard.

The music was a feature of this entertainment which delighted the audience and reflects the greatest credit upon the industry and skill of Prof. Bleokmar in training the pupils in vocal music. We were reminded of the pleasure which the same skill and industry gave us at Jackson, last July.

Quite a large class of young ladies graduated and received their diplomas. The class of male graduates was small—only ten, we believe. The diplomas were presented by Dr. W. P. Sunderland, President of the Board of Directors. The Doctor read a very interesting and appropriate address, which we hope the will not soon forget.

We were one of nearly fifteen hundred who composed the audience on this occasion.

We congratulate the people of the Fourth District, the Board of Directors, the worthy Superintendent and the whole corps of teachers on the prosperity of an institution which they have built up, and of which they may all be proud.

As a nota bene we observe that prayers and Bibles are not banished from the schools of the Fourth District.

SCOLDING IN THE PULPIT.

Mr. Editor—I want to make a complaint to you. Not a complaint either, exactly; but I want to tell you of something that grieves me. All the family feel the same, and often we talk of it among ourselves.

We have an excellent minister. He is such a good man! As for preaching, I have heard the best judges say he had not his superior in the Conference, hardly an equal. He makes the Scriptures plain, and is eloquent. I have felt happy when he encourages God's people, and am seems exceeding sinful as he holds it up. He visits, too, and prays where he visits, leaving an odor of peace and purity and heavenly mindedness wherever he goes. Personally, he is handsome, and, though he makes no special effort to be so, is agreeable in company.

Well, you will ask, "What fault do you find in him?"

Only one, and it is this: He has a way of talking that anywhere but in the pulpit would pass for scolding. This is not common; it is only now and then; but very marked. I suppose he does not feel well, or the subject in hand gets tangled. His fine forehead frowns and wrinkles. Around his mouth there are curling and sneering, and almost ill-natured expressions. What he says is hard and harsh. His eye, so beautiful and persuasive when glowing with love or moistened by a tear for poor sinners, looks on us all as if he was outdone and didn't care if we did go to the bad place.

Mr. Editor that is beautiful when we pray to Jesus to look on us with a look of love.

If our minister would only quit that, it seems to me he would be almost perfection itself.

I cut out and send for publication an extract of a letter written by the sweet tempered poet Cowper to Rev. J. Newton, that expresses what I mean better than I can myself. Perhaps our minister will see it. I hope he may:

"No man was ever scolded out of his sins. The heart, corrupt as it is, and because it is so, grows angry if it be not treated with some management and good manners, and scolds again. A surly mastiff will bear perhaps to be poked, though he will growl even under the operation, but if you touch him roughly, he will bite. There is no grace that the spirit of self can counterfeit with more success than a religious zeal. A man thinks that he is skillfully searching the hearts of others when he is only gratifying the malignity of his own, and charitably supposes his hearers destitute of all grace, that he may shine the more in his own eyes by comparison: When he has performed this notable task, he wonders that they are not converted. He has given it to them soundly, and if they do not tremble and confess that God is in them of a truth, he gives them up as reprobate, incorrigible and lost forever. But a man that loves me, if he sees me in error will pity me, and endeavor calmly to convince me of it, and persuade me to forsake it. If he has great and good news to tell me, he will not do it angrily, and in much heat and discomposure of spirit. It is not, therefore, easy to conceive on what ground a minister can justify a conduct which only proves that he does not understand his errand. The absurdity of it would certainly strike him, if he were not himself deluded."

OUR ENGLISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Death of the Czar Nicholas and its Conjectured Results

Two thoughts sprung up in every mind and were uttered immediately by every tongue, on hearing of the death of the Czar Nicholas. First, was his death natural? Secondly, will the war consequently terminate? Ever since that upspringing of these thoughts and their almost simultaneous utterance, conjecture has been busily engaged in vainly endeavoring to furnish certain replies. The intelligence which has reached us as to the Czar's last days and hours is very scanty. But little of that scanty all can be relied upon. It is tolerably certain that he died not a death by deeds of brutal violence, such as were experienced by some of his predecessors. We think the probability is that overworking his brain and system shattered one of the strongest of human intellects, subdued one of the most ambitious of human wills, and destroyed one of the most gigantic of human bodies.

We hear that the terminating form of disease was pulmonary paralysis or apoplexy; that for some days previous he had been sinking; that at length he became personally sensible that his end was nigh; that he gathered around him such members of his family as were accessible; that he blessed them; that he received the last offices of the church, and speedily expired.

These statements force upon the mind the inquiry, how is it that while Russia and Russian proceedings are almost as unknown to us, living within a few hours distance, as are the events which transpire within the empire of the black monarch of Japan, and more so than the characteristics of that China which is so sealed against the "Western devils," how is it that the phenomena of the Czar's last hours have become so well known? If we are referred to telegraphic messages and to private letters between nameless correspondents, we do not feel that we have sufficient data in which to rest even a moderately strong faith. Have the Western Powers spies in the Russian Court? Were these spies in attendance on the scheming and dying Czar? If that were the case, would the spies be so easily able to communicate with their masters? and would their masters so speedily and in detail inform the public?

The phenomena of the Czar's death are infinitely less important, however, than the great and awful fact that he is dead—the man who was deemed as a deity by his own people, and is held to have been a demon by so many millions beyond the boundaries of his all but limitless dominions!

For thirty years his trained and fertile intellect and indomitable will ruled and extended an empire which forces on human thought the Assyrian and Babylonian empires of the ancient world, and Rome in less distant ages, not as they are, living only in history, but as they gloated over the conquered, and grew great by conquests, and flourished in their pomp and pride, until the stricken and bleeding earth yawned, and patient Heaven became weary of their pride and their crimes; and as they fell before the lightning shock of war, or dwindled to irreparable ruin, for on them the sword of man and the elements of nature wrought the righteous purposes of "The King of Kings and Lord of Lords!"

Yet it were hard to accomplish, were we required definitively to solve the problem of Nicholas' character. If we were able to assume infallibly, as a starting point, that his life to the age of twenty-nine was spent, not in the tranquil connubial and domestic enjoyments which are pictured as having been his, but in wily preparation of schemes of ambition, plotting the death of Alexander, and terrifying the feeble tyrant Constantine, lest he should mount a throne which Nicholas determined to make vacant, we should have a key, a visible clue to his motives and designs. Ambition might have been indigenous, although latent; but developed and cherished by circumstances and afterthought. This cannot be absolutely determined. It may be pretty safely guessed. We know that Alexander died suddenly and mysteriously. Grim death obtained abruptly; not warningly to threaten, but fatally to strike and the illuminated and joyous town was changed for the dark and joyless tomb. Whether the blow fell from the Supreme, whether from the agents of Nicholas; whether Alexander's suspected leanings to Roman Catholicism, yet albeit spiced with Quakerism, brought on him the power of the Greek Church, we cannot say. It is no new thing for people to destroy an idol once adored.

Thirty years have passed since that event. Perhaps among the mournful or threatening ghosts of the multitudes whom Nicholas slaughtered when he ascended the bloody steps of his own throne, combining with other legions from "said Sarmatia," from the mountain passes of Circassia, from the snows of Siberia, from the plains of Hungary, still swelled by hosts upon hosts from Olmeuitzu, Silistria and Sinope; from Alma, Balaklava, Inkermann and Sebastopol, (so fully finishing a reign so bloodily begun,) perhaps, we say, Alexander was there, at the head of the witnesses against, as the head of the sufferers from, the despot, as he crossed the "shaded frontier" to the plains of the departed!

The Russian despot, Nicholas, is dead. Will the war therefore cease? Alexander the Second has ascended the vacated throne he has accepted the iron sceptre; he is said to have avowed the policy of his father! Probably no one (Nesselrode and Gortschakoff included,) so well knows what were the true principles and intentions of the fallen Czar. We have heard, until we are sick of hearing, the statement that Nicholas was the sole cause and prop of Russian aggressive despotism. That he was its most visible embodiment, we believe; that he cherished it, we cannot doubt. His gigantic form, his cool, calm, fearless intrepidity, the freedom with which he mingled with his subjects, his kind words to the serf, his close identification with the priesthood of the Greek Church, his use of endearing titles and diminutives when speaking of himself or his people, his inherited headship over the Holy Alliance, the praises he continued to elicit from all quarters of the civilized world as to his sagacity, learning and power, were doubtless ministrant to the one great object of his personal existence, and expressive of the dynastic yearnings and purposes of his house and of the empire. But however much a monarch may foster or modify a national spirit, he can neither create nor extinguish it. Many Englishmen have lived through various reigns; those of George the Third and Fourth and King William. What were the predominant peculiarities of those monarchs, everybody knows. They were all infinitely inferior to Nicholas in all the leading features of his mental and governing character; but did the Saxon spirit expire under the mental feebleness of the first, the despicableness of the second, or the amiable mediocrity of the third? No.

We cannot define, but we may recognize and illustrate the spirit of a nation, an empire or an age. That of Russia is antagonistic to contentment and peace. Alexander might have a choice of his father's throne—accepting the influence of its antecedents and obligations; the throne without them, but personally menaced by speedy death, or of an abdication such as that which was chosen or accepted by his uncle Constantine.

He appears to have accepted the first. What Alexander is, or can do, remains to be developed. Were he disposed, he would find it difficult to get rid of the officials of the Court and Empire. They could get rid of him infinitely more easily than he could dispose of them. He has accepted; he cannot avert his fate! Had he chosen a peaceful privacy, we know tolerably well that Constantine, Nickoff or Michael would either of them gladly mount the throne. Some argue that the greater number of weightier arguments are on the side of probable honorable peace. Would that our differing conclusions might be fulfilled. We fear that, as their reasoning seems more injurious than powerful, their inferences are not to be accepted.

Leek, March 12, 1855. X. Y. Z.

Philoskomonos Again.

The keen irony of our correspondent, on "Progression," has by some been taken in earnest as a serious advocacy of the measures he meant to put down! The following is not a solitary instance in our Home Correspondence:

Morehouse, La., March 28, 1855.

In the last number of the Advocate I read a piece headed "Progression." The Lord deliver us from such progression. Why, an organ in a Methodist Church! And, worse still, our very life-blood and substratum of Methodism, class meetings, are to be done away! Yes, kind reader, our class meetings are ridiculed, looked upon as old fogyism! And again—would you believe it?—this writer Advocates pews, and they to be rented at that! Did you ever? Why if a preacher here in Louisiana, where we have more Catholics to contend with than any other Southern State, were to advocate such views, he would at once be set down as an incorrigible heretic, and would not pass muster in the First Quarterly Conference. The writer of "Progression" cannot be a preacher, if even a Methodist in name. He cannot, he a friend to Southern Methodism, for if he were permitted to effectually destroy Methodism by any means, the three subjects he introduces, "organ, pews, and no more class meetings," would more effectually do it than all others in combination! And then, as if we were not effectually destroyed, I think (not having the paper by) he advocates reading sermons! How long, let me ask all Methodists, do you think our Church would stand were these innovations introduced? We can speak for one and a large family of Methodists, should either of his innovations he introduced, not another week would we continue our membership in that Church. As to reading sermons, that would not cause us to withdraw our membership; but we wish it distinctly understood that his first sermon would be the last we should hear. I love old Methodism too well to tolerate or sanction such fatal stabs as are advocated by the above writer. I do think such firebrands ought not to obtain a place in our papers; all such should be thrown under the table or disposed of by exposing them to the action of what Prometheus is said to have stolen from Heaven. May peace, joy and contentment be yours. Your brother,

Bartholomew.

SHARON, MISSISSIPPI.

Our colleges here are are doing well, male and female. The Female College, under the superintendence of J. W. Shelton, has opened with fair prospects. Judging from the favorable impression the President and Faculty have made upon the community, they cannot fail to succeed well.

Yours, J. Matthews.

Echo.—The shadow of a sound—a voice without a mouth and, words—without a tongue. Echo, though represented as a female, never speaks until she is spoken to; and, at every repetition of what she has heard, continues to make it less, instead of more; an example recommended to the special attention of tattlers and scandal mongers.

A Methodist University on a Magnificent Scale.

The Northwestern University, near Chicago, Ill., will go into operation by November next. The buildings are under way, and will be advanced by that time sufficiently for a beginning.

There is somewhat about this new enterprise, the largeness of its endowment, beauty and convenience of location, strength of faculty and happy financial management, that has for a good while engaged our attention, and we propose to lay a few items before our readers. Besides the curiosity of the thing, it may serve us of the South as a work to work up to. It is more worthy of Methodism in the United States than anything of the kind yet enterprised.

Rev. Mr. Hill, a presiding Elder of Indiana Conference, was in our office last week and told us about it. It seems the Chicago Methodists had on hand a piece of town property for the site of the proposed institution. But judging the site an ineligible one, and judging also wisely that a good location was half an endowment, they were casting about for a better. After receiving various proposals, and visiting various places, they heard of a piece of ground on the lake ten miles off, and the committee, taking an omnibus, went to look at it. The ground lay beautifully, sloping toward the lake, no buildings on it; three hundred and fifty acres. They determined at once to locate there.

The owner had been asking $8,000 for it, but getting wind of what was going on, raised to $25,000. They bought it promptly, and made the first payment.

A town was laid off, named after a generous laymun, who had been forward to plan and help Dr. Evans. The lots, as they say in Georgia, sold like hot cakes. Besides being put in funds to take up the remaining notes due, there was some $100,000 on hand for building and endowment, and only a moiety of the lots disposed of!

To finish the good luck, what should happen about this time but a railroad company runs a track from Chicago through the new town! Real estate rose accordingly. There is no telling what the University is worth. No begging, and the bag full, and only a part of the funds realized. The Chicago Christian Advocate furnishes us with the following:

"For the information of our more remote readers and many inquirers, we deem it not amiss to again notice that Evanston is located on the Lake Shore Railroad, whose depot is located about half a mile from the site of the University. The village, which of course as yet exists mostly in posse, on paper, is beautifully, and, we believe, salubriously situated on two high gravel ridges, the first one running along the lake shore and rising gradually back from the lake for about a quarter of a mile to about twenty-five feet above the lake, back about half a mile further, till it reaches the west ridge which is some ten or fifteen feet higher. These ridges are in places covered with fine groves of oak and command a beautiful and extended view of the lake. The University grounds are located centrally and longitudinally in the village, and include thirty acres. A large number of persons from abroad, and of the principal citizens of this city, have purchased lots during the short time that they have been in the market, and several dwellings, including an inn, built with special reference to the wants of the place, are now in progress of erection. The prices of lots range from $300 to $500, the proceeds of which are secured sacredly to the University fund.

"The Garrett Biblical Institute forms no part of the Northwestern University, but was founded by a lady (resident in this city) whose name it bears, and has its own separate charter. The institutions are located in neighborship, which is appropriate. Though in fiscal and faculty matters they are two, yet in sympathy and fraternity they are one, and will mutually aid each other."

Dr. Dempster is at the head of the Biblical Institute. The lady alluded to, it is said, donated $100,000 for its establishment.

From the last annual report of the Board of Trustees of the Northwestern University we republish the arrangement agreed upon for the professorships, in the college, of literature science and the arts:

1. A Professorship of Moral Philosophy and Logic.
2. A Professorship of Intellectual Philosophy, Political Economy and and the Philosophy of History.
3. A Professorship of Rhetoric and English Literature.
4. A Professorship of Mathematics.

The following chairs have been filled with young men, who have signified their acceptance, and have given sufficient evidence of rare ability for their respective departments. They are expected, however, to devote a year or more in traveling in Europe and to study in the best Eastern Universities, comparing their own modes of instruction and profiting by the the society of the ripest scholars of the age. Two of them will visit Europe the coming fall.

The chair of Moral Phylosophy and Logic has been assigned to the President.

The chair of Rhetoric and English Literature will be filled by Rev. Abel Stevens, A. M., of New-York city, the present able and popular editor of the National Magazine.

The chair of the Greek Language and Literature will be occupied by Rev. Wm. D. Godman, A. M., of Dickinson College, Pennsylvania.

The Chair of Mathematics, by Henry S. Noyes, A. M., President of Newbury Seminary at Newbury, Vt.

The total interments in the city of New Orleans for the week ending on the 7th inst., was 114. Among the number was a Creole lady one hundred years of age.

THE POLICY OF ALEXANDER.

The Vienna Conference, etc. etc.

New York, April 6.—The details of the news per steamship Baltic are of considerable interest, though not of great importance. Below we give the material points of the news:

The Czar's Policy.

The addresses issued by the new Czar, Alexander II., to his diplomatic representatives and the councils of the Empire are mild, but those to the army are quite warlike in their tone.

There is strong evidence that Alexander aided his father, the late Emperor, in all his warlike plans.

The Vienna Conference.

The latest dispatches from the Vienna Conference show that it is progressing favorably. The second point had been settled or nearly so, and very strong hopes of peace were entertained. The question, however, rests on the third of the four points, under which the allies formerly agreed to peace.

The veteran Count Nesselrode will go to Vienna on the part of the Russian Emperor when the negotiations become critical and it is expected will take a prominent part in the proceedings.

It was currently rumored that the new basis on which peace is hoped to be obtained, is an arrangement including the freedom of the Black Sea in ships of all nations, the opening of the navigation of the Danube, and the erection of Turkish forts in Asia.

Turkey, it is stated, is determined to maintain, in an undiminished form, her sovereignty of the Dardanelles, and protests earnestly against the Christians in her Empire being placed under the protection of any foreign powers. She also desires that Prussia shall participate in the proceedings of the Conference.

Sebastopol.

The Russian General, Osten Sacken, telegraphs to St Petersburg that on the night of the 10th of March, new redoubts were erected three hundred yards in front of Kamelof bastion.

The health of the Allied troops is reported to have been very satisfactory at last accounts from the Crimea.

The English position was exceedingly well fortified.

The Russians had received considerable reinforcements.

A council of war had been held by the Allied commanders, at which it was resolved to immediately commence active operations against Sebastopol.

The fire of the English batteries had caused two Russian steamers in the harbor to leave their moorings.

The Turkish troops in the Crimea, under Omar-Pasha, reached 35,000, and were rapidly increasing.

It was reported that Prince Menschikoff had died of fever at Sebastopol, but the rumor is from questionable authority.

The Russians had sunk three more ships of war in the harbor of Sebastopol.

It was reported that Gen. Gortschakoff had been ordered to take Eupatoria, now occupied by the Turks, at any price, and it is added that he was preparing to do so.

Conveyance of Troops

An Anglo-French squadron of 25 steamers, was on its way to Genoa, for the purpose of conveying Sardinian troops to the Crimea.

The French Government had chartered the new Liverpool and Philadelphia screw steamship, City of Baltimore, for six months, to transport troops to the seat of war.

French Hospital Burnt.

The French Hospital at Constantinople had been burnt and one hundred persons perished in the flames.

There is no other general news of importance by the Baltic.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

The circular of Messrs. Milligan, Evans & Lampriere quotes the Liverpool Cotton Market as firm at the close at the advance already reported, the improvement being mostly in the better qualities. The sales of the week including those to speculators, were 87,500 bales. The authorized quotations on Friday evening were, for Fair Orleans, 5¾ pence; Middling Orleans, 5 3-16 pence; Fair Uplands, 5¼ pence; Middling Uplands, 5 pence, and Middling Mobiles 5 1-16 pence per pound. The stock of cotton in port was estimated at 611,000 bales, of which 422,000 bales were American.

London Markets

In the London market Sugar was easier, but prices were not quotably lower. Coffee was quiet, but firm at unchanged rates. Rice was very dull of sale.

Slavery in Cuba

Washington, April 8.—The views of the Spanish Minister of State have been greatly perverted, owing to a bad translation of his remarks in the Cortes. The true meaning of his speech, according to information received by the Spanish Minister here, is, that Spain has no idea of abolishing slavery in Cuba.

Washington, April 9.—The Intelligencer to-day contains Senor Luzuriaga's letter to Gen. Concha, stating that the Cortes proclaimed, at its sitting on the 8th of March, a firm resolution to protect slave property in Cuba, and that slaveholders in the island will have their property assured to them, whatever changes may take place in the Government.

Latst from California.

New York, April 7.—The steamship Illinois arrived today from Aspinwall, with the California mails to the 16th of March, and about $750,000 in specie. Her advices are of but little importance.

None of the suspended banking houses were expected to resume payment.

The yield from the mines was abundant, and the accounts were favorable for the receipt of a large amount of gold from the interior.

The San Francisco markets were quiet at about previous rates.

Swiss Paupers for New Orleans.

New York, April 7.—A number of Swiss paupers are reported by the American Consul at Zurich to have been shipped on board a vessel for New Orleans.

Naval Preparations.

Norfolk, Va., April 6.—The sloop-of-war Portsmouth, from the Pacific and South American stations, arrived here to-day, landed her mail, and immediately left under sealed orders, probably for Havana.

Action of our Government upon the Cuban Outrages.—The Washington correspondent of the New York Herald continues to assert confidently that the Cabinet will take immediate and energetic steps to obtain redress for the late Spanish outrages, and the Union still holds its menacing tone. We trust that it may end in something more than smoke. The Herald's correspondent says:

A remarkable change has taken place in our affairs with Spain. The Government is no longer an applicant, suing for justice, which has been withheld from the United States for years, under promises of redress, having assumed the responsibility, even at the eleventh hour, to act with firmness and dispatch. The almost every day receipt by the Government, of some fresh outrage committed on our people, has produced the change above stated in its policy to Spain, which even the false report put forward by the Union in this city, in the Black Warrior affair, has not been able to overcome.

I am happy in being able to assure you that the policy now resolved upon by the Government has the Cabinet with it as a unit in sentiment, and that sentiment adopts immediate action for the recent insults which our flag has been made to suffer under, and orders to obtain redress have been forwarded to those who will too gladly see them carried into execution. One vastly important feature, brought about by the recent transactions in and about Cuba, reflecting upon our national reputation is, that whilst the Government will not encourage filibustering, it will not, for the future, find it incumbent upon her to listen to the various reports of schemes on foot for invasion, which for months past her attention has been drawn to by Spanish officials in and out of the United States.

So well assured of this determination on the part of our Government are the leaders of the expedition, that but a few weeks since was checked through the activity of Marcy and the President, that re-organization is taking place, and from the city of New York alone the Cuba Junta report to their compeers in this city their ability to furnish from two to three thousand men at but a few days' notice. In New Orleans, and in one or two other Southern States, large numbers have enlisted for the expedition, and of these facts the Government at Washington are fully aware, but the enterprise will be allowed to proceed to its destination without any real opposition from the United States.

Schooner L. F. Rogers Foundered at Sea.—Captain Collier, of the schooner L. F. Rogers, and crew came passengers on the schooner Venice, from Brazos St. Iago. Capt. C. reports he left Mobile with a cargo of lumber, bound to Brazos St. Iago, and on the 2d inst., in lat. 26 deg. 6 min. North, long. 96 deg. 50 min. West, in a severe hurricane, sprung a leak, when all hands went to the pumps, but finding it impossible to keep her free, and fearing she would capsize, had both masts cut away, and cleared the stern boat, and all hands took to her as the schooner went down and made for the nearest land. About 10 o'clock at night, discovered land about 10 miles to the southward of the Rio Grande, then proceeded to the mouth of the river, and two days afterward arrived at Brazos St. Iago and took passage on the schooner Venice, Capt. Fish, for this port. Capt. Collier states that himself and crew lost everything with the exception of what they stood in.

A gentleman in California has ordered from this city, says the New York Times, a splendid service of gold plate, which is to be shipped on Saturday. It consists of three hundred and fifty pieces, comprising dinner, desert and tea services, from massive center pieces, vases, tureens, etc., to cigar stands and toothpicks. All the pieces are elaborately chased, representing characteristic scenes among the mines and the whole service is valued at $15,000.

EXTRACTS FROM FOREIGN PAPERS.

From the Crimea.

By way of Germany, Constantinople letters of the 1st of March have been received. They publish accounts of the attack made by the French, in the night between the 23d and 24th of February, upon the redoubts erected by the Russians in front of the left flank of the fortifications of Sebastopol, and in some measure explain the contradiction existing between the dispatch of Prince Menschikoff relative to that affair and the dispatches from the French quarters. The latter represent the French as having stormed the redoubts, and completely defeated the Russians; Prince Menschikoff's dispatch, on the other hand, stated that the French had been repulsed with a loss of 600 men.

It appears that the French did take the redoubts by storm, but then found themselves exposed to a murderous fire from the batteries, and even from the guns of some Russian vessels anchored in the port. The position was not tenable, and, having destroyed the redoubts they had taken, they withdrew with about 400 men hors de combat, of which number 100 were killed.

Prospects of Peace.

The Moniteur, of March 15, publishes the following letter from Vienna, addressed to the Frankfort Journal:

The Emperor Francis Joseph has just sent His Imperial Highness, the Archduke William, to St. Petersburg to present his condolences to the Empress Dowager and to the new Emperor, and to congratulate His Majesty Alexander II. on his accession to the throne.

These are simply acts of courtesy, customary between princes, but by no means proof of a modification of the policy of the court of Vienna. Its political programme is still the same which was fixed by its adhesion to the basis of peace, of the 8th of August, of the Western Powers, and by the conclusion of the treaty of alliance of the 2d of December. It is to defend the unchangeable interests of Austria and of Germany, the most sacred principles of European right and the balance of power in Europe, that Austria has buckled on her sword, and Austria armed already for some time, at great cost.

It would be superfluous to prove that it would be useless to think of the conclusion of peace before something or other has been decided in the Crimea. If the decision should be favorable to Russia, and that power should refuse to withdraw its previous concessions, or modify them in such guise as to render them illusory, the duty of Austria would be clearly to oppose energetically such hallucinations.

Slavery in Cuba.

At the session of the Cortes of the 8th of March, the following notice was made of the condition of affairs in Cuba. We translate from the Independance Belge.

Gen. Serrano—Gentlemen, a rumor is afloat that a conspiracy has been discovered in the Island of Cuba. [Sensation.] I demand of the Government to give us some information in relation to an event of such importance.

Senor Luzuriaga [Great attention.] The Government has received, indeed, dispatches announcing that a conspiracy had been discovered at Havana. Captain-General Concha took on the spot all measures necessary to maintain order and to quiet the peril immediately. I can, in this immediate Chamber the assurance that the possession of an Island so important is in no danger. The Government has decided to neglect nothing for the avoidance and suppression of every threatening eventuality. Troops will be sent, if necessary, to reinforce those who are already at the disposition of Lieutenant-General Concha. Numerous arrests have been made. In a few days we shall know what to believe concerning the character of this abortive movement. At present we cannot say whether the excitement came from the government or from a party which desires annexation; there is, however, the circumstance, that the conspirators stirred up ardent partizans of the maintenance of slavery. That is another reason why their conduct should be repudiated in Spain, where, without making any attack upon property, there is serious thought of putting an end, as soon as possible, to this scourge of humanity. [Long approbation—long agitation.]

Senor Olozaga—I have the honor to propose to the Assembly the following resolution:

"Congress, profoundly satisfied with the explanations of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, declares that it gives its entire adhesion to the measures taken by the Cabinet in relation to the Island of Cuba."

Deathmen—I believe that I should do injustice to the patriotism of the Cortes, were I to dwell upon the merits of this proposition. It is enough that it should be presented for it to be voted for instantaneously by all the Representatives of the country.

Many Members—Yes, yes.

The proposition of Senor Olozaga was voted unanimously.

Immense Inundation on the Rhine—Seventy Villages Submerged

Rotterdam, March 7.—Accounts from the provinces of Guelderland and North Brabant state that in consequence of the driving ice of rivers having fixed itself in various points into barricades, a vast quantity of territory is now entirely under water. As many as seventy villages are submerged; and when it is considered that the inhabitants of these villages are mostly of the poorest class some idea may be formed of the great distress that prevails, and will for a long time prevail, among them.

Since 1820 such inundations have not been known in Holland. At Arnheim, enormous dams have been constructed in all haste, to prevent the entire town being submerged. The Utrecht railway will, it is apprehended, become impassable. In the village of Veenendaal the water covers the tops of the houses, most of which will be left undermined and in ruins. In most places, however, the water has simply overflowed the dams, which heretofore resisted the pressure of the accumulated waters in those districts, should the damage continue to be limited, the consequences will be but temporary; but in some cases the dams are broken, and the water has burst into the adjoining lands with a fatally irresistible force. In these districts the consequences will be of a more serious character, as a vast quantity of land will be thrown out of cultivation for many months, and vast numbers of laboring men will be thrown out of employment. Many cattle have been drowned, but in consequence of the excellent precautions used in equalizing to the people the moment of positive danger, comparatively few of our fellow-creatures have lost their lives by these lamentable casualties. A telegraphic message has just arrived from Bois-le-Duc, to the effect that one of the dams in the neighborhood has given way, and that others are expected to give way, and that a great part of the city is already under water.

Rotterdam, March 10.—Accounts from the Lower and Upper Rhine, and from the province of North Brabant continue to be of the most distressing description. Dear Bois-le-Duc, undermined and beaten down by the inundating waters, while others more on a level with their violence stand with their roofs peering above the surrounding flood. In one instance, in a village near Bois-le-Duc, the inhabitants had not the time to effect their escape before the waters dashed in, sweeping all before them.

Many poor creatures were drowned, though not so many happily, as under the circumstances might have been expected. To those who escaped, the only place of refuge was in the higher stories of their dwellings; and in many instances occurred the pitiable spectacle of men, women and children on the roofs of their cottages, whither no assistance could be conveyed to them in consequence of the enormous masses of ice dashing about on the surface of the encroaching waters. The village of Veenendaal has suffered severely; the inhabitants have left—i. e. have been driven from—their homes en masse, and may be seen bringing with them their children, their furniture, and whatever they could save, seeking shelter in the neighboring villages.

The church, which is situated on a rising ground, is almost the only building uninjured by the flood, and is consequently filled with poor creatures shut out from every other shelter. I hear many of them are there unable to move through sickness. Even when the water may have returned to its channel—and at the time I write it has begun to fall—a fearful scene of devastation will await the return of the inhabitants. Of winter crops, there will be none—not a potato nor a beet remains; the villages, in a manner too terrible to describe, are ruined, and for a time before its inhabitants can occupy it again.

In North Brabrant the flood is not so general, but it has broken down the dykes, so that the damage cannot improve of a fearful character. Several bridges have been carried away, and the town of Bois-le-Duc is a dismal island amidst a waste of water and ice. The surrounding villages are deserted, but when the dykes are repaired the water will again, for the most part, be bebitable. In one village, however, twenty houses were almost carried away by the flood, and seven of their occupants were drowned. It is 144 years ago since Holland was before visited with a similar destructive flood.

The Expedition to Search for Dr. Kane.—The government is now engaged in fitting out an expedition to search for Dr. Kane, who is supposed to be imprisoned among the icebergs of the North Pole. For this purpose, the steam propeller "City of Boston," was purchased, and for some time past has been laying at the Navy Yard. The City of Boston was built at Medford, near Boston, and for some years past has been employed in a line of propellers between Boston and Philadelphia. This vessel was very strongly built, and is driven by two steam engines, possessing power enough to give her headway against the most rapid currents on the coast of Long Island. She is five hundred and fifty tons burthen, and her model is sharp, long and narrow. For the past few days or two weeks this vessel has been upon the dock at the Navy Yard, undergoing a survey by the naval officers, who were to decide upon her sea qualities, her strength and her other capacities for the expedition to the North Pole. This Board has just reported, adversely to the City of Boston; the objection to her being mainly upon the ground that she was too large and unwieldy. The vessel that is now fixed upon for the expedition is yet upon the stocks at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. This last vessel is very strongly built, is only two hundred and fifty tons burthen, about half the size of the City of Boston, and was originally designed for a government light ship. It is intended to provide her with screw and engines for propelling, and to give her a full press of canvas. The vessel will be provisioned by Mr. Grinnell, Esq., whose generosity, it will be remembered, fitted out the expedition under Dr. Kane, and will probably be ready to sail from here on her members early about the first of June next.

The command of this expedition is to be given to the gallant Lieut. Hartstene, who for some time past has been the commander of the mail steamer Illinois, running between New York and Aspinwall, on the Californian route. Lieutenant Hartstene was born in the State of South Carolina, and entered the United States Navy in 1828, having now given nearly thirty years of his life to the naval service.

A Sad Affair.—The Pittsburgh Union publishes the following:

A few days ago a gentleman named Jacob Byerly, in this county, about four miles from Freeport, started to sell, under the following circumstances: His son had for some time been talking of going west, and on the day mentioned, came to the conclusion to start. Mr. B. was very much opposed to the idea, and did all in his power to prevent his offspring from going. The old gentleman stood in the doorway of his residence when the son departed, and gazed after him until he had vanished from his sight, when recalling tears commenced coursing down his cheeks, and he seemed perfectly overpowered with emotion. Mrs. Byerly, who was standing beside her husband, told him that there was no use in mourning as it could not be helped, and that he had better come into the house and part

Marriages.

On the 5th April, in Madison county, Miss., by Rev. H. Montgomery, Rev. F. A. Alford, of the Mississippi Annual Conference, to Miss Amarantha, daughter of Ernsmus and Lilly Williams, formerly of Louisiana.

Deaths.

Died—Mrs. Maria L. Shackelford, consort of Mr. John Shackelford, of Macon county, Ala., was born August the 2d, 1819, in Jones county, Ga., removed to Montgomery county, Ala., in 1823; united in marriage to Mr. Shackelford, Jan., 1842; professed religion and joined the M. E. Church in 1840, at a camp meeting in Augusta county, Ala., and died of disease of the heart Feb. 23d, 1855, about two hours after the attack. The even tenor of her life, joined with fixed religious principles well qualified her for all the relations of life; the summons was sudden, and awfully solemn, but she met it with fortitude, composure and resignation to the divine will; in her life was evinced the truth of the sentiment, "Christian is the highest style of man." Warmly attached to the church of her choice, she was always ready to do good, and to communicate to the wants of the sufferer; as a neighbor, she was kind and respected; as a child, dutiful; as a wife, she consulted the happiness of her husband. She has left husband, an aged mother and sister, with others, to mourn her loss. May they all meet her in the better land.

Mrs. Mary R. S. Jones, the daughter of Sidney and S. L. Waugh, was born near Fredricksburg, Va., and died of consumption on the 24th March, 1855, at the residence of her husband in Montgomery county, Ala., in the 32d year of her age.

In 1835 her parents removed from Virginia to Alabama, and settled in Autauga county, where she was married to Dr. Kennon Jones. She was taught to pray in childhood and in early life. Without making a profession of religion, she became a member of the M. E. Church. In 1853, under the ministry of Rev. S. Hurt, she experienced the converting grace of God in a very powerful manner, and from that time until the day of her death, as a faithful, devoted, consistent Christian. The last year of her life was one of intense suffering, yet she never murmured, but was always cheerful and happy, saying the grace of God was sufficient for her. I have never seen any one more patient in affliction, or more perfectly resigned to the will of the Lord.

When she felt that her last hour was at hand, she requested her husband and children to kneel by the bedside, and exhorted them always to pray and not to faint; besought her husband to be more spiritual; told her children to serve the Lord and meet her in heaven, and told them when temptations befell them, to remember the words of their dying mother. Soon after she died as none but a Christian can die, with no tormenting fear or gloomy anticipation, but full of faith, and joy, and peace. John W. Rush.

Fell asleep in Jesus, on the 27th March, Miss Julia E. Frizell. She was born in Lafourche parish, November 27th, 1831, the eldest child of James and Mary E Billin. Her unconsciousness, and simplicity, with a devotional spirit, were among her prominent characteristics, having always from childhood a reverence, and fond regard for the society of the religious.

Shortly after her marriage she gave the influence of her character to the cause of religion, by connecting herself with a branch of the visible church of Christ, and continuing an active and acceptable member of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and those who had the privilege of belonging to her class in the Sunday School will long remember the example and the wholesome instructions of their teacher.

The death of sister Frizzell was a happy one, and displayed in a eminent degree the nature, and power not of philosophy, but of Christianity. With her evidence not clear, for while she lingered upon the shores of time and clung to earth—not satisfied—"wanted the anointing,"—1 John, ii. 27. She was rewarded of the promises—the love of God—she "believed on the son of God, and had the witness in herself"—1 John, v. 10; "her joy was full"—St. John, xvi., 24. She found consolation in Christ, and great peace of mind.

Agreeably to her ardent request, on Sabbath the Lord's supper was administered to her by her pastor, and the solemnity of the occasion will not soon be forgotten by those who had the privilege of being present. It was a refreshing time.

Sister F. was constantly engaged in meditation, prayer, and retained her consciousness unto the last. She was anxious to join the loved ones that had gone before. She enquired of her auntif she thought we would recognize our departed friends in Heaven—she was answered in the affirmative. On the morning of the day she died, in an ecstacy of joy she remarked to her husband, "O, I see cousin Hellen (meaning sister Cross, who died about a year ago,) and I see so many bright angels." And again reviving from a sinking spell, she remarked to her aunt and those around her bedside, "Am I here? O, I thought I was gone—I saw Heaven—I am so happy."

Taking leave of her weeping husband and friends, and babe, she exhorted them to meet her in Heaven, expressing her entire readiness and willingness to depart and be with Christ. She requested her mother and friends to sing—

"Bright angels are from glory come,
They're round my bed, they're in my room,
They wait to waft my spirit home,
All is well: all is well."

Isaac Worthington breathed his last on Wednesday, March 28th, at his residence in Washington county, Mississippi, aged nearly 63. He was a native of Muhlenburg county, Ky., and moved to the State almost 30 years ago, being one of the earliest settlers in the "Swamp." He was the son of religious parents—Methodists—but did not himself join the Church until 30 years of age; a circumstance in his history which he lamented to the writer of this a week before his demise. For years after he had migrated to this State, there was but little preaching; but so soon as an opportunity offered, he again formally attached himself to the Church, and from that time to the hour of his death continued a steady, consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He has been, indeed, the chief stay of the Church in this county, and she can ill spare so liberal and useful a member. He filled from time to time offices of honor and trust, having been Judge in two different courts—that of Police, at the period of his decease.

On his death-bed he gave his children a solemn charge to devote themselves to their God and Saviour; extending this also to his brothers, for whose spiritual and eternal welfare he showed the deepest interest, urging two of them, still unconnected with the "Sacramental Host of God's elect," to attach themselves to the Church and live for God and Heaven. Respecting himself, he affirmed he had no anxiety. "God," he declared, "had for Christ's sake pardoned all his sins, and he was going to Heaven." Repeatedly during his sickness he expressed his entire resignation to the will of his Heavenly Father. He has left a consort, also a member of the same Church, and eight children—several quite young—to fill their brief period of probation on earth and secure a meetness for the blessed society of just men made perfect, in the kingdom of their Heavenly Father.

W. McCallen.

Washington, Miss., March 31, 1855.

Died—In Bossier parish La., March 10, 1855, of Typhoid Pneumonia, Cornelia Salome, only daughter of Johnson and Catherine Slippy. Little Cornelia was born in Pickens county, Ala., on the 12th November, 1844. She was one of those sweet-spirited, kind-hearted and obedient little girls that one had only to know in order to love. She had been under pious instruction from her cradle to the time of her death. We have no hesitancy in saying that her spirit is now among the angelic hosts on high. The day before her death she said to her father, "I see the good Man!" and added, "Don't you love him, Pa?" Being answered affirmatively, she replied, "So do I." On the next day, the God she loved took her from the afflictions and sorrows of this lower world, to enjoy himself forever in Heaven. May he sanctify this dispensation of his providence to the final salvation of the bereaved parents and brethere of this good little girl—Amen!

THINGS ON THE BOEUFF.

A brother, writing from Holmesville, La., amongst other things, says these. The writer pays for his paper long in advance. We are glad to find a man, and hear from him, too, who is exactly suited. How tastee differ! Not very long ago, somebody complained of the oloes small type. Here is one who would not have it otherwise for the world. Another four bite would not move him; a few paltry cents is nothing in his estimate of a good paper:

"I get your paper regularly, and in good time. I am so well pleased with it, that if you should ever take it into your head to raise even another "four bits" on it, you need not four driving me off your list. My head is quite frosty, but I like small type, because it makes room for more matter, and I don't think we can have too much of such as I find in the Advocate.

We are in one of the richest and healthiest parts of this State, and yet we have scarcely the necessaries of life, because we are shut out from your city by low water. Our stream (Buyou Bœuff) is generally navigable by Christmas, or sooner. But we have not been able to get off a hogshead of sugar or bale of cotton this season, and there is, I think, between Washington and Cheneyville, at least one million dollars worth of these articles on this Bayou. There is not more than half corn enough to last until the present crop may be used. We had a fine prospect for a crop of corn up to the 22d March, when it was all killed by the frost, and every one had to plant again."

The Spider's Love of Her Progeny.—All her hubs, one by one, may be torn from her body without forcing her to abandon her hold of the cocoon in which she has wrapped her eggs; and if, without mangling the mother, it be skillfully removed from her, and suddenly thrown out of sight, she instantly loses all her activity, seems paralyzed, rolls herself into tremulous limbs as if mortally wounded. If the bag be returned, her ferocity and strength are restored the moment she has perception of its presence, and she rushes to her treasure to defend it to the last. [Professor Hentz.

The Opelousas Railroad.

The Thibodaux Minerva, of the 7th inst., in referring to the earnings of this road for the month of March, which are considered in the highest degree satisfactory, adds the following welcome and excellent remarks:

The work on the road, at this time, is progressing very rapidly—there being over six hundred laborers employed on the sections between the west bank of the Lafourche and Tigerville. The best of feeling and harmony seems generally to prevail on all sides and from every quarter. The management is represented to be the best and most satisfactory—all owing to the business capacities of the President and new Board of Directors, who seem to have at heart the interest of the company, and neglect nothing that has a tendency to increase the interest and augment the zeal of those whose good the road, when completed, is destined to effect.

We are glad to hear that so many laborers are employed, and that the work is progressing so rapidly and satisfactorily in all respects. Only twenty-five or thirty miles have to be completed to open up the entire business of several wealthy and populous parishes; to bring a vast amount of valuable produce to this market, that now seeks other markets through other outlets; to enable the mails, passengers, parcels, goods, merchandise, etc., to reach the various Texas ports in a much shorter time than it now takes; all of which will so increase the revenues, enhance the value of the stock, and add to the credit of the Company, as to make it self-sustaining and lucrative, and enable the Directory to push forward the great enterprise with celerity and certainty. As soon as this road reaches Berwick's Bay, its future success may be set down as certain beyond all peradventure, for it must then enjoy a passenger and transportation traffic, the profits of which, alone, will enable the Directory to build twenty or thirty miles of road per annum. Let such a coalition of things as this be brought about, and the managers of the road will find no difficulty in reaching the ears and pockets of capitalists, should they deem the negotiation of a loan necessary or advisable. Hence we regard the early construction of the road to the point named as of momentous importance. In one sense, it will be almost equivalent to reaching the Texas line; for the half-way house will have been arrived at and passed—the worst, most expensive and difficult portion of the journey overcome. And, as soon as we penetrate the fertile regions of Texas, we will secure a mighty trade, which will continue to increase for many years, until it forms one of the principal pillars of our commercial greatness and strength. The day is not far distant when the trade of the country west of the Mississippi will be of as much value to this city as the trade of the country east of the Mississippi, leaving out, of course, those regions which are especial y made by nature tributary to this mart. Therefore, let the glorious prize be secured in time. We have much to contend against, much to overcome, much to subdue. Nothing can save us but the railroade.

Anecdotes of Catlin.

We have seen a most interesting letter, says the London Morning Advertiser, from a young man who has recently settled in Brazil, in which he speaks of a rencontre with Catlin, the celebrated ethnographer and traveler. He met him in Georgetown, Demerara, and was immediately recognized, although it was ten years since they had seen each other in the Egyptian Hall. "You won't know me," he said to Catlin, "it is ten years since you saw me." Catlin, in answer, pronounced his name in an instant. They proceeded together 1500 miles, "by land and by water, through forests and swamps and prairies," following the course of the Amazon, and we select the following incidents on the journey. The first, relating to Colt's pistols, contains a hint to some Old Chiefs in England. We must explain that Catlin had received the name of "Governor" from his youthful associate:

HOW THE OLD CHIEF WAS ASTONISHED BY A COLT.

The Governor had one of Colt's pistols in his belt, and one of his revolving rifles always in the hand, and I had the old Major with whose power you are somewhat acquainted. I had let out the idea that the Governor's gun could shoot all day without reloading, which made an illustration necessary. They were all anxious to see it "set in motion," and I placed the door of our tent, which was part of a cowskin stretched on hoop, at the distance of sixty or seventy yards, with a bull's eye in the centre. The whole village had assembled, and the Governor took his position, and went off—one! two! three! four! five! six! I then stepped up to him and told him that was enough, I presumed; and while the old Chief was assuring him that they were all convinced, and it was a pity to waste any more ammunition, the Governor was slipping the empty cylinder off, and another one on with six charges more, without their observing what he was doing. He offered to proceed; but all were satisfied that his gun would shoot all day without stopping, and this report traveled ahead of us to all the tribes we afterward visited in that region.

The next is a tiger story:

KEEP COOL, AND DON'T SPILL THE GRAVY.

One day when he had landed so, and most of our party were lying asleep on the boat, which was drawn under the shade of some large trees, the Governor and I had collected wood and made a large fire on the bank, two or three rods from the bont, over which we were roasting a fat pig which I had shot from the boat during the morning. I was squatted down on one side the fire, holding a short-handled frying-pan in which we had made some very rich gravy, which the Governor, who was squatted down opposite to me, was hulling over the pig, with an Indian wooden spoon. All of a sudden, I observed his eye fixed upon something over my shoulder, when he said to me in a very low tone: "Now, I want you to keep perfectly cool, and don't spill your gravy; there is a splendid tiger behind you!" I held fast to the frying-pan, and turning my head gradually around, I had a full view of the fellow, within eight paces of me, lying flat on his side, and with his paws lifting up and playing with the legs of one of our Spaniards, who had laid himself down upon his belly, and was fast asleep.

Our rifles were left in the boat! The Governor drew himself gradually down the bank, on his hands and feet, ordering me not to move; I was in hopes he would have taken his old Minie, but he preferred his own weapon, and getting it to bear upon the beast, he was obliged to wait some minutes for it to raise its head, so as not to endanger the poor Spaniard; at the crack of the rifle the animal gave a piercing screech, and leaped about 15 feet straight into the air, and fell quite dead. The Spaniard leaped nearly as far in a different direction; and at the same instant, from behind a little bunch of bushes on the opposite side, and not half the distance from our fire, and right behind the Governor's back, where he had been sitting, sprang the mate, which darted into the thicket and disappeared. We skinned this beautiful animal, which was shot exactly between the eyes, and after all hands had withdrawn to the boat, waited several hours in hopes that the other would show itself again, but we waited in vain, and lost our game.

Hopes the President will not Behead on Bamboo Him.—Extract from a letter of an officer on board the United States ship Vincennes, of the North Pacific expedition:

"The American clipper ship 'What Cheer,' Captain Baker, from Hong-Kong, bound to California with China emigrants, put into Loo-Choo in October last, in want of provisions and water. The Governor reported to our commanding officer that Captain Baker had been furnished with these articles to the amount of $157 66; that Captain B. paid $75 of this account, and thus sailed, leaving the balance of $82 66 unpaid. The amount due was paid by our commanding officer. This sum was trifling, but the Loo-Chooans are defenceless themselves, and with no consuls to take cognizance of the acts of foreign vessels, they are liable to gross outrages. The Loo-Choo Governor, in reporting this act of Captain Baker, did so with an amiable reluctance, and strenuously hoped that his Excellency, the President of the United States, would not cause the dishonest captain to be beheaded, nor even bambooed."

American Humor.

Coleridge, with admirable acuteness, has said that "there is such a thing as sciuntific wit." Therefore pure wit sometimes gives an intellectual pressure without making us laugh. The wit that makes us laugh most freely, is that which instantly accepts another man's premises, and draws a conclusion from them in its own favor. A country gentleman was once showing his improvements to the Prince de Ligne, and among other things pointed out to him a muddy spot which he called his lake.

"It is rather shallow, is it not?" said the Prince.

"I assure you, Prince, a man drowned himself in it."

"Ah, he must have been a flatterer, then," answered De Ligne.

Of the same kind is the story told of one of our old Massachusetts clergymen, Dr Morse. At an association dinner a debate arose as to the benefit of whipping in bringing up children. The Doctor took the affirmative, and his chief opponent was a young minister, whose reputation for veracity was not very high. He affirmed that parents often did harm to their children by unjust punishment from not knowing the facts of the case.

"Why," said he, "the only time my father ever whipped me was for telling the truth."

"Well," retorted the Doctor, "it cured you of it, did'nt it?" In wit of this sort there is always a latent syllogism.

Then, there is the wit which detects an unintentional bit of satire in a word of double meaning; as, where Sir Henry Wotton takes advantage of the phrase commonly used in his day to imply merely residence, and finds an undermeaning in it, saying: "that ambassadors were persons sent to lie abroad for the service of their Prince."

On the other hand, I think unconsciousness and want of intention, or at least the pretence of it, is more or less essential to the ludicrous. For this reason what may be called the wit of events is always ludicrous. Nothing can be more so, for example, than the Pope's sending a Cardinal's hat to John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, which arrived in England after Henry the Eighth had taken off that prelate's head. So, when Dr. Johnson said very gravely, one day, that he had often thought that if he had a barren he would dress all the ladies in white linen, the unintentional congruity of the speech with the character of the great moralist threw Boswell into an ecstacy of laughter. Like this is the ludicrousness of Pope Paul III., writing to the Council of Trent "that they should begin with original sin, observing a due respect unto the Emperor."

Captain Basil Hall, when he traveled in this country, found the Yankees a people entirely destitute of wit and humor. Perhaps our gravity, which we ought to have put him on the right scent, deceived him. I do not know a more perfect example of wit than something which, as I have heard, was said to the captain himself. Stopping at a village inn, there came up a thunder storm, and Captain Hall, surprised that a new country should have reached such a perfection in those meteorologic manufactures, said to a bystander, "Why, you have very heavy thunder here." "Well, yes," replied the man, "we du, considering the number of inhabitants."

Here is another story which a stage-driver told me once: A wag on the outside of the coach, called to a man by the roadside, who was fencing some very poor land—"I say, mister, what are you fencing that pasture for? It would take forty acres on't to starve a middle-sized cow." "Jesso; and I'm a feucin' of it to keep our kettle cool."

Now in the 'forty acre' part of this story, we have an instance of what is called American exaggeration, and which I take to be the symptom of most promise in Yankee fun. For it marks that desire for intensity of expression which is one phase of imagination. Indeed, many of these sayings are purely imaginative—as where a man said of a painter he knew, that "he painted a shingle so exactly like marble, that when it fell into the river it sunk." A man told me once, that the people of a certain country town were so universally dishonest, "that they had to take in their stone at night." In some of these stories, imagination appears yet more strongly and in that contradictory union with the understanding which lies at the root of the highest humor. For example, a coachman driving up some mountains in Vermont, was asked if they were as steep on the other side also? "Steep! chain-lightnin' couldn't go down 'em without the breechin' on!" I believe that there is more latent humor among the American people than in any other, and that it will one day develope itself and find expression through art. [J. R. Lowell's Lecture on Hudibras.

Anti-Scratching Machine.—The Yankee who invented the "Patent Hen Persuader" has found his match in another who has brought out an invention called the "Patent Never-Failing Garden Preserver, or Hen Walker." It consists of a small instrument, something like a spur, only considerably longer, which is attached to the hind part of the hen's leg, pointing at an angle of forty-five degrees toward the ground. When the hen, with this instrument on her legs, enters the garden in the spring after seeds, and puts her foot forward to scratch, the "walker" catches in the ground and forces her forward; and thus she is walked, in her efforts to scratch, entirely out of the garden. The Oswego Palladium says an agency has been opened in Oswego for the sale of these machines. It must be "hard scratching" about Oswego, even for hens without fetters.

Charity Hospital.—Report for the week ending Saturday evening:

Admitted	176	Died	25
Discharged	151	Remaining	516

Capt. Soria—Military honors were paid to the memory of their late Captain, by the Washington Artillery, on Saturday. Minute guns boomed solemnly on Lafayette square throughout the day, and added a funeral tinge to the gayety and joyousness inspired by the beautiful weather and the brilliantly thronged streets.

Railroad Slips.—One of the Lafayette horse cars was twice jerked from the track near Tivoli Circle on Sunday, by the horses, who were unusually restive. The excursion train on the Jackson road also ran off the track while returning to the city on Sunday evening. Nobody was hurt that we could hear of.

Sudden Death.—Yesterday afternoon, at about two o'clock, a man in seeming health was seen to walk across Lafayette Square, set himself on one of the sun benches, and fall over. Those who saw him fall—on going to him, found he was dead. The Coroner was called, and a verdict of apoplexy rendered. Nothing could be ascertained as to who the man was. He was dressed like a working man in cheap well-worn clothes; about five feet eight or nine inches high; apparently thirty-five years of age, black hair and whiskers, and partly bald; nationality unknown. The body lies in the corner room of the old Municipal Hall, and it not claimed to-day will be buried by the corporation.

Another Fatal Target-Shot.—On Sunday afternoon a man named James W. Angle, while fishing in the Fourth District, at the intersection of Second street and the Protection levee, was accidentally shot by one of a party who were firing at a target near him. He was carried home and died yesterday morning. Coroner Foshee went up and held an inquest last evening, and returned a verdict that the deceased came to his death from a pistol ball entering in the right side, penetrating the liver and stomach, said wound being accidentally inflicted by some person or persons unknown, while shooting at a target, at the time and place above mentioned. Angle was a native of Ohio, thirty six years of age. This accident was a singular coincidence; for on the previous Sunday, at nearly the same hour, the boy Hartmann was shot in the same way, while occupied in the same pastime, in the Third District.

The River.—The old Father of Waters is at last cutting his spring swell, and the forests of ships and steamers at the levee begin to look down upon the city. The current is very muddy and angry, and boats upon its bosom say quantity of drift, from which the waterwagoners are reaping a rich harvest. We observe that the water has got up to the sluices, and that the gutters of some of the streets are receiving a wholesome drenching without the aid of the Water Company.

Mortuary.—The total interments of the city for the week ending Sunday morning were 114—four of the persons deceased was a creole lady aged one hundred years. Another of the deceased was six years of age, and two others 75.

Another Murder, Probably.—Mr. McGoff, who resides at No. 24 Englehen street, in the Third District, went up the Opelousas Railroad on a hunting excursion on Tuesday last, and evening he was brought down in the cars, dangerously wounded with a load of shot in his abdomen and groin—conscious, but suffering great pain. He was found lying by the railroad about three miles from Mr Bonny's plantation, and twenty-three miles from Algiers. He says that he was shot in the thighs, some distance from the road, by a man named Fulmer, or Folmore, with whom he worked on the road some time ago, and that he was shot purposely; but for what cause he did not state. He was brought over home from the depot by a gentleman with his buggy, last evening, and is believed to be in a very dangerous condition. Word was sent to the Sheriff of St Charles parish to look out for Folmore.

General Intelligence.

LATER FROM MEXICO.

The steamship Mexico, Captain Forbes, arrived from Vera Cruz at an early hour Wednesday morning bringing dates from that city to the 8th inst., and from the city of Mexico to the 4th. The papers are entirely destitute of news.

Captain Forbes reports that the American bark Flash Wilson master from New York, arrived at Vera Cruz on the 7th inst., and the American bark Susan Hawes master, sailed for New York on the 8th inst., with a cargo of mahogany and hides.

The Eagle Comercio states that the military and civil functionaries at Vera Cruz had conducted in celebrating Holy Week, and the processions and ceremonies had been unusually brilliant.

Santa Anna had returned from his southern trip, and a report was current that he was about to start for Michoacan. His lady, on the anniversary of her birth, received at the palace the congratulations of the diplomatic corps. A paper at the capital having stated that she wore upon that occasion the ribbon of Maria Louisa, the Diario official corrects the statement and furnishes the important information that the Senora Presidenta has not yet received the insignia of that distinguished order.

The official paper at Potosi states that Alvarez had suffered a total defeat at Los Cajones in a battle with the government troops, losing all his artillery, fourteen pieces, and barely escaping with his life. No further particulars are given, and it only such battle took place the character of the defeat of Alvarez suffered was probably similar to many others the Mexican papers have announced.

Bands of robbers still continue to commit the most shocking excesses in many parts of the country, plundering, murdering, and carrying away women and girls.

Appointments of the Governor.—The following appointments have been made by Hon Hebert, in accordance with the requisitions of the Quarantine Law at the last session of the Legislature:

Resident Physician—H. D. Baldwin, M. D.

Members of the Board of Health on the part of the State—Zenon Trudeau, N. B. Benedict, M. D., J. H. Wilkinson, Jr., M. D.; Wendy Burke; James Graham; Theo. Thayer.

These gentlemen are charged, in connection with others, with important trusts. The public, not only of New Orleans and Louisiana, but of the valley of the Mississippi, expect much perhaps too much, from them. We hope they will discharge their duties faithfully, ably and vigorously. There is no use in having quarantine laws unless those laws are rigidly enforced. We congratulate the community upon the appointments that have been made.

Public School Examination.—We acknowledge the receipt of an invitation from Mr. A Bourges Superintendent of the Public Schools in the Third District to attend their annual examination and exhibition which takes place in accordance with the following schedule. The examination hours are from 9 A M to 3 P. M., and the exhibition takes place on Tuesday, the 24th, at the U. S Hotel.

Monday, April 9th, 7th Ward Boys' School, corner Good-children and Elysian Fields streets.

Tuesday, April 10th, 7th Ward Girls' School, corner Frenchmen and Morales streets.

Wednesday, April 11th, 7th Ward Boys' and Girls' School, Bretonne Market, corner Burgundy and Bayou road.

Thursday, April 12th, Lake School, Milneburg.

Friday, April 13th, 8th Ward Boys' School.

Monday, April 16th, 4th Ward Girls' School, Marigny, street, between Breutmen and Craps

Tuesday, April 17th, Washington Boys' School, corner Louisa and Moreau.

Wednesday, April 18th, Washington Girls' School, corner Piety and Moreau streets

Thursday, April 19th, Hancock School, near the Barracks.

Friday, April 20th, Boys' High School, Frenchmen street, between Breutmen and Cassadiy streets.

Monday, April 23d, Girls' High School, No 45 Mandeville street.

We learn from the Philadelphia papers that the fire companies of that city, which rejected the new fire ordinance, have since conducted themselves in a very disorderly manner. The Independence Hose Company paraded through the streets with its apparatus, and a large lamp fastened to the carriage, upon which was the following inscriptions: "Independent now—Independent forever;" "Pay one, pay all;" "Follies of the Select and Common Councils;" "Downfall of the Fire Department;" "Farewell run." The novel parade attracted much attention. Several other companies made a similar parade at midnight they tolled their bells and placed their flags at half-mast. There were numerous alarms of fires, but the police were in sufficient force to put down all roadyism, so that nothing serious occurred.

Much excitement exists in Baltimore in regard to the ship James Chester, which vessel was picked up at sea, after having been abandoned by her crew, by the British ship Marathon, and carried safely into Liverpool. It is thought and believed here that the crew of the J. C. murdered the captain. A letter has been received by her owners saying that she was in good condition, and had been scuttled at the water line. Two of her boats were found to be gone and one remained on board. The cargo of the J. C. is estimated to be worth about $150,000.

A man named Chambers and another named Lettleier, of Barbour county, Ala., recently had some difficulty, and finally exchanged several shots at each other the one with a rifle and the other with a double-barreled shot gun, ending in Chambers' getting shot through the head and killed.

An intelligent officer of the army writes from Fort Laramie, under date of Jan 24th, to a friend in Buffalo, that since the massacre at the thirty persons by the Sioux, trade with that nation has been prohibited and the traffic of powder and lead has been stopped in his section of the country. All the Indians on the Missouri, north and east of us, will not sell their furs for any thing but Ammunition, arrow heads, etc., preparatory to opening hostilities, which they declare they will commence in the spring, and drive all the soldiers out of the country.

North River Giving Out.—The Albany Argus says: "The experience of the last few days has developed an alarming state of facts, that the Hudson river is hardly navigable for the larger classes of vessels, and even vessels of ordinary draught ground on the bars below Albany. The evil has been increasing for years, and has this year arrived at a state which promises the most disastrous consequences in an interruption of travel, involving severe pecuniary loss."

In Sullivan county, Ohio, one of the candidates for county clerk was pledged to give one-half of the proceeds of the office to the widow of the late clerk, and the other promised, in the event of his election, to marry the widow.

Mysterious.—A Probable Murder.—Coroner Underwood yesterday held an inquest upon the body of a female, in a horribly decomposed state, at the foot of Paddy's Hen and Chickens. The woman's hands were crossed and tied before her. Every appearance of the body when found fully confirms the belief that this unfortunate creature has been most foully murdered and cast into the river to obliterate all traces of detection. [Memphis American.

Suit for Damages.—Hobson & Son, of Richmond, Va., have brought a suit against the Washington and New Orleans Telegraph Company to recover damages in the sum of $17,000, sustained by them in consequence of an error made in a dispatch sent by them to their Southern correspondent. They ordered five hundred bales of cotton, and the operator at Montgomery made it twenty-five hundred.

A young man named Richard J. Choate, son of Thomas W. Choate, of Jones county, Georgia, was shot and killed by a peddler, named Morris, on Wednesday the 27th ult. Nothing is known of the cause of the shooting. The peddler had called for the sale of his wares, and with the young man was walking on the piazza when the report of the pistol was heard. Morris attempted to escape, but was arrested, and after examination, committed for trial at the next term of the Superior Court.

Commodore Perry, in a letter to Messrs. Lawrence & Co., of Boston, in regard to the trade between this country and Japan, says:

"It strikes me that woolen cloths of assorted qualities would be more acceptable to the Japanese than the cottons and these should be chiefly of the darker colors. But with regard to the colors, selections may be made by reference to the drawings of costumes which are to appear in the report of the Japan expedition to be published during the present year."

River Intelligence.—The St. Louis Republican of the 31 says:

The Mississippi at this point was on a stand yesterday. The Upper Mississippi is reported in the same condition, with a good stage to Keokuk. Thirty inches on the lower rapids, and heavy floating ice between Rock Island and Burlington. We had no report from the Missouri yesterday. Several boats are due from that river. The Illinois river is on a stand, bank high, and in many places overflowed.

Interesting from Spain.—The Minister of Foreign Affairs announced in the Spanish Cortes, on the 5th ult., that the Government entertained a serious thought of putting an end, as soon as possible, to slavery in Cuba as all the conspirators lately arrested there were the ardent partisans of the maintenance of slavery. The announcement is represented to have been received with loud approbation.

The minister further stated that he entertained hopes that the differences between Spain and the United States would be satisfactorily arranged. M. Isaacs, in reply, said that what the country wanted was to see them honorably settled.

Later from Texas.

The steamship Mexico, Capt Lawless, arrived from Galveston at an early hour Tuesday morning, bringing dates to the 7th inst.

The gazette of the Brazos has the following paragraph:

His Royal Highness, the Duke Paul Wilhelm of Wurtemburg, has stirred at Galveston. The Duke has a high reputation in Europe as a traveler and man of science. He visited Texas more than twenty years ago, in the prosecution of his investigations and is now on a tour to the northern portion of the State, taking San Antonio and Austin in his route.

A letter in the San Antonio Texan, dated at Fredericksburg says:

On the night of the 6th we were again visited by a party of our Houston's harmless savages, who carried off ten horses belonging to Mr L. Waltman. Next day a party of citizens discovered the trail, running up towards Fort Terrett, and followed it two days, but their provisions giving out, they were compelled to relinquish the chase and return. Messrs F E. Dose & Thomas and C. A. Campbell have been compelled to leave their stock farms on the Fort Terrett road, and bring in what cattle they could hurriedly collect together to this place for protection, leaving still about two hundred head, which they suppose are strayed or driven off. Messrs. H. Brown and J. H. Green arrived here a few days back with their families and a large stock of cattle and hogs, from Red River, for the purpose of settling here, but when they found such insecurity of life and property on this frontier, as we at present have, they wisely returned from whence they came, to await a better country."

The Santa Fe mail had arrived at San Antonio with dates from Santa Fe to the 25th of February. The San Antonio ledger has the following:

Capt. Skillman arrived here on Tuesday morning, having in company with him Mr C. A Bland, of our city, and Mr. Henry, of Fort Fillmore.

These gentlemen left El Paso on the night of the 11th and stopped two days on the "Limpia," thus making the trip in about ten days, with a heavy load, which is very fast time.

They report no news of much importance. They saw no Indians on the road, and the country generally, below El Paso, is quiet and peaceable at present. Above that place, however, the Indians are represented as being more troublesome than ever, stealing cattle and horses without number. It would seem that the Indians about Santa Fe have dropped their quarrel with each other, and are turning a more systematic combination for harassing the white population.

The mules belonging to the Mexican Boundary Commission, under Senor Salazar, were all stolen by the Indians near El Paso.

Maj. Emory, with the United States Boundary Commission, was near Lake Guzman at last accounts.

The Ranging Companies of Messrs. Henry, Walker and Travis, were passed by Captain Skillman in round Fort Clark, and are now at the place to be mustered out.

A public meeting has been held at Santa Fe, at which resolutions were passed assuring Gov. Merriwether, and several speeches were made, very strongly condemning the official course. A subsequent meeting of his friends, however, seems to have been equally unanimous and enthusiastic in upholding the Governor, and vindicating his acts.

The Santa Fe Gazette gives accounts of depredations committed by the Indians—killing and stealing.

The Tragedy at Wytheville, Va.—We have the following particulars of the recent bloody tragedy at Wytheville, a notice of which we have already published:

William H. Graham, a citizen of Wythe county, was in the bar-room of Col Boyd's hotel about 9 o'clock at night with several other gentlemen, when Mr Spiller came in and took a seat. Graham at the same time left the room, went up to his own room, returned in a few minutes, and immediately commenced firing at Spiller. The first and second balls took effect in the arm and back of Mr. Wm. Terry, brother-in-law of the Telegraph, and the next struck Mr. C. F Trigg, candidate for Congress. Mr Oscar Cox was also wounded—the wounds of these gentlemen, however, are not serious. Mr Spiller made his escape from the room and had reached the street, where he was pursued and fired upon twice by Graham, one ball taking effect in the heart and the other in the head, from which he died immediately. As soon as the villain had accomplished his fiendish purpose he made his escape. The family of the deceased have offered $1000 for his apprehension.

The Chattanooga Advertisor of the 3d inst. says:

Some miserable scamps placed a quantity of stumps rails, etc., upon the railroad this side of Murfreesboro', for the reception of the passenger train due at Chattanooga. On came the train, running at a rapid rate on a straight piece of track, when it encountered the obstacles. The locomotive bounded partially over and landed on the track, strange to say, with slight damage to the fire pan. The trucks of the mail and baggage cars were turned off entirely, and more or less damage done to the other cars. The tossing was a tremendous shaking up of the passengers, the upsetting of the stove, fire, mails, and mail robbery, conductor, baggage men, etc., attended with no loss of life, but some hard knocks. Hanging is an easy punishment for such barbarism, and it would be a fine thing indeed, could detection once happen to test the extent of the law.

Sudden and Shocking Death.—The Lafayette (Ala.) Tribune, of the 6th, has the following paragraph:

A man named Domino, who had lately come to this place, met with his death very suddenly, last Monday morning, while engaged at work in a well. The bucket being drawn up over his head, in its ascent, by some means turned partly over and let fall a rock, which struck the unfortunate man on the head and killed him instantly—the rock staking through his skull, and leaving an aperture sufficiently large for the introduction of a man's hand.

There is a bill before the New York Legislature for the incorporation of the "Hellgate Navigation Company." The object of said company is to remove rocks obstructing the navigation of the East river at Hellgate, to the depth of twenty feet below water mark. After performing such work the Governor is to appoint an engineer to make an inspection, when every sailing vessel of over 60 tons, passing through Hellgate, shall pay for each and every passage the sum of two cents per ton. Every steam vessel from New York to any foreign port, or to any port south of Delaware Bay, on the coast of the United States, shall pay two cents per ton for each passage. All other steamboats of five hundred tons, half a cent per ton for each passage. All such charges shall be a lein upon vessels liable to pay, to be collected by the company in the same manner as dues for wharfage. The capital of this proposed company is put at $200,000, but may be increased to $500,000.

To Preserve Dead Game.—Take out the intestines and fill the inside with unground wheat, and place the fowl in a heap or cask of the same grain in such a manner as to insure its being completely covered. In this way fowls may be preserved perfectly sweet for months. The feathers should be removed.

The Jewish Pilgrim in Palestine.

Are these the sacred holy hills
Where angels walked of old?
Is this the land our story tells
With glory hot yet cold?
For I have passed by many a shrine,
Of Greek and Latin seed,
But these don't promised Palestine
My dreams have been of these.

I see thy mountain cedars green,
Thy valleys fresh and fair,
With summers bright as they have been,
When Israel's home was there!
Though wide the sword and time have passed
And Cross and Crescent above,
And heavily the chain hath pressed
Yet still thou art our own.

Thine are the wandering race that go
Fleetest through every land,
Whose blood hath stained the Polar snow,
And quenched the desert sand;
And thine the brassless hearts that turn
From all Earth's shrines to thee,
With their lone faith for ages borne
In sleepless memory.

For thrones are fallen—nations gone—
Before the march of Time,
And where the ocean rolled alone
Are forests in their prime—
Where Gentile plow-share marred the brow
Of Zion's holy hill—
Where are the Roman eagles now?
Yet Judah wanders still!

And hath she wandered thus in vain,
A pilgrim of the past?
Nay! long delayed her hope hath been,
But it shall come at last;
For in her wastes a voice I hear,
And from some Prophet's urn;
It bids the nations build not there,
For Jacob shall return.

Oh! lost and loved Jerusalem!
Thy pilgrim may not stay
To see the final Earth's harvest-home
In thy consoling day;
But one, resigned in faith and trust,
Seek a nameless tomb
At least beneath thy hallowed dust
Oh! give the wanderer room!

THE KNIGHTS-ERRANT OF CHESS.

If we enter one of the many public places in London, where chess is played, be it humble coffee-shop or lordly divan, we may be almost sure to see, seated in the darkest corner of the room, either playing or studying a chess problem, a man attired in rather seedy habiliments, whose not very clean face is bearded like the pard, and surmounted by a high intellectual looking forehead. This person is one of the many modern heroes of the chess-board whom fate, fortune and foreign political strife, have thrown as exile on our hospitable shores. Like Count Robert, of Paris, at the Chapel of our Lady of the Broken Lances, he is ready and willing to wage battle with all comers; not, however, for honor alone, but for a stake which varies from sixpence to a crown, according to the style and standing of the establishment he frequents—a circumstance mainly depending on the state and condition of his garb. As Sterne, shut up an imaginary prisoner in a dungeon that he might be the better able to describe the horrors of captivity; so shall we place one of these modern chess champions in a coffee shop, in the debatable land between Bloomsbury and St. Giles, and there exhibit him to the uninitiated reader.

As we have said, he is gloomily poring over a combination of the pieces, and probably making hieraglyphical chess notes with the bare stump of a pencil on the back of a dirty hand-bill. An amateur enters; a nod and a smile of recognition pass between them; they seat themselves opposite to each other, and arrange the pieces for a game. Before the first move is made, the amateur somewhat ostentatiously takes a six-pence from his pocket, and puts it on the table; the champion, with an air of serious dignity, places another beside it. The game commences. We immediately observe that it is a very one-sided affair; the professional plays the strongest moves, but he also directs his antagonist how to meet them with the best counter-play. The opening being thus made, according to the strict rules of art, the hostile armies are deployed upon the chequered board without either having obtained any decided advantage.

The game proceeds, the champion still directing the play of the amateur; at one time advising him to castle, at another to defend his queen from the long range of a ruly bishop, or the treacherous flank movement of a marauding knight. When the game has lasted some half-hour or so, the champion proclaims that he will give mate in a certain number of moves, and shows his adversary how to protract a sure defeat until the last moment. The fatal checkmate is at length given, and the champion, lifting both eyebrows, with a polite smile, gives an order to the expectant waitress.

"Oh!" exclaims the reader, who has been mentally observing the game, "this is gambling. I thought chess was never played for a stake. How silly the amateur must be to play with one so immeasurably superior in skill and knowledge of the game, and for money, too."

You are mistaken, friend; that cup of coffee, that roll and Yarmouth bloater, which the amateur has just taken to the champion, proves the first food he has tasted since yesterday, was not won, but fairly earned. What have you witnessed was no gambling; nothing more, in fact, than a chess lesson; but, with that perverse pertinacity which prompts mankind to avoid calling things by their right names, neither of the players would acknowledge it to be so. The amateur who has acquired more knowledge of chess in the last half-hour than he would from an inferior player in a year, will boast to his friends, particularly to the unscientific, that he plays with Col. Cisherubusy; that he celebrated a player beats him, he allows, but he can strongly contest the game, without receiving the odds of a single pawn. On the other hand, the Magyar noble, in poverty and hopeless exile though he be, does not condescend to give lessons. Oh, no! he plays merely for amusement, and a trifling stake pour intéresser la partie.

Very different, indeed, are the fortunes of these modern champions to those of the chess paladins of old, whom monarchs welcomed to their Courts, and whose associates were princes and nobles. An amusing account of the adventures of two of these chess-errants is contained in the rare work of Salvio, a noted chess author, and learned Neapolitan doctor of law; and the still rarer work of his contemporary, Carrera; both written in the earlier part of the seventeenth century. If, in a literal translation, we could attain to anything like the quaint simplicity of Salvio, or the Defoe-like minuteness of Carrera, space would forbid us to attempt it. We can only, then, as a serious record of a state of society long past, call a few particulars from each, and thus rescue from almost utter oblivion the doughty deeds of the two most renowned knights-errant of the chess world.

During the pontificate of Gregory XIII., a contemporary of our Queen Elizabeth, there resided at Rome a young law-student named Leonardo Fonder of chess, however, than the profession his friends wished him to study, he applied himself so sedulously to the game, that he soon became one of the most renowned players in the Eternal City. The heroes of the chess circle, even down to the time of Philidor, who played with our fathers, and whose real name was Andre Danican, have always been known by fictitious appellations, either assumed by themselves or given to them by their admirers; and thus it was that Leonardo, on account of his youthful appearance and unpretending manners, was denominated Il Puttino—the Little Boy. At the period of which we write, the best chess-player in Europe was the Spaniard Ruy Lopez, then curate of Cafra, but subsequently promoted to the bishopric of Segovia. Lopez having occasion to visit Rome on ecclesiastical business, took an time in making on the famed Puttino. They played together, but the ingenuity of the youth was no match for the experience of the veteran; Leonardo was patiently defeated, but most insultingly taunted by his eternal conqueror. Mortified and disgraced, the fallen champion suddenly left Rome, and journeyed to Naples.

Bearing his standard in Naples, the Puttino remained there two years, playing against all comers, and constantly studying the game, until he felt himself able to contend successfully against the insulting Lopez. But another rival had first to be encountered—another champion must be introduced upon the scene.

The famous Paolo Boi, named from the place of his birth, Il Syracusano, the Syracusan, hearing of the prowess of Leonardo, came to Naples to contest his superiority. Without making himself known, Boi gained admission to the Neapolitan Chess Academy when the Puttino was playing with the Prince of Gesualdo. The game was won by the former, but might have been drawn by the Prince, if he had seen a certain occult move. Paul observed this, and mentioned it after the game was over. The Prince and bystanders immediately left the Syracusan, placing the position on the board, proved that he was right. Then, to the delight and amusement of the company, he announced his name and quality in the following words: "I should be unworthy of the name of Il Syracusano if I had not discovered this move. Be it with pleasure that I now inform Signor Leonardo, that I have come here from Sicily generously moved by his just fame, to measure myself against him; and I beseech him to grant my request, with the license of the Prince, that it may be proved which of us is the best master of this most honorable pastime."

The challenge so gracefully given, was as gallantly accepted. The lists were speedily formed in the great hall of the Prince's palace; the Princess and other noble ladies were accommodated with raised seats, while a crowd of noblemen and chess-players surrounded the antagonists. The Syracusan gained the first move, and boldly advanced his king's pawn two squares; the Puttino as gallantly replied by the same move. Then Paole offered the dangerous king's gambit; and Leonardo accepting it, prepared to defend the acquired pawn. Here was a war of heroes! How differently, in our degenerate days, was the last great chess-battle between England and France fought! After playing several games, night put an end to the contest; and both players having won an equal number of games, neither of them had any advantage over the other. The bystanders were enraptured with Leonardo's skill, while they were surprised by the rapidity and force of his antagonist. Arrangements were made to renew the contest on the next morning; but the Puttini failed to appear. He had decamped in the night, leaving, however, an apology, which stated that his abrupt departure was occasioned by his unconquerable desire to revenge himself on Ruy Lopez.

Leonardo, however, went first to Cutri, to visit his parents, previous to his final departure for Spain. On arriving at Cutri, he found the place in the greatest confusion. An Algerine corsair having landed the night before, and carried off a number of the principal inhabitants, among whom was the brother of Leonardo. The pirate, having announced his wish to hold the captives to ransom, Leonardo went off to the galley, and, while bargaining with the rais for a ransom of 200 ducats, his eye chanced to fall upon a chess-board. The rais, following his looks, asked Leonardo if he could play; the latter replied that he had some knowledge of the game. The Algerine then challenged him to play for fifty crowns; they sat down to the board, and in a short time Leonardo won his brother's ransom and 200 ducats. Both the money and the captive were honorably delivered, and Leonardo and his brother returned home in triumph. A few days after this adventure, Leonardo set out for Spain with a friend, who rejoiced in the classical name of Giullo Cesare.

Their first stay was at Genoa, where they were well received by one Signor Giorgio, a noted patron of chess. Here Leonardo fell in love with Giorgio's only daughter, but his poverty forbade him to declare his passion to her father. Still, as he expected to reap a golden harvest in Spain, and the feeling being reciprocal, the young people solemnly bethrothed themselves to each other. Leonardo then departed for Marseilles; his trusty friend Cesare remaining at Genoa, as a medium of correspondence between the lovers, the young lady being unskilled in the art of writing.

After reaping fresh laurels at Marseilles, he sailed in Barcelona, from whence he proceeded to Madrid, playing chess several places on the way, without disclosing, however, that he was the famed Puttino. On arriving at the capital, he rested for a few days and then made his appearance at the principal chess resort, where he found Ruy Lopez playing with a Spanish nobleman. The Spaniards received the stranger courteously, and on one of them asking him "if he would play at chess?" Leonardo replied that he had come to Madrid for that purpose, provided he could meet his equal. Such bold words, spoken in the head-quarters of European chess, were like the explosion of a bomb-shell. The nobleman gave up his game with Lopez, that the latter might at once chastise the bouncing braggart. Lopez, not recognizing his old antagonist, who had now assumed a more manly appearance, immediately challenged the stranger; and, to the surprise of the Spaniards, the first game was drawn; Leonardo judging that he was now superior to Lopez, but putting forth all his strength, but permitting the first day's play to be equal. On the next day they met and played, but Leonardo only winning by one game. For several days they played, but Leonardo was content with study ing his adversary's tactics, and reserved his all force to be exhibited on a more interesting occasion.

The new chess-player, who could contend on equal terms with the hitherto unrivaled Lopez, was the whole theme of conversation in Madrid. Philip II, then King of Spain, determined to see the two heroes play together, and promised the sum of 1000 crowns to the winner of the first three games. The match was played at the foot of the throne, in the royal palace, and the first two games were lost by Leonardo. Philip, seeing the Italian so easily beaten, considered the match virtually over, and rose to leave the apartment, when Leonardo, falling on the knees, addressed the King in these words: "I entreat your Majesty not to go; for I have purposely lost the first two games to display my superior skill. Your Majesty will see me win the three following games; for this is the Puttino, come to Madrid, having been moved thereto by the insulting taunts of Ruy Lopez when he conquered me at Rome."

The King, struck with surprise, consented to remain; and Leonardo made his boast good by winning the three games in succession. The King, delighted with the exhibition of such consummate skill, paid Leonardo the 1000 crowns, and presented him with a valuable jewel and a royal ermine cloak, as king of chess. Further, as desired the Puttino to ask for any other favor, and it would be granted. The latter, gratefully thanking his Majesty, requested that the native town of Cutri might, for a few years, be exempted from taxes, which the monarch accorded, fixing the period for twenty years.

Leonardo was now the acknowledged chess-king of Madrid, when a rival appeared to dispute his pretensions. This was no other than Paolo Boi, the Syracusan, who had followed him from Naples. No time was lost in arranging a match between these two great champions, and the next day was appointed for its commencement; but that very evening Giulio Cesare arrived in Madrid with the sad tidings of the death of Leonardo's mistress, the daughter of Don Giorgio, at Genoa. Overwhelmed with grief, Leonardo declined playing, and departed that night for Portugal, to seek consolation for his woe.

He was not long in finding it in a Portuguese gentleman, whom he accidentally met, consoling him with poetry, and introducing him to the chess-players of Lisbon. Don Sebastian, then King of Portugal, was as liberal a patron of chess at his brother monarch of Spain. The most renowned player at the Court of Lisbon was Il Moro, the Moor; so named from his dark complexion and East ern descent. Both from his infidel extraction, and his proud and insolent bearing, he was detested by the Portuguese, though they could not but admire his great skill at chess. Leonardo immediately challenged the Moor, and Don Sebastian deputed that the match should be played in his presence. In a few days contest the Puttino utterly vanquished the proud Moor, to the great delight of the Portuguese, as well as of the King, who heaped favors on the conqueror giving him the appellation of Il Cavaliere di Scacchi—the Knight-errant; because, like the knights of old, he went about the world to do battle with the proud, and humble their pretensions.

In the meantime, the Syracusan remained at Madrid, successfully contending with all who dared to oppose him. He also played before Philip II. who was so much pleased, that he granted him an annual pension of 500 crowns to be paid by the university of Syracuse. This by the way was a good commentary on the delusion of taxes at Cutri; thus, in turn, Paolo Boi lodged in lord paramount of these at Madrid, till the Puttino returned to that city from Portugal. A grand match was then played between the two famous Italians. The first two days both were equal; but on the third, the Syracusan being attacked by cholera, could not play with the usual spirit, and fell before the indomitable force of his adversary. Disconcerted, but not disgraced, the Syracusan left Madrid and went to Lisbon.

Leonardo, after staying a short time longer in Spain, returned to Naples, where he was received with all honors. Subsequently being appointed to the honorable office of agent to the Prince of Bisignano, he was entirely eclipsed when at the court of that dignitary in Calabria; and this was untimely cut off in the lofty prime of his age.

Boi, who left Madrid, went to Lisbon, where he had the honor of playing with Don Sebastian himself. A still greater mark of distinction was conferred upon our chess champion by the same monarch. One day after they had been playing together for more than four hours, which according to etiquette knelt at the time upon one knee, was so fatigued that she was compelled to change his position; seeing this, the king, with his own royal hand, condescended to assist him—to kneel upon the other knee.

The Syracusan played in a less constrained attitude when at the court of Don John of Austria. This prince, as one of the court-pages of the palace paved with marble, bear large slabs of black and white marble. The man for in a humorous chess-bout there real flesh and blood dressed according to their relative names and powers. Don John and Boi, seated in galleries at opposite sides of the court-yard, directed the moves—the men walking in the respective squares as the players commanded. The chief prince was so pleased with Boi, that he conferred upon him high military rank; and the latter served with distinction through several hard-fought campaigns, gaining laurels on the field of real battle, as well as in all mimic warfare of the chess-board.

After wandering for eighteen years as a knight-errant of chess—at one time a captive in Algiers, where he gained his ransom by the skill, at another visiting Hungary at the request of the Hungarians, who meditated a crusade against him; and I beseech him to grant my request, with the license of the Prince, that it may be proved which of us is the best master of this most honorable pastime."

The challenge so gracefully given, was as gallantly accepted. The lists were speedily formed in the great hall of the Prince's palace; the Princess and other noble ladies were accommodated with raised seats, while a crowd of noblemen and chess-players surrounded the antagonists. The Syracusan gained the first move, and boldly advanced his king's pawn two squares; the Puttino as gallantly replied by the same move. Then Paole offered the dangerous king's gambit; and Leonardo accepting it, prepared to defend the acquired pawn. Here was a war of heroes! How differently, in our degenerate days, was the last great chess-battle between England and France fought! After playing several games, night put an end to the contest; and both players having won an equal number of games, neither of them had any advantage over the other. The bystanders were enraptured with Leonardo's skill, while they were surprised by the rapidity and force of his antagonist. Arrangements were made to renew the contest on the next morning; but the Puttini failed to appear. He had decamped in the night, leaving, however, an apology, which stated that his abrupt departure was occasioned by his unconquerable desire to revenge himself on Ruy Lopez.

Leonardo, however, went first to Cutri, to visit his parents, previous to his final departure for Spain. On arriving at Cutri, he found the place in the greatest confusion. An Algerine corsair having landed the night before, and carried off a number of the principal inhabitants, among whom was the brother of Leonardo. The pirate, having announced his wish to hold the captives to ransom, Leonardo went off to the galley, and, while bargaining with the rais for a ransom of 200 ducats, his eye chanced to fall upon a chess-board. The rais, following his looks, asked Leonardo if he could play; the latter replied that he had some knowledge of the game. The Algerine then challenged him to play for fifty crowns; they sat down to the board, and in a short time Leonardo won his brother's ransom and 200 ducats. Both the money and the captive were honorably delivered, and Leonardo and his brother returned home in triumph. A few days after this adventure, Leonardo set out for Spain with a friend, who rejoiced in the classical name of Giullo Cesare.

Their first stay was at Genoa, where they were well received by one Signor Giorgio, a noted patron of chess. Here Leonardo fell in love with Giorgio's only daughter, but his poverty forbade him to declare his passion to her father. Still, as he expected to reap a golden harvest in Spain, and the feeling being reciprocal, the young people solemnly bethrothed themselves to each other. Leonardo then departed for Marseilles; his trusty friend Cesare remaining at Genoa, as a medium of correspondence between the lovers, the young lady being unskilled in the art of writing.

After reaping fresh laurels at Marseilles, he sailed in Barcelona, from whence he proceeded to Madrid, playing chess several places on the way, without disclosing, however, that he was the famed Puttino. On arriving at the capital, he rested for a few days and then made his appearance at the principal chess resort, where he found Ruy Lopez playing with a Spanish nobleman. The Spaniards received the stranger courteously, and on one of them asking him "if he would play at chess?" The steamship Louisiana Captain Talbot arrived on Saturday last, from Galveston, bringing papers to the 5th inst.

The Galveston Times has stopped publication. It is stated that its suspension is only temporary.

The recent American triumph in New Orleans was specially announced in Galveston by the firing of thirty-two guns.

The Austin State Gazette says: We have still to record more depredations on the frontier by the Indians. Some six weeks ago five horses were stolen from the North fork of the Perdernales, and on the night of the 13th inst. four horses were stolen from near the San Saba crossing. Since then we learn that the Indians, emboldened by their successes, appeared within 25 miles of San Antonio, and stole some horses, and a mule, the property of Peter Gallagher.

A correspondent of the Texian, writing from Eagle Pass says: "The Lipan Indians have stolen from me eleven horses and mules, and from some Mexicans to my employ, some five more, and this makes three times the Indians have stolen from us in the last two months. Under all the circumstances I shall be compelled to break up my ranche and move away, for it is rather more than I can put up with longer."

We copy the following paragraph from the State Gazette:

"We have made diligent inquiries, and find that everywhere on the Colorado, the Brazos, the Guadalupe, and even so far as the Trinity, the corn crop has been cut off to the ground has been sadly injured by the late frosts. The stand in many farms in Travis is almost destroyed, and nearly every where much of the corn will have to be replanted. The frost has nipped the fruit, pumpkins and boiled beans, squashes, cucumbers, etc., unprotected. The cheap industrious farmers are now just about hoed and weed with the lazy ones, and the latter are well pleased at their ingenuity and good luck."

John Fallah, of Henderson, had been stabbed by a man named H. T. Wright. Hall's wounds were dangerous. Wright died escaped.

The Dallas Herald states that the citizens of Rockwell, in Kaufman county, recently held a meeting and passed resolutions strongly condemning the selling of liquor to the Indians during this, some one set up a grocery in Rockwall—then the citizens mustered in their strength and pitched the barrels containing the intoxicants into the street, and destroyed every drop—and knocked the head out of the barrels, destroying the intoxicants.

The Houston Telegraph announces the death of Dr. McAnnelly of this city, on the 31st ult. The deceased had been a resident of Houston since 1839. He represented Harris county in the State Senate at the last session of the Legislature.

The State Gazette expresses its gratification at learning that Col. Sydney A. Johnston has been tendered the appointment of Colonel in one of the new cavalry regiments. Col. Johnston was absent on the frontier, attending to his duties as Paymaster, when the advices of his offer reached Austin.

LOUISIANA ITEMS.—The Natchitoches Chronicle says:

"During the past week we have been visited with even more disagreeable weather than had marked the preceding. This is beyond question, one of the most remarkable seasons ever known in this section of the country. The late frosts and excessively cold weather, superadded to the absence of rain, has had the most disastrous effect upon vegetation of every description. A large number of planters have been forced to replant their corn, while the cotton is seriously retarded. We can only console ourself with the belief that it is a long lane which has no end" and hope "there is a better time coming."

We learn from the Thibodaux Minerva, of Saturday last, that the bayou is at present in excellent navigable condition.

A great hail storm occurred in the parish of Iberville on the 5th inst. The Sentinel gives the following account of it:

The most remarkable hail storm that we ever witnessed, occurred in this place Thursday afternoon, about ten minutes past two. A dark cloud had been approaching for some time from the northward, and about the time mentioned the sky became entirely overcast, when preceded by thunder and lightning, the storm commenced. The general size of the hail stones were about as large as pigeon eggs, but there were a great many as large as a hen's egg—irregularly shaped lumps of ice, and in some instances still larger. The ground was literally covered with these ice balls, and presented a scene such as we have never before witnessed.

The same paper has the following paragraph:

An Indian the owner of one of those little trading sloops, so many of which may be seen upon the river, while lying at our landing on Sunday last, discovered some ducks in the river, and seizing his gun hastily by the muzzle, and while pulling it toward him the hammer of the lock was drawn back, when the gun exploded, putting the whole contents into his bowels, which caused his death—and he was buried the following day.

Unpaid Letters by Mail Cars and Mail Steamers.—The Assistant Postmaster General writes to the St Louis Postmaster:

"I am directed by the Postmaster General to inform you that hereafter unpaid letters dropped into the mail cars to be forwarded must not be mailed, but the route agent in charge should take the earliest opportunity to deposit them in the post-office at or nearest the point where they are received, and the postmaster should post on a list of them with the unpaid letters dropped into the office, adding that they were put into the cars unpaid. If not attended to such letters must be returned monthly to the dead-letter office. Unpaid letters placed on mail steamboats, upon which the mails are in charge of route agents, should be treated in the same manner.

Unpaid letters received by steamboats or other vessels not in the mail service, not carrying the mail with no route agent on board, should be treated as ship letters, and disposed of agreeably to the provisions of the fifteenth section of the act of the 3d of March, 1855."

Among the most startling wonders in connection with electricity, is the announcement that Mr. Bidelli, of Turin, has invented a new electric telegraph by which trains in motion on a railway are enabled to communicate with each other at all rates of velocity and at the same time with the telegraphic stations on the line, while the latter are at the same time able to communicate with the trains. It is added that M. Bonelli is in possession of a system of telegraphic communication by which all private matters entirely disguised will.

Great Military Expedition to the Plains.

It is announced in the St. Louis Republican, that orders have been received from Washington for the early march of four thousand troops, to the Great Plains, with a view to the chastisement of the Indians who have for years past been engaged in depredations upon the property and the murder of American citizens. It is understood that 1200 of the troops are to be stationed at Fort Laramie, 500 at Fort Kearney 600 at Fort Utley, a number in the Upper Missouri. They are to take out a year's supply of provisions.

The Ingraham Medal.—The editor of the Washington Union has been shown the drawings for the medal to be presented to Capt Ingraham for his gallantry and decision in the Koszta affair. The Union says:

Greece sided the medal there will be a rich wreath, between the two ends of which appears the American eagle in a starry constellation, standing on an anchor. In the center is the following inscription:—"Presented by the President of the United States to Commander Duncan Ingraham as a testimonial of the high sense entertained by Congress of his gallant and judicious conduct on the 21 of July, 1853." Joint resolution of Congress, August 4 1854. On the other side we have a distant view of Smyrna, with the United States sloop-of-war at Louis, and the brig of war Bilboa riding at anchor in the harbor. The life like character of the scene is preserved by the introduction of large and small Turkish craft of a more particular character, and peculiar to the Levant. The medal is nearly four inches in diameter, and will be richly as should from every three hundred dollars in gold. The engraving of the dies will probably cost over $2000.

The Savannah News learns from the captain of the sloop Sea Bird, from Hallowell Me. which was wrecked from Camden Me on the 30th inst, that he left the sloop Sea Bird, from Hallowell Me which was knocked down by a gale on the 30th inst. in latitude 38 long itude 73 degrees. To right the vessel the masts were ordered to be cut away. Three of the crew were washed overboard and one had his leg broken by being dashed against some portion of the wreck. As the vessel was perfectly unmanageable, all on board of her were brought into Savannah by the Steet Asahel.

SOUTH AFRICA.

From the Dutch Republic.—Accounts from the Transvaal Republic announce the return of Gen. Pretorius, after inflicting signal punishment on the Kaffir chief Makapan, for the murder of Field Cornet Potgieter and seven other men, and the massacre of several women accompanied by circumstances of the most horrible cruelty. The General reports that toward the end of October his force, united to that of Commandant-General Potgieter, reached the subterranean caverns in which the enemy had ensconced themselves. These caverns are situated on a solid rock in height, by 300, 600, and 850 feet wide, intersected by several walls, and offering security to every kraal; so that an Egyptian darkness prevails throughout. Even in those caverns which have two openings. I did

CLASS MEETINGS.

NO. IV.

In my previous articles on this subject, the causes of the increase of delinquency among our members are briefly referred to. To those already named others might be added, and of their effect in producing this result much more might be said, but for the present we must desist, and close our remarks with a few reflections on the excellencies of this institution, as developed in the lives and Christian character of those who faithfully stand upon it as a means of grace.

The best test of any system relating to the moral advancement of mankind is the results. We must judge of the tree by its fruits, and if the tendency and result of a faithful observance of class meetings is the improvement of our spiritual condition, we are compelled to admit them as evangelical, and to observe them not only as a privilege, but as a Christian duty; a duty that every well informed and consistent member of the Methodist Church feels bound to cherish and perform.

It has been said that "class meetings are to Methodism what Sampson's locks were to him," the seat and secret of his superhumaa strength, without which he became weak as other men; and without class meetings we become as others, with no more spirituality and power than some of our sister churches. We have no special provisions for the cultivation of personal experience apart from the ordinary public services of the sanctuary. The correctness of this saying may be manifested by placing in contrast the lives of those of our members who avail themselves of this provision of the Church with those who habitually and willfully neglect it.

From the fact that our membership is larger than that of any other denomination in this country, and by the operation of our itinerant system, we gather into our fold individuals from every caste and condition of society; so that we have not only the most numerous, but the most diverse communion, of the most cultivated and refined, to some of the rudest and most unpolished that can be hewn out of the quarry of nature and worked into the great ecclesiastical structure, as living stones in the temple of God. Nor could we have it otherwise. This was one of the prominent features of the Church under the ministry of the blessed Jesus: "The poor have the gospel preached unto them," and publicans and sinners entered before many who claimed to be the children of the Kingdom.

In the culture and management of such a numerous and diversified membership, it will necessarily follow, as a sequence of our humanity, and a development of unsanctified human nature, that cases will occasionally occur requiring Church adjudication; and in this, too, our most excellent economy provides—another feature, by the way, of a New Testament Church. But on whom do Church penalties most frequently fall? Who of the distinct classes here referred to are more often brought under censure for misdemeanors, the class meeting, or the class neglecting members?

We ask this question, even where there is a very limited knowledge of our history, is to secure an answer that furnishes an argument in favor of class meetings that opponents can neither gainsay or disprove; an answer that may be extorted from the candid of even those who are known to be inimical to the institution. It is no pleasure to us, nor a compliment to them, to be compelled to say that full four-fifths of all the Church litigation we have is from among those who profess to be opposed to and habitually neglect the class meetings! And this fact has become notorious to every administrator of discipline, that whenever we hear our members say "they are opposed to class meetings," and consequently do not attend them, we are justified in believing at once that a large majority of such are in a backslidden state, or so near it that they have lost all relish for the more spiritual and searching exercises of religion. We say that we are justified in coming to this conclusion, and now for the reason: Who among our members most frequently violate our rules in other things? Those who go to theatres, balls or dances, even though it be only occasionally? I answer, in almost every instance, men and women who rarely ever are seen inside of a class meeting. Who leaves his home and comes down to the city to sell his crop, but before morning must visit places prohibited by his God, thinking, as he is a stranger, he will not be detected? I answer, not the man you saw last Sunday remain in church attentively listening, to enjoy the benefits of class meeting! Who is it that drops in to a drinking saloon at "lunch time," and takes his meat and bread to stay his stomach for a late dinner, but fails not to wash it down with a dram of brandy, and by way of promoting digestion, sits down and spends an hour at a game of chess or backgammon, and calls it innocent amusement?" I answer, it was not the brother you saw at class on Sunday morning, and heard relating his experience, while tears flowed freely from his eyes, and beams of joy so illuminated his countenance that his face seemed almost radiant with the light of Heaven! We might carry out those illustrations much further and more minutely, but this is enough to remind these objectors to and neglectors of class meetings that the Church has her eye upon them as the "spots in her feasts of charity," and sources of much of her mortification and trouble. That any consistent member of the Methodist Church, living in the enjoyment of religion, can be at heart opposed to class meetings, we have no idea; and these puerile objections we sometimes have from certain quarters we set down as affectation, apologies framed to excuse an inexcusable course of conduct.

Let us now glance, in conclusion, at another aspect of this subject. Where will you find the reliable and efficient part of our membership, the men and women who are ready for every good work, the liberal supporters of the Gospel and zealous co-workers with the ministry in carrying out the designs and enterprises of the Church? I answer, in the class room! There, where the faithful are wont to assemble and aid each other by their experience, examples and prayers. There the "wise virgins" of Methodism, with "lamps trimmed and burning," ready for the coming of the Bridegroom, may be found waiting at their appointed seasons. There are they that "let their lights so shine that others may see their good works and glorify their Father which is in Heaven." These are our faithful witnesses, living epistles, "known and read of all men." And on the superiority of their attainments in matters of Christian experience, and the purity of their conduct, we rest the argument in favor of class meetings.

UNIVERSAL EXHIBITION, PARIS.

Religious Services.

It is reasonably apprehended that the forthcoming exhibition in Paris will attract to this capital a considerable number of evangelical Christians from various parts of Great Britain and America, who, during their visit, would desire to enjoy the ordinances of the Gospel. The great majority, it may be supposed, could only profit from such ordinances through the medium of the English language. Now, the present accommodation for English worshippers is exceedingly limited, there being only four places of worship, which are scarcely adequate to ordinary demands.

Under these circumstances, a committee of ministers and gentlemen have made arrangements for extra accommodation during the exhibition. An additional Protestant evangelical chapel will be opened at No. 27 Rue de la Madeleine, the pulpit of which it is proposed to supply twice each Sabbath, through the aid of those evangelical ministers, whether English or American, who, during their visit, may be willing to officiate. By this means Christian ordinances may be enjoyed by many who otherwise would be deprived of the high privileges of public devotion.

The committee therefore earnestly and affectionately solicit that all those ministers holding decidedly evangelical views, who may be willing to take one or more services during their abode in the French capital, would communicate their names and the Sabbath on which they could probably officiate to the Secretary, as below, in order that due arrangements may be made for the conducting of the services. It is desirable that all who can should forward their names before the 1st of May. Those who may be only able to make definite arrangements at a later period will please to communicate with the Secretary at the earliest opportunity.

As the providing these accommodations will be attended with considerable expense, and as they are designed for Christians of all denominations, contributions are respectfully solicited, which will be received by Rev. W. Arthur, Centenary Hall, Bishopgate street, London, or by

Rev. J. HINE RYLANCE, Secretary,

N. B.—It is hoped that the services will commence on the first Sabbath in May, and continue about five months. All letters to be prepaid.

GUNPOWDER.—The source of power in gunpowder lies with the saltpeter. This substance, termed nitrate of potash, consists of nitric acid and potash. Now, the nitric acid is, as it were, an immense volume of atmospheric air, condensed into a solid, ready on demand to assume the air form by the touch of a spark of fire. When sulphur and charcoal are mixed with nitre (saltpeter) and a spark is applied, the sulphur (brimstone) ignites, setting fire to the charcoal. Air is supplied to these substances by the composition of the nitre; the atmosphere condensed therein instantly unites with the combustibles, and the result is an intensely hot gaseous compound, 2000 times the bulk of the original solid. The English Government gunpowder is composed of 75 parts of nitre, 15 of charcoal and 10 of sulphur. The Russian Government powder consists of 73 parts of nitre, 13 of charcoal, and 12 of sulphur.

Victory alone shall wear the crown. We must not only fight, but overcome.

THE CONTEMPLATED COLLEGE

OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Auburn—Its Claims.

The importance of this enterprise is admitted by all. The spirit and purpose of the citizens of Greensboro' and Auburn, as recently displayed, make it certain that the necessary amount of money can be obtained to justify the Conference in consummating its project. The only question remaining to be discussed is its location. This is certainly a vital question. A mistake here will be fatal. For if the location be not possessed of all, or most of the essentials which contribute to success, a failure will immediately follow. The deep interest felt by the writer induces him to submit to the consideration of the entire Church a few facts connected with Auburn. In doing this, he feels free from all sectional prejudice, and prepared to estimate properly the claims of any other place that may be urged before the commission appointed to locate the College.

It will be remembered that Auburn took the initiatory in making this movement. A memorial from its citizens was before the Conference at its late session, backed by a subscription of fifteen thousand dollars. These were the result of an effort made at a late hour, just, indeed, before the Conference was to assemble. The existence of LaGrange, the protegee of the Tennessee, Memphis and Alabama Conferences, forbid any hopes before that a successful appeal could be made contemplating a Conference institution, such as is now proposed. So soon, however, as it became apparent that Alabama would change its relation to that school, the people of Auburn, having long felt the want of collegiate advantages for their sons, resolved to memorialize the Conference on the subject. Some of the memorialists are devoted members of the M. E. Church, South, and of course preferred that the Alabama Conference should be the patron of the college. Others, though not members, having all confidence in the ability of the Conference to manage such an institution, heartily co-operated with the former; and, indeed, all the citizens of Auburn in the Church, and out of the Church, desired most ardently that their request should be granted and the college located there.

The small sum subscribed probably caused their defeat. Had they anticipated any such contingency as came up, and which led to the formation of the existing commission, they would have given unmistakable evidence of their willingness and ability to meet all that the Conference could in any fairness have demanded. At a recent meeting (24th March,) held at Auburn, a very handsome subscription was obtained. The amount, which has since been increased to forty-five thousand dollars, was received from the citizens of Auburn principally, a few of the subscribers only living in its immediate vicinity. In addition to this, it is now certain that other sums will be obtained, placing it beyond a doubt that a sufficient pecuniary consideration can be realized to relieve the friends of this location of all fear on this point.

That Macon county is fully able to meet any proper demand upon her liberality the following statistics, derived from the last census by DeBow, will clearly exhibit. It may here be remarked that the property of this county, both real and personal, is perhaps more generally distributed than in a large majority of the counties of the State—few instances of overgrown wealth, fewer still of real poverty. We find here Wirt's "golden mean, the appropriate region of virtue and intelligence." But to the statistics.

First, its population. Number of whites, 11,286; the number of slaves, 15,596; free negroes, 16. The total population in 1840 was 11,247; in 1850, the date of the last census, 26,898; showing an increase in the previous ten years of 15,651.

Education. The number of pupils in academies and private schools was 784; the number in public schools, 568. The number of whites over five and under twenty-one years old, 4,967; the number of whites over twenty unable to read and write, 57.

Third—Lands, productions, &c. There were 186,014 acres in cultivation, producing, besides stock of every kind abundantly, 13,000 bushels of wheat, 187,722 bushels rye and oats, 998,867 bushels corn, 298,563 bushels potatoes, and bales of ginned cotton of 400 pounds, 29,089.

Now, when it is remembered that Macon is comparatively a new county—that it contained in 1850 nearly 300,000 acres of land unimproved, and that it has been steadily increasing in population and in productions, no room for doubt is left of its ability to provide as much money as it ought to furnish for this enterprise.

But there are some other facts of a highly important character connected with Auburn, which are entitled to very grave consideration.

The healthfulness of the locality I mention first. The writer of this has traveled much, North, South, East and West. He has been in sickly places, so termed, and in places famed for their salubrity. An examination of the locality in question satisfies him that it must be secure against all diseases dependent upon malarious agency, and only liable to those maladies which can occur by reason of vicissitudes of weather in any healthy place. Reliable information shows that a case of typhoid pneumonia has never occurred in the town of Auburn.

The moral character of the citizens of Auburn constitutes one of its strongest claims. About twenty years ago a few gentlemen emigrated from Georgia, with intention of forming a settlement in Macon county, Alabama. Having purchased lands, it was determined, in order to secure the necessary religious and educational facilities, to build a town. A site was selected, the land bought, laid out into town lots, and sold under the hammer. The conditions of the sale of these lots were published. One was that neither gambling in any way, nor the traffic in intoxicating liquors would be allowed, on pain of forfeiture of title. From its foundation Auburn has been a temperance town, and at this time no intoxicating liquor can be bought, except such as is legitimately sold by the apothecary for medicinal purposes. Free entirely from groceries and gambling-houses, Auburn stands in the centre of an area twelve miles in circumference, over which, by legislative enactment, the temperance rule is operative. Within this area reside, we believe, the entire number of those who are pledged to the amount of forty-five thousand dollars for the establishment of the proposed college.

It may be added that about one-half of the population of Macon county is identified with the Christian Church. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has a strong foothold, and embraces in its membership some of the most intelligent and pious of its citizens.

The last thing I will notice is the fact that Auburn is of easy access, the Montgomery and West Point Railroad running immediately through it, and connecting it with the capital of our State and the various towns of Georgia, &c.

The people of East Alabama want a college—they really need a college; and willing to throw all their sympathy and aid in favor of Auburn, it is believed that the claims of Auburn will secure that consideration to which she is so justly entitled.

COME, O COME TO CHRIST.

FROM A TRACT BY REV. DOCTOR PLUMER.

Repentance will come, live as you may. Either you will repent in time, and turn to God, and except Christ, and save your soul, or you will repent forever in despair. No men repent so bitterly, so long, so hopelessly, as those who on earth make a mock at sin, and slight the offers of redeeming grace. Their eternity is spent in fruitless lamentations over their own wickedness and folly. There is a madness in sin which has never been fully explained. No mortal has ever solved the whole mystery of iniquity. Why will you die?

This life is vapour that soon vanishes away, but the next life has no end. All the largest thoughts of endless duration ever formed by man fall infinitely below the truth. Suicide may be called in to aid a poor, godless, hopeless sinner out of this world, but it cannot help him out of eternity. Annihilation, sometimes hoped for by the wicked on earth, shall bring no cup of forgetfulness to lost souls in hell. While God exists, while seraphs sing, while saints rejoice, the despiser of the gospel must lie in sorrow, and mourn with a perpetual mourning, and say, "How have I hated instruction, and my heart despised reproof, and have not obeyed the voice of teachers, nor inclined mine ear to them that instructed me!"

—And all this loss and ruin are as unnecessary as they are terrible. The calls of the gospel could not be more kind, or free, or urgent than they are. Listen to a few of them: "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as white as wool." "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." Listen, too, to the very words of Christ, while he was on earth: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly of heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out;" and, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." Even after Christ had ascended to heaven he sent out the same blessed offers in his own name: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." "And the Spirit and the Bride say, come; and let him that heareth say, come; and let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." "Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way."

Will you accept these gracious offers? Have you no heart to love the Lord Jesus Christ and flee to him? Let not pride, or unbelief, or love of the world, or sinful shame, or anything else keep you away from Christ. Greater grace, freer mercy, richer blessings never were offered. Make them yours by yielding yourself to God, by renouncing all sin, and by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ. Come, O Come to Christ.

A BRAND PLUCKED FROM THE FIRE.

Col. B. was an officer of the Revolution. Until near the close of life he had lived in entire neglect of the concerns of his soul. The company with whom he had already associated was very unfriendly to religion. Such were his views of religion and habits of life that, to all human appearance, his case was hopeless, so far as all ordinary means of conversion were concerned, for he had no relish for hearing the Gospel, reading the Bible or attending to any means of grace.

But he had some praying friends who often presented his case before God in prayer. And it would seem that their prayers were heard in his behalf, and that God interposed in a way somewhat extraordinary. It pleased God to awaken his conscience by an awful dream. In his sleep he had a terrible view of fire burning with brimstone. It appeared as an extensive sea of fire, the surface of which was in terrible agitation, like the tossing billows of the ocean. In this sea of fire he thought he saw thousands of human beings, writhing in the greatest agony imaginable. He seemed to himself as standing on the brink of this lake, which was descending and very smooth. Suddenly his foothold gave way, and he found himself sliding down. He tried to hold on and regain his foothold, but all in vain; it was as steep as the roof of a house, and as smooth as polished marble, and down he slid near to the edge of the lake. The fiery waves would dash against the shore so near him that he felt their burning heat. He expected every moment a wave would reach him and wash him into the burning pool. In this dreadful struggle to save his life he awoke.

From this moment he had such an awful view of his danger as a sinner, that he had no rest, day nor night, until he gave his heart to God. He sought the Lord in great earnestness, and in a few weeks he was happily converted. He lived several years after his conversion, and gave good evidence of having become a pious man. He departed this life in Christian triumph, exhorting all around him to meet him in Heaven. Is not this a brand plucked from the burning? And does it not greatly encourage us to pray for our friends?

THE OPELOUSAS RAILROAD.

The Thibodaux Minerva, of the 7th inst., in referring to the earnings of this road for the month of March, which are considered in the highest degree satisfactory, adds the following welcome and excellent remarks:

The work on the road, at this time, is progressing very rapidly—there being over six hundred laborers employed on the sections between the west bank of the Lafourche and Tigerville. The best of feeling and harmony seems generally to prevail on all sides and from every quarter. The management is represented to be the best and most satisfactory—all owing to the business capacities of the President and new Board of Directors, who seem to have at heart the interest of the company, and neglect nothing that has a tendency to increase the interest and augment the zeal of those who good the road, when completed, is destined to effect.

We are glad to hear that so many laborers are employed, and that the work is progressing so rapidly and satisfactorily in all respects. Only twenty-five or thirty miles have to be completed to open up the entire business of several wealthy and populous parishes; to bring a vast amount of valuable produce to this market, that now seeks other markets through other outlets; to enable the mails, passengers, parcels, goods, merchandise, etc., to reach the various Texas ports in a much shorter time than it now takes, all of which will so increase the revenues, enhance the value of the stock, and add to the credit of the Company, as to make it self-sustaining and lucrative, and enable the Directory to push forward the great enterprise with celerity and certainty. As soon as this road reaches Berwick's Bay, its future success may be set down as certain beyond all peradventure, for it must then enjoy a passenger and transportation traffic, the profits of which, alone, will enable the Directory to build twenty or thirty miles of road per annum. Let such a condition of things as this be brought about and the managers of the road will find no difficulty in reaching the oars and pockets of capitalists, should they deem the negotiation of a loan necessary or advisable. Hence we regard the early construction of the road to the point named as of momentous importance. In one sense, it will be almost equivalent to reaching the Texas line; for the half-way house will have been arrived at and passed—the worst, most expensive and difficult portion of the journey overcome. And, as soon as we penetrate the fertile regions of Texas, we will secure a mighty trade, which will continue to increase for many years, until it forms one of the principal pillars of our commercial greatness and strength. The day is not far distant when the trade of the country west of the Mississippi will be of as much value to this city as the trade of the country east of the Mississippi, leaving out, of course, those regions which are especially made by nature tributary to this mart. Therefore, let the glorious prize be secured in time. We have much to contend against, much to overcome, much to subdue. Nothing can save us but the railroads.

"Heave to!" or Catching a Tartar.

On a bright sunny day, some years ago, when the slavers carried on their infamous operations with a boldness only equal to their success—not withstanding the exertions used by our cruisers to enforce the various treaties entered into by this country with several of the European powers for the abolition of the vile trade—Her Majesty's brig Tardy might have been seen rolling at single anchor off the British fort of Accra, a most agreeable and comparatively healthy little town on the Gold Coast.

The day in question was unusually hot, even for that proverbially roasting climate. There was not a breath of air sufficient to ruffle the surface of the sea, nor a cloud to temper the fierce rays of the vertical sun, penetrating through the snow-white awnings with a power almost insupportable to the panting and exhausted crew, who were assembled in listless groups on the forecastle, longing for the slightest breath of air to re-invigorate their exhausted frames. The only sign approaching to activity appeared in the person of the young officer second in command, who, as he slowly paced the quarter-deck, occasionally paused to examine with a glass the low sandy shore, glistening with peculiar brightness at the foot of the lofty range of mountains which form the bold back-ground of this part of the coast.

The Tardy was one of those old ten gun brigs that are now, happily, nearly extinct in the service. She was a disgrace to the country that owned her, as well as to the officer who had the misfortune to command her; and with all the bad qualities peculiar to that class of vessels, had no redeeming points to recommend her. She was a perfect tub, and a reproach to the gallant fellows that belonged to her, who for eighteen months had toiled in the vain hope that a prize would at length reward their exertions and sufferings on that pestilential coast. Hitherto, however, they had been doomed to disappointment. The excitement of the chase, usually so intense when the sailing qualities of the pursuer and pursued are nearly on a par, had but few charms for the Tardys, whose visions of prize-money and honor grew more and more indistinct as the retreating sails of the chase slowly and too surely vanished on the horizon.

Such mortifying failures—the unfailing result of a trial of speed between Her Majesty's brig and the low rakish clippers of the coast—were still more annoying, from the fact of the scale and the division of the prize money having been altered shortly before the Tardy arrived on the station. Formerly £10 per head had been allowed for every slave captured, which was shared by the entire squadron; but at the time of the Tardy's arrival at Accra, on her way from Sierra Leone to her cruising ground in the Bight of Biafra, £5 per head was allowed to be shared only by the officers and crew of the vessel that made the capture. However beneficial this arrangement might be to the fast sailing cruiser, it was but a bitter mockery to the hapless Tardys.

We left the officer—the senior mate already alluded to—watching with his telescope the low shores of British, Dutch and Danish Accra, with the evident determination of allowing not so much as a canoe to break the blockade without his cognizance. His vigilance was shortly rewarded by the appearance of the commander's gig leaving the shore, and, under the vigorous strokes of her lusty crew, she quickly reached the side of the brig, bringing on board the commander himself. After the bustle incidental to his arrival had somewhat subsided, the mate accompanied his chief below, whither we will follow.

"Well, Mr. Winton," commenced the commander as soon as they reached the cabin, "I suppose you have been short, and are all ready for tripping as soon as the land-breeze makes its appearance. The canoe containing the cartwheels and grass will be alongside in an hour," he continued, without noticing his junior's bow of assent; "and then the sooner we are off the better."

"Did you hear of there being any vessels in the rivers about to sail, sir?" inquired the mate.

"Why no, nothing for certain," replied the lieutenant. "The Consul was too intent on finding out what I could possibly want with his old conch-wheels to pay so much attention to my inquiries on that subject. But I rather think, from what I heard from another source, that the Vecna is nearly ready for sea; so possibly, we shall be off the Benny just in time to intercept her."

"I hope we shall, sir. It is rather vexatious to be always returning late port empty-handed."

After some further conversation relative to the hoped-for capture of the Vecna—a well-known Spanish slave-schooner—the two officers returned on deck, where they saw several of the expected canoes slowly approaching the brig, looking more like moving haystacks than legitimate African canoes. On their arrival alongside, their strange freight caused a good deal of wonder among the hands.

"Well," said an old salt, "I 'spects this is about the rummiest go as ever was seed on this here part of the coast. I wonder what the skipper's agoing to do with this here dunnage."

"Why, turn the hooker into a farm-yard for monkeys and alligators, and thatch her in for a full due," suggested a surly topman, who felt too sore on their ill success to be in any humor for joking.

"And make you Jemmy Ducks, eh, Bill?" said the first speaker, who was the captain of the forecastle. "What's the use of growling like a bear with a sore head. When——"

"Come, come, shipmate," cried the incensed coxman; "gather in the slack of your jaw. I'm no crooken, but mind what I says——"

The rest of the sentence was lost through the interruption of the officer of the deck, who, having overheard the remarks of the men, sharply ordered them to attend to their duty; and in silence the remainder of the novel cargo was hoisted on board, much to the amusement of every one who was engaged in the operation.

During the afternoon all hands were busily engaged, under the personal superintendence of their commander, in stowing their acquisitions in so curious a way that by sunset they had so completely altered the outward appearance of the brig that no one who saw her leave the anchorage under the influence of a rattling breeze would have imagined her to be the same vessel which a few hours before had been lazily riding on the glassy sea.

The greater portion of the long, thick grass that had been brought on board, was made up into bundles and stowed on the booms. The remainder of it was used for covering the coach wheels, which, being made fast horizontally in the chains outside the vessel, gave her more the appearance of an over-laden trader than one of her majesty's cruisers. The foretop-gallant mast and flying-gib-boom were now got on board, and a short main-top gallant mast sent up instead of the lofty spar she always carried abaft. This, with an old and patched suit of sails, cautiously reefed, made the disguise complete.

There being nothing now to detain the brig, all sail was made for her cruising ground, which she reached shortly afterward. About noon of the eighth day after leaving Accra, the Tardy being then off the entrance in the Benny River, but out of sight of land, the look-out aloft reported a sail on the port bow. This announcement caused the greatest delight to all hands on board the brig, as she had been dodging about in that locality for several days, in the expectation that one or more of the slavers known to be on the river and about to descend would make their appearance.

As well as could be ascertained from the distance, the stranger appeared a long, low, rakish schooner, evidently a Guinaman, and no doubt one of the gentlemen with whom the Tardys desired a more intimate acquaintance. One thing was very plain, she had little or no wind. What there was of it, however, was fair for her running out from the land, giving her the weather-guage of the Tardy; and this, so far, was just what the officer of the brig wished, as it allowed the slaver the option of speaking them, if so disposed.

In about an hour from this time she was reported. The Tardy, by a succession of short tacks, apparently with the intention of working up for the entrance of the Benny, had arrived within four or five miles of the slaver, which was lazily forging ahead, under the influence of a light breeze, and decreasing every moment her distance from the disguised cruiser, apparently without the least idea of there being danger in her path. From the tops of the brig a number of woolly heads could be seen, evidently taking their constitutional—a sure proof that their masters were engaged in no lawful commerce, and that the schooner was what all hands on board the Tardy had expected, and in truth hoped.

"They must surely intend to board us, as they do not alter their course," said the commander. "Show them the colors, Mr. Winton," continued that officer, "perhaps the sight of the old flag may tempt them to pay us a visit."

The British ensign was soon waving from the Tardy's peak, but the schooner did not deign to show her's in reply.

In the mean while both vessels gradually approached each other. The crew of the Tardy, with the exception of a few of the old steady hands, who were disguised in red flannel shirts, were lying down at their quarters, out of sight, but ready at a moment's notice to use with hearty good will the guns that were screened from the sight of the pirate craft by the closed ports. Jokes were flying about in plenty, as the happy and excited Jacks slapped their pockets in anticipation of the golden lining with which they would soon be furnished.

The last task made by the Tardy—in as slovenly a manner as possible—placed the schooner about half a mile dead to windward; and as she still appeared to be without the least suspicion of having so formidable an antagonist in her vicinity, the excitement on board Her Majesty's brig, from the captain to the cabin-boy, became almost painful. Every available glass on board was leveled at the wicked-looking craft, to watch with eager glance her minutest movements.

After a short pause the suspense was relieved by the gaudy flag of Spain being seen slowly ascending to the main peak of the slaver, and immediately followed by a noisy summons from her foremost gun for the Tardy to "heave to."

"Now we have the rogues!" exclaimed the commander. "Up mainsail; square the main yard," were the rapid orders. "Don't hurry there, lads," he continued; "we must not alarm them just yet. Belay, there; belay," was the final order before the Tardy became stationary to await quietly the result.

Onward came the beautiful schooner, gracefully bending under the lively breeze, perfectly unconscious of the reception that awaited her. As she slightly altered her course to pass under the Tardy's stern, a crowd of impatient desperadoes were seen clustering the gangways, ready to pounce upon their expected prey. Too late, however, they perceived their error; when recalling to under the lee of the royal cruiser, a formidable battery showed itself to their astonished gaze. Instead of the terrified crew of a defenseless trader.

On becoming aware of their position, the ruffians were at first too much bewildered to pay any attention to the cruiser's summons for them to surrender; but a messenger, in the shape of a thirty-two pound shot, brought them to their bearings, when, seeing all chance of escape perfectly hopeless, the colors of the slaver were hauled down. A boat's crew, from the Tardy, under the command of the senior mate, was soon in possession of the prize, which, as had been anticipated, proved to be the Vecna, a splendid craft of about two hundred tons burden, commanded by as desperate a set of villains as were over bound together by the ties of crime. The greater portion of them were

The Tardy; the remainder, as well as the live freight, numbering one hundred and seven slaves, were retained on board the Vecna, which shortly afterward sailed in charge of the prize crew for Sierra Leone, leaving her captors still gently cruising, in the hope of winning further laurels. A few days after the Vecna reached her destination, her case was tried in the courts. As she was taken full of her miserable human freight, there was no difficulty about the condemnation, which took place accordingly. The negroes were of course emancipated, no doubt greatly to the disgust of their late masters, whose crest-fallen appearance, as they sullenly wandered about Sierra Leone, afforded the highest gratification to the prize crew of Her Majesty's brig Tardy.

THE EARTHQUAKE AT BROUSSA.—Most distressing details have been received of the dreadful earthquake, that destroyed one-third of the flourishing city of Broussa on the 28th ult. The panic caused by the destruction of the stone buildings is indescribable. The population of Broussa rushed out into the fields terror-stricken. The wounded were dug out of the ruins as soon as possible and conveyed to temporary hospitals. The first day five hundred wounded persons were recovered. It was under the khans, baths and mosques which are all of stone, that the most serious casualties occurred. These khans, or inns, are the resort of the Asiatic merchants, who, attracted by the silk spinning factories, belonging to Europeans and natives, have more or less suffered. In Mr. Degastin's establishment upwards of seventy poor young girls were killed.

Broussa is celebrated for its thermal springs, and for a most extraordinary phenomena that two of the springs have disappeared, whilst that called Cigulea was thrown out of its bed, and the water now runs in the opposite direction. During the earthquake a large rock was observed to detach itself from Olympus, and roll down like a tremendous avalanche, carrying in its descent trees, bushes and stones, until it arrived at the bottom of the ravine on the other side of the city. The number of killed are set down at five hundred, with twice as many wounded, and two hundred and fifty mosques have been destroyed.

LOUISIANA ITEMS.—The Bastrop (Morehouse) Times, of the 7th inst., says:

Copious showers of rain have fallen since Wednesday evening last, and old mother earth seemed gladdened by the welcome visitor. Shrubbery, which a few days ago, seemed parched by the droughts as by a broiling July sun, now leaves with verdure, and everything looks smiling about our delightful town. The bayou will hereafter be navigable for largest class boats, and our planters, who have been so long deprived of the luxuries of the New Orleans market, begin to cheer up with the prospect of soon being able to ship their last year's crop.

Many of our planters have been compelled to replant their entire fields of corn, and besides the labor which has been thus thrown away, the high price of corn makes it a matter of no little importance. The price of corn ranges from $1 50 to $2 per bushel.

The Marksville (Avoyelles) Villager, of the 12th, says:

Since our last issue an abundant shower has somewhat improved the appearance of the crops.

The Franklin (St. Mary) Planters' Banner, of the 12th says:

The weather just at this writing is delightful. Spring is now fairly upon us—nature is clad in her living green robes—the birds make the air redolent of vocal music—and—the Delia's coming, and we're off for New Orleans.

FROM OREGON.—Expedition Against the Snake Indians.—The Secretary of War has advised Gov. Curry, it is the intention of the Government to send a force in the spring against the Snake Indians who massacred the emigrants near Fort Boise last summer. This force will probably consist of eight companies—two of dragoons, one of Artillery and four of Infantry—drawn from the posts in Oregon, Washington and California. These companies will, if possible, be filled to the maximum or 64 rank and file of eighty-four per company; and it is believed from the success which attends the recruiting service at the present time, that it may be done, and the recruits embarked for their destination by way of the Isthmus in the month of March—reaching Oregon in ample time the season will permit the expedition to operate.

LATER FROM FORT BOISE.—The Oregonian learns from Mr. Charles Ogden, who has for some time been in charge of Fort Boise, and who has just arrived from that place, that the Indians are now quiet. The Snakes pretend to regret the murder of the immigrants last summer, and charge the whole affair to five of their people. This is known to be false, as the boy who escaped says there was a much larger number engaged in the bloody affair. This pretence is undoubtedly for the purpose of effecting improvement on the part of the whites to punish them for their cruelties, and to give them an opportunity again to rob and murder immigrants who may hereafter fall in their way.

A man named Seebers, has obtained a judgment of $25,000 against the city of Memphis as damages for being committed as a vagrant. It appears that Memphis never had a vagrant law.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1855.

New St. Felicity Street Church.

CYCLORAMA PANORAMA.

This splendid exhibition continues to attract a goodly throng of interested and appreciating visitors. As a work of art it excels anything of the sort to which our citizens have been treated. To high moral and religious sensibilities it is the success which has marked its exhibition. If we do not over estimate its influence, one sitting is equal to many sermons.

Tears of penitence and joy have been shed by many of the visitors, and we have it by report that a camp meeting about rang [illegible] hall the other night.

[illegible] occurred at the moonlight [illegible] Beautiful, the delectable mountains, the waters of the river of life, the land of Beulah, or the rapt and gorgeous finale of Christian's entrance into Heaven, we are not informed. We can testify that it is a source of great and that no one can see it without going away impressed with the truth, beauty and sublimity of religion, and without being a stronger, better and happier Christian.

Mr. Greenwood, the gentlemanly and efficient manager of the tableaux, purposes to exhibit it on Monday night, the 23d of April, for the benefit of the Elijah Steele Methodist Church. This church has for several years been laboring under embarrassment from debt contracted in the erection of their house of worship.

The exhibition will be at Armory Hall, Camp street, and we hope that on this occasion it will be filled with the well-wishers and friends of Christianity. Tickets to be obtained of H. D. McGinnis, 30 Camp street, at Wm. Fleming's book store, in the Fourth District, and at the door.

TRACT AGENCY OF THE LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.—This important position has been proffered to Rev. David Kinnear, who signifies his acceptance in a letter of the 10th inst.:

"Rev. Dr. J. Hamilton wrote me on the subject. My health during the winter was [illegible] but since the weather became [illegible] warm I have been convalescent. I [illegible] would have been better for me to [illegible] the winter in Louisiana. I purpose to be in New Orleans shortly, and in readiness for the agency, if my health will permit and the brethren concerned think proper. I pray God to overrule all this according to his will, for the welfare of the Church. Yours truly, D. KINNEAR."

THE TRACT CAUSE.

[illegible] arrangement has been [illegible] between Hamilton and myself [illegible] to have a general supervision [illegible] of our Tract Society in this [illegible] year, as its agent. [illegible] in the course of the year to visit [illegible] of the Conference; but our territory [illegible] it will be impossible for me to [illegible] annual session, but I will go [illegible] circumstances will allow. [illegible] requested of the presiding [illegible] other ministers to communicate freely with their churches and people on this important branch of our ecclesiastical [illegible] and urge before them the high [illegible] it involves. It is confidently hoped that all the Quarterly Conferences [illegible] will form auxiliary tract societies, and it is specially requested that I may [illegible] of the formation of these societies, the address of the president, secretary and treasurer of each, and any other information that may be deemed useful.

[illegible] have just received a supply of books, embracing a wide range of moral and religious miscellany at very cheap publications.

Any [illegible] contributing ten dollars in aid of this great moral and religious movement [illegible] entitled to receive in return half the amount in books. I confidently hope to receive many communications of this sort, and will respond promptly with regard to the [illegible] in return.

I [illegible] very much desired to employ for the [illegible] several colporteurs, if suitable persons [illegible] be had, particularly for the cities and [illegible] respectively, of Natchez, Vicksburg, [illegible] Orleans. I will be very glad to [illegible] information touching the practicability of employing suitable persons for colporteurs for these and other points.

All funds collected in this Conference for the [illegible] may be remitted either to myself or to Rev. W. P. Barton, Treasurer of the Conference Tract Society, at Woodville, Miss.

Brethren, we have just organized our affairs so as to use the printing press as the great ally of the pulpit in the dissemination of pure, moral and religious truth efficiently. It will make its mark upon public morals, public taste and public opinion, and upon the Christianity of the land, if we urge it on closely up to the openings of Providence. Shall we not do it?

CRITICISM AND FAULT-FINDING.

The habit of fault finding is very injurious to the Church, and should be guarded against by all who would preserve a proper Christian spirit themselves, and avoid injuring the influence of their ministers. A preacher's success depends, to a very great extent, upon the confidence which the community have in his piety and capacity for his great work. It is therefore the duty of the Church, as far as is consistent with truth, to endorse his character and sustain his influence; defending him from unjust aspersions, and from the insidious attempts of the enemies of religion to paralyze his influence and destroy his power to put down vice and exalt the cause of truth.

But how frequently do we see members of the Church, professed friends of Christ and religion, lending themselves to the cause of darkness by disparaging remarks about Christian ministers, taking part with the enemies of religion in their efforts to cast contempt upon the Gospel by degrading its advocates and representatives. I know that Christians do not intend that their remarks and criticisms on ministers should injure the cause of religion; they do not design to do harm; but the injury is done, and they will be responsible to God for their recklessness. This fault-finding spirit exhibits itself in various ways, sometimes in the severity of their criticisms on the style and manner of the preacher. If a preacher is not perfect as an orator, if there is any defect or want of conformity to the rules of logic or rhetoric, he is dissected by these self-created supervisors of the pulpit without mercy. They seem to regard themselves as having this department placed under their special charge, and do not attend preaching to be profited by the reproofs, warnings and instructions of the minister of God, but to watch for, record and expose the unimportant defects in the style and delivery of the sermon. Instead of hearing prayerfully and with self-application, that they may be profited and correct their own moral and spiritual defects, they hear as teachers of rhetoric or elocution, and, instead of sitting in judgment upon themselves, they sit in judgment upon the preacher. No wonder if such hearers are seldom either pleased or profited by the preaching of the Gospel. There is a great deal of vanity in such hearers. They criticise to display their own acumen, and flatter their self-love by the contrast between their correctness and the imperfections of the preacher.

The fault finding spirit extends to the manners of the preacher, also. There is always some imperfection to be pointed out. He is too familiar, and thus compromises his dignity; he makes himself too common, and will not be appreciated; or he is too reserved, he will never succeed unless he associates more freely with the people. He studies too much and relies too much upon the works of other men, instead of studying human nature by intercourse with the world; or he neglects his books, and will never be able to teach unless he studies. He is idle, and does not spend enough time in his study. The preacher is too strict and spiritual minded; he does not converse about anything but religion; he always looks serious and grave, like one dwelling in eternity; he ought to unbend sometimes, and enter into the innocent pleasures of the world; or, on the other hand, he is too light, and does not talk enough on the subject of religion; he is not sufficiently severe in reproving the vices and follies of the world. Thus there is always some defect or imperfection to be complained of by these fault-finders, and it is impossible for any man, however excellent and useful, to escape their animadversions. They have no charity for any failure or imperfection in their minister. He is either too young or too old, too handsome or too homely, too rich or too poor, too eloquent or too prosing, preaches too long or too short, too loud or too low; he prays too much or too little, he dresses too fine or too coarse. In short, they are seeking for imperfections and defects, rather than the excellencies of character that may be possessed, and may well be compared to the flies, which pass over all the sound parts of the man and light upon his sores.

Sometimes whole churches become infected with this spirit; and if so, woe be to the unfortunate man whose lot is cast among them; they will make his position a most unenviable one, unless he be, like Peter the headstrong, in Knickerbocker, determined to please himself regardless of the whims and wishes of others. Indeed, this is the only way he can succeed in pleasing any one, for if he attempts to accommodate himself to their conflicting tastes and opinions he will neither please them nor himself.

I have generally observed that those church members who are most exacting and fault-finding towards their preachers are apt to be the most delinquent themselves; and no class needs more charity for their imperfections. The man who sustains his preacher, defends him, prays for him, and does his whole duty towards him, will be apt to love him, and will not discover so many faults to complain of; or if he discover faults, it is not to blaze them abroad to his discredit and the injury of religion, but in the spirit of Christian love and meekness to point them out to himself, that they may be corrected. S.

The following notice was lately affixed at a church in Herefordshire, England, and read in the church: "This is to give notice that no person to be buried in this churchyard but those living in the parish; and those who desire to be buried are desired to apply to the parish clerk."

LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

ACAPULCO, March 21, 1855.

Dear Brother—I wrote you a hurried note as we were approaching Aspinwall, which we reached in an hour or two, and staid there some three or four hours, when we took passage on the Panama Railroad for Panama, which we reached in a few hours, and found, as I feared, that the Pacific steamer had sailed without us. We missed her by about half an hour, and the loss of that half-hour caused us the loss of a whole fortnight's precious time in Panama. What important interests hang on a few moments of precious time! And yet how many laugh at the idea of being economists of time! Aspinwall, the northern terminus of the Panama Railroad, is situated at Navy Bay, and affords a tolerable harbor for vessels in the midst of the winds which prevail. The town is small, being called into existence by the Railroad. It is situated in a swamp, the tide sweeping through the yards, and the houses, many of them, being built on piles. The place, I should judge, was unhealthy. Unless all the usual indications of an unhealthy locality should prove fallacious, I should say that chills and fever must certainly thrive well about Aspinwall. Of our stay in Panama I need say nothing new, having written more fully to the Southern Christian Advocate, which you will see, and I trust will copy, that our friends generally who feel an interest in our movements may be kept advised.

On Friday morning last we left the Bay of Panama, on board the magnificent steamer Golden Age, Capt. Watkins. Ship large, 3000 tons burthen, with an engine of 1000 horse power, elegantly fitted up for passengers, of whom she can accommodate about 1200. We have now about 550 passengers, with a large supply of children; so that we are at no less for company or noise. The weather is oppressively hot, and our drinking water about the right temperature for washing dishes; and if you cool it, it must be with ice at twenty-five cents per pound, which won't keep over till next time; so that a man's money invested in that article literally melts away without the owner's permission. Our captain is an old naval officer, an affable and courteous gentleman, and every inch a seaman, who personally inspects everything, and consequently his ship is kept in admirable order. All day on Friday we sailed along in full view of the mountains which skirt all this coast, but on Saturday morning no land was in sight, nor did we again see it before Tuesday, when the mountains which skirt the Gulf of Tehuantepec were dimly seen in the distance. On Wednesday morning, about 10 o'clock, we entered the town of Acapulco, where we shall remain several hours to take in coal; shall probably leave some time to-night, and, God willing, hope to reach San Francisco about this day week, the distance hence being about 1800 miles. This place, though rendered somewhat famous from its connection with the movements of Gen. Alvarez, is an insignificant town with a few hundred inhabitants, dwelling in low, hut-like houses; yet it is one of the most perfect harbors on the globe, perfectly enclosed with high mountains on every side, so that a vessel could ride here in perfect safety, no matter from what quarter of the heavens the tempest without should blow. It is, however, but a miniature harbor, and could not offer shelter for a large fleet. The City of Mexico is distant from this point only about 200 miles, and some small traffic carried on to that point by means of mules—the only way, probably, in which it ever can be carried on. It is at present a coaling station for the Pacific Steamship Company, who have deposited here a large quantity of coal, and when that is gone they intend, I understand, to have all their coal brought by the railroad across the Isthmus to Panama. When that is done Acapulco will lose its present importance. There is something quite interesting and exciting about the appearance of the harbor. The water covered with native boats, each one clamoring for passengers on his boat, raising a din which would be quite creditable to the cab and omnibus men in New Orleans on the arrival of a steamboat or of the railroad cars, while half-a-dozen naked urchins are playing and diving in the water, which they do perfectly fearless of sharks, who visit the harbor in great numbers; and I am told they will dive down and bring up a piece of money from the bottom with perfect impunity, although the sharks are swimming all around them. A good many of our passengers have gone ashore. I await their return and report before I decide on landing myself. I have some suspicion that the pleasure realized would scarcely pay for the expense and trouble of landing.

And now I have thrown together a considerable scrawl, though written in haste. It only remains to say that although it has been so far a trip of privation and a good deal of suffering, yet my heart is found trusting in the Lord. No earthly interests call me to California; no golden prospects induce my visit. I shall probably be several hundred dollars the poorer for coming, yet I believe that God, in his providence, has called me to California, and I go there in obedience to that call. God, I believe, will go with me there. Will our brethren in the ministry and the membership carry us and our cause to the throne of heavenly grace?

Yours, affectionately,

JAS. D. ANDREW.

SAN JOAN DEL SUD, NICARAGUA,
March 12, 1855.

Mr. Editor—At 8 o'clock on the morning of the 1st of March we embarked at New Orleans on the steamship Prometheus, bound for San Francisco, via the San Juan or Nicaragua route. Steam was put on, the signal given, off we started. Soon we rolled past the city, with its forests of masts along its numberless wharves, and past its Algerine neighbor over the way, and in a little while were dashing down the mighty Mississippi, admiring the beautiful summer residences, embowered in evergreen shrubbery, which dotted the shore, and the broad, rich sugar plantations stretching away on either side, with their neat little villages of white negro cabins in the centre. Passing Fort Jackson and the Balize, about sunset we entered the Gulf of Mexico, and were at sea.

And now, as every revolution of the wheel carried us farther from our native land, and from that little world at home in which we may have been somebody, surrounded by strangers who know nothing and care as little about us, we were made to realize what insignificant items we are in the great mass of humanity, and to acknowledge the possibility of the world being able to go along without us altogether. And these feelings of humility were greatly strengthened and confirmed by sea-sickness, the premonitory symptoms of which we soon began to feel, and which soon compelled us to turn into our berths.

The voyage to the Isthmus was smooth and pleasant, with no incident of interest to mark it. We had nothing to do but to read, write, gaze upon the restless, ever-rolling waters, watch the little flocks of flying fish that would flutter and glitter a few moments in the air, and then drop into their more natural and congenial element, or combat sea-sickness and sympathize with our fellow-passengers, many of whom suffered much, and seemed to be fully persuaded that "all was vanity."

The transition from the cold and ice which we left in New Orleans to the heat of the tropics was very sudden and very great. After our entrance into the Caribbean Sea, on the third morning, thin clothing, cooling drinks and fresh breezes were in demand.

About 8 o'clock on the morning of the 7th we came in view of Monkey Point, a bare, barren rock rising abruptly three hundred feet above the level of the beach on our right, and hugging the shore for two hours, which gave us an opportunity to admire and grow enthusiastic over our first view of the magnificent tropical vegetation that grew in the rankest luxuriance down to the very water's edge, we entered the Mosquito Bay, and in a few moments found ourselves in the mouth of the San Juan River, anchored near Point Arenas, and in sight of the classic spot called Greytown.

We were in a few minutes boarded by a number of congos, or small boats, from both sides of the river, the crews of which were doubtless illustrative of the character of the population in general, being composed of Yankees, Spaniards, Indians, negroes and Mestizos. One of them, a Spaniard, who spoke English very well, approached me and said:

"I have a good boat—will you go over to the town?"

"Are the people friendly to the Americans since the visit of Capt. Hollins last year?" I inquired.

"O, yes!" he replied. "There is no use in getting mad with a whole nation for the doings of one man." But I could see from the frown which darkened his swarthy features that the remembrance of Capt. Hollins and the Cyane was not pleasant, or calculated to increase his amiability.

Now for a description of Greytown, or San Juan del Norte. Imagine a low, sandy beach, terminating a few hundred yards from the water in an apparently impenetrable jungle of tropical trees and undergrowth. Ranged in a parallel line with the water is a double row of houses and huts, some built of boards, others of reeds and all thatched with palm leaves. They are only one story high, and have no chimneys. Many of them are mere sheds, open at the sides, and without floors. The residence of the American Minister, which is about a mile below the main town, is the only one at all respectable in appearance. A tattered flag, the ensign of his Mosquito Majesty, droops from a stumpy flagstaff on the top of a hut in the centre of the town.

A party of us, eleven in number, went ashore in a berge belonging to a native. The inhabitants were of every color, almost of every nation, and of every degree of degradation—low, lower, lowest. A couple of very black Jamaica negroes were quarrelling in front of a hut, and making strong demonstrations of fight. Everybody greeted us politely and respectfully, from the well-dressed, keen-looking Yankees down to the half and wholly naked savages that lounged about the filthy huts. One of the many branches by which the San Juan empties into the sea forms a semi-circle in the rear of the town. On its banks most of the wearing apparel belonging to the place, which had been washed in its clear waters, was spread out on the green grass to dry. Being our first visit to the tropics, all we saw was new and very interesting. The beautiful trees and flowers, the coffee plant, the breadfruit, the monkeys, the parrots, the iguanos, all were interesting. A negro had just returned from a hunt, and had about half a dozen iguanos. It is impossible to imagine anything uglier. They resemble a lizard, to which family of reptiles they belong. Their bodies, exclusive of the long, snake-like tail, which is from two to three feet in length, are about eighteen inches long, and about eight inches in circumference. Their heads are small, and on the top of it is a little tuft or horn, which adds nothing to their beauty. The natives eat them, and pronounce them delicious food. They also eat monkies, and prize them highly as an article of diet.

Point Arenas, on the other side of the river, is a narrow peninsula between the San Juan and an arm of the sea. The Nicaragua Transit Company have erected a number of buildings near the terminus of this peninsula, from the summit of one of which floats the stars and stripes. Two or three small steamers, such as are used in the navigation of the river, lie along the shore, and flatboats, congoes and canoes are scattered promiscuously about. From the greater depth of channel, and other circumstances, this would seem to be the better site for a town, but the unwholesomeness of the water, or some other cause, renders a residence there fatal to all who attempt it. At least so say the old settlers of San Juan del Norte.

As we lay anchored in the river between these two places on the afternoon of the day of our arrival, waiting for the coming of the steamer Northern Light, from New York, the view that met our gaze was such as could only be found in the tropics. Beneath the warm rays of a torrid sun lay in profound repose the silver waters of the Mosquito Gulf, the luxuriant vegetation fringing its banks forming an emerald setting to the silver picture, while the colossal volcanic peak of Cotargo, sixty miles distant, lifted its dark form high above the gigantic mahogany forests in the intervening distance, and above the white clouds that boiled up at its base, and sported along its side.

To the courtesy of Capt. Churchill, the veteran commander, and to Dr. Russel, the polite, intelligent and gentlemanly purser of the Prometheus, we were much indebted for the pleasure and comfort of this part of our voyage.

About 3 o'clock on the morning of the 8th the Northern Light arrived. The passengers and baggage of the two steamers were immediately transferred to the river boat, which was a small steamer with two decks, open at the sides, and at early dawn we started up the river and across the Isthmus to Nicaragua.

The scenery of the river was indescribably beautiful, and more than realized my highest anticipations. I had never fully conceived the luxuriances of tropical vegetation. The impenetrable wall of living green that rose from the water's edge on either side, the endless variety of tropical trees, clothed in their unfading green robes, interlaced and draped with flowers of every hue, and size and shape, and vines and air plants wherever there was an atom of space or anything to cling to; the huge alligators that lay sunning themselves thick along the shore; the beautiful birds, large and small, that displayed their bright and varied plumage, and enlivened the air with their music; the chattering monkeys, springing from tree to tree and from branch to branch in the tall groves among which they sought shade and food; the little thatched huts peeping out upon the river at intervals, and the occasional plantain fields in all their luxuriant beauty; the congos, with their crews of naked boatmen, rowing leisurely and gracefully down the stream, all presented a scene new, striking and delightful. We saw every moment something we had never seen before, and soon despaired of ever being able to find out the names of half the trees, flowers and birds that we beheld.

A large proportion of our passengers were wicked, reckless fellows, with whisky in their heads, oaths in their mouths, and revolvers and bowie-knives in their pockets. They amused themselves with playing cards, swearing, and shooting at everything that they could see. As the boat would be passing where a long, rusty-looking alligator lay comfortably dreaming in the sun, a volley of fifty revolvers would rouse him from his slumbers, when he would roll lazily into the water.

There were about 250 passengers on board, most of whom belonged to the steerage, and were a rough, noisy, profane set of fellows, but good-natured and well disposed in the main. They drank incredible quantities of liquor, and kept up a vast deal of noise. No provision had been made for feeding the passengers on the boat. Crackers, ham, &c., were brought forth by those who had been prudent enough to provide them, and such as had neglected it had to do without. About dark the heat stopped, and we lay by for the night. Our situation was quite romantic, and we rather enjoyed it. The air was warm and pleasant. The sky was clear, and the light of the stars was reflected from the dark waters of the silent river. From the banks spread out the magnificent tropical forest, where the puma, and the jaguar, and the cougar, the wild boar and the deer roamed in undisturbed security. Spreading our cloaks on deck, we threw ourselves upon them, and with the rest of our fellow passengers lying promiscuously around us, in the same way, slept sweetly and soundly, only disturbed by the boisterous singing and dancing of a drunken Pennsylvanian, who at last became exhausted by his efforts and tumbled down with the rest of us.

When we awoke the next morning we were not annoyed with the trouble of washing our faces and making our toilets. There was a shoal in the river, and to lighten the boat so as to enable it to pass, the men got out and walked a mile and a half, where they got on again. The scenery presented the same appearance as that of the preceding day, displaying the same luxuriance, beauty and variety; and the passengers conducted themselves in the same manner. At noon we arrived at the Castillo Rapids, and here we waited one day for the boat from the Pacific side.

Fort Castile, which stands on an eminence commanding the river at the rapids, is one of the oldest structures in America, having been built by the Spaniards in 1522. My knowledge of architecture and its technicalities is too limited to enable me to give a detailed and accurate description of it. Though it has existed for three centuries, exposed to the action of time and the elements, its walls are still standing, and possess nearly all their original strength, and in the hands of brave men would be almost impregnable. They are built of stone, with brick cornices, and stuccoed with a peculiar kind of cement, which has, when dried, the hardness and durability of adamant.

This fort was in the hands of the Democratic or Revolutionary party of Nicaragua until last December, when it was attacked and captured by a party of Government troops under Gen. Coral. I conversed with an intelligent English gentleman who saw the fight. Several men were killed on each side, and about fifty of the Revolutionists were made prisoners. Gen. Chamorro has established a small garrison here, consisting of about twenty mulattoes, two of whom were on guard when we visited the fort. One of them was lying asleep on a bench under a little shed on the summit, and the other stood holding a short, greasy musket, which he presented as we came up, and warned us to come no further, though evidently fearing a revolver that peeped from under my friend's coat. A number of the prisoners are confined here. The main body, however, were sent to Grenada. Twenty of those who escaped over the river, with the view of making their way to Costa Rica, lost their way in the woods, and eighteen of the twenty perished with hunger. The other two were taken and brought back.

At the rapids is a small village. There are three or four hotels, kept by Americans and Germans. We (my wife and I) were charged seven dollars per day while there; a fact which shows they know something of high living in the tropics. The native women dressed in their gayest attire, though rather scantily to our view, were ranged around the landing selling oranges, lemons, bananas, plantains, cocoa-nuts, ginger beer, lemonade, maple sugar, cakes, sweetmeats, &c., while the men lounged listlessly about, with their bare feet and in their shirt sleeves, and many of them without pantaloons, looking for all the world like the lowest class of free negroes in Virginia or Georgia. We saw some costumes even lighter than the above, consisting of only a straw hat and a cigar!

Towards noon the next day a shout from "the boys" announced the arrival of the boat that was to take us on, and amid much shouting, swearing and crowding of men, women and children, we started. After going some thirty miles we were transferred to a larger boat, in which we were to cross Lake Nicaragua. About dark we arrived at San Carlos. There is here a custom-house and a fort, with a small garrison. The commandante had notified the officers of the company that no vessel would be allowed to pass the fort after 6 o'clock P. M., the Government having the fear of Col. Kinney and the filibusters before their eyes. The consequence was we had again to lay by all night. The sleeping accommodations were not superb. The floor of the cabin furnished a bed, brother Stewart's saddlebags answered for a pillow, and the buzzing of a large swarm of mosquitoes made a lullaby; while the sleepers(?) were arranged in the most picturesque confusion, each having chosen that position which was most agreeable to his fancy—check shirts, heavy boots and big whiskered Californians were in close proximity to soft ringlets, rosy cheeks and silk dresses.

At length morning dawned, the sun arose, we obtained a gracious permission to pass, and we entered Lake Nicaragua. This lake is the great topographical feature of the country, being sixty miles in width and one hundred and twenty in length. Its waters are clear and abound in excellent fish. It is dotted with numerous islands, many of which we passed; among the rest, the volcanic mountain of Omatope lifted its sharp, conical peak, scorched and blackened by the lava streams which have poured down its sides for centuries, thousands of feet above the bosom of the lake whose waters dash and fret around its base. Repeated attempts have been made to ascend to its summit, but without success. The dense jungle, the poisonous reptiles, and the fierce wild beasts render the enterprise difficult and dangerous, if not impossible. A species of monkey, called the congo, of unusual size and fierceness, inhabit it in great numbers, and seem to have resolved to keep away all intruders. They not long since attacked a German naturalist who had ventured alone some distance up the mountain, and he only saved his life by a precipitate and undignified retreat.

After a run of six hours, we had crossed the lake. Anchoring about two hundred yards from the shore, we were landed by means of a life-boat. There was a heavy swell in the waters of the lake, but all got ashore safely, receiving, however, a good drenching from the spray. The point of landing is called Virgin's Bay. This is a small town, very much like Castillo in all respects—at least, so far as regards the character, condition and occupations of its inhabitants.

Here we found a number of wagons, and an indefinite number of stunted, lean-looking mules, ready to transport us to the Pacific, a distance of 12 miles. Making a hasty purchase of fruits from the natives on the shore, placing my wife in one of the wagons, I mounted a donkey, and away we dashed, the muleteers hawling, "the boys" shouting and belaboring the unfortunate mules, and everybody in a high state of excitement and enjoyment.

About dark, we came to the Half-way House, where liquors and eatables are kept for the thirsty and hungry travelers. Here our drivers halted, with the intention of remaining until the moon rose, declaring the road to be very bad and dangerous. We remonstrated in vain. Everybody seemed to be drunk, or fast becoming so. A quarrel soon commenced between a native and one of our party. The former drew his machette, and slightly wounded the latter. The excitement was intense. Every Californian wanted to shoot the native. Soon the natives began to quarrel among themselves. Drawing their machettes (a kind of small sword) with angry imprecations, they would rush upon each other with the greatest fury—taking particular care, however, to stop before they came within striking distance, where they would again commence abusing each other with the utmost violence. Their women, too, took part in the quarrel—some screamed with rage, while others tried to get their husbands away. Many of our "boys" were hungry for a fight, and it was with great difficulty we could restrain them from shooting somebody, it mattered little whom. For a few minutes the greatest excitement prevailed. Some one told a gentleman of our party, who was greatly frightened, that a body of natives, twelve hundred strong, were posted a short distance ahead, to attack us as we passed—which added greatly to his alarm, and almost threw some of the Indies into hysterics.

We partially succeeded in getting our people quiet. A portion of those who had been detained on the way, now came up. The natives were still quarreling, but we hunted up our drivers, some of whom were tolerably sober—starting them ahead, we mounted our donkeys, formed a body-guard, and on we went. My mule, though a little self-willed, and a rough trotter, got thoroughly aroused, and displayed a great deal of enthusiasm for one of his species. He only balked with me into the woods once, though from the fact that my bridle was merely a rope tied around his head, without any bit or curb, it was a little difficult to persuade him to come back. My saddle I shall long remember. It was made of wood, covered with raw-hide, which having been wet and drying in the sun, was diversified with hard ridges, which rendered the short, rough motion of the mule by no means agreeable.

The road was hilly but smooth, and we were not long in performing the remainder of our journey, after we once got started. About midnight we got within sight of the lights in the town of San Juan del Sud, and for the first time saw the waters of the great Pacific, the surf rolling close along the sandy beach by which we entered the place.

San Juan del Sud (or San Juan on the South) occupies the shore of a narrow bay making in from the sea, and surrounded by high, rocky cliffs, with a few acres of level sandy beach in front, upon which the village is situated. There are several hotels (all kept in the true tropical style, i. e., poor fare and high prices,) one or two stores, and a number of huts occupied by natives. We stopped with Mr. Pricot, the American Consul, who keeps the best house, (though his is nothing to boast of,) who is a gentleman, a "good fellow," and who did all he could to make us comfortable. We found such a variety of the most delicious fruits, however, that we cared but little for anything else. The oranges here were particularly delicious.

Here we saw the last of Nicaragua and the Isthmus. Though, perhaps, possessing natural advantages as great as any portion of the globe of equal extent, it is in a state of the utmost poverty and degradation. Its population are a miserable, mongrel, degraded, lazy, worthless race—its government is worse than no government at all—and its religion is Popery in its worst, most pernicious development.

I did intend to give an outline of the political history, and present condition of Nicaragua; but the story is too long to be told here. Suffice it to say, that they are now looking confidently for the speedy termination of the third civil war within the last four years! They are too cowardly to hurt each other much; but the little energy they have they expend in these suicidal contests, and hence the ground is untilled, the resources of the country undeveloped, and were it not that they have already sunk to the lowest possible degradation, would continue to degenerate. If the time shall ever come when our civil institutions, and our Protestant religion shall be brought here by our own people, Nicaragua must, in view of its unbounded natural resources within itself, and its relative position, become one of the most important, and one of the most prosperous portions of the globe.

Enough for Nicaragua (I am afraid the reader has mentally said that long ago.) When I write again, it will be from California.

Truly, OSCAR P. FITZGERALD.

A CARD.

The extract below is from a letter published in the New Orleans Christian Advocate of April 7th, over the signature of R. Abbey, of Yazoo City, and refers to a request made to the editors of the Church Herald for a list of their subscribers, for the avowed purpose of sending a pamphlet published by him:

"My friend in Vicksburg, when he could not get the notice published, asked for a list of their subscribers, or rather for the privilege of making a list at his own expense. This the editors promised, but the agent of the paper peremptorily refused."

This statement gives an incorrect impression of the transaction referred to. The business agent of the Herald, without consulting with the editors, refused to allow a list of the subscribers to the Herald to go out of the office, but offered the party who appeared on the part of Mr. Abbey every facility for using the list within the office, or to allow Mr. A. to use it, or to direct and mail the pamphlets as desired, rather than admit such a violation of all precedent and of business propriety as to give a copy of the list of subscribers out of his hands, thus surrendering it to the general use of persons who might use it to their great annoyance in future.

Later from Texas.

The steamship Ohio, Morgan, Capt. Lawless, arrived on Saturday last, bringing dates from Galveston to the 12th. The News of that date says:

We have had fine pleasant weather for several days, but the drought continues, and the supply of water in our cisterns is getting short.

In some portions of the interior they have had some rain, but in other sections great complaint is made for want of it.

A letter to the News, dated Liberty, March 23, says:

An attempt was made to murder three good citizens of this county, by a band of assassins, on the night of the 24th, or morning of the 25th, about 1 o'clock, A. M. The object of the assassins was the release of Mr. Joseph White, who stands committed for the murder of Levi Barrow about one year ago, but they did not succeed. He was guarded by three men, one of whom was badly wounded in the night arm, having received two shots—one from a rifle, the other from a shot gun, which have so mutilated him that it is doubtful whether he will recover.

The San Antonio Texan states that the Indians have been committing depredations in the Medina and Hondo valleys. A company of minute men was organized, and recently on a scout after Indians, they came upon four Waccos, on whom they fired, killing one and wounding two others. These Indians had one stolen horse with them, and were prepared with bridles and ropes for stealing others.

The same paper says a party of Indians lately stole twenty-three horses from Mr. Davenport, of Sabinal, in Bexar county, and at the same time shot an arrow through a Mexican in Mr. D's employ, who was driving the horses up for the purpose of penning them. There is but little hope of the Mexican's recovery.

The Texan has still later information to the effect that Mr. Davenport's neighbors had left, and moved further down the country. He would probably be compelled to leave also.

Two nights previous the Indians took two horses from Mr. Ware, who lives in the same neighborhood, and eight days before they drove off eleven head from the canon, and another neighbor by the name of Riley has just lost forty head.

By another letter, dated one day later, says the Texan, we are informed that all the horses in the neighborhood have been stolen, and they are satisfied that it was by the Tonkaways. Mr. Davenport, and a man by the name of Brown, started on the trail, which took them nearly in sight of the camp of the Tonkaways, when they found that the Indians had fired the grass, and they were obliged to return home to protect their wives and children.

A letter to the Austin State Gazette, dated Fort Belknap March 17, says:

Capt. Colhoun's command, consisting of two companies of dragoons and Capts. Rogers's, Boggess's and Fitzhugh's companies of rangers, returned day before yesterday, all in good health, horses tolerable. They had a long and tedious scout. No Indians were seen.

Maj. Merrill's command came in yesterday from above up the Colorado, after Indians who drove off cattle and killed a Delaware near Chadbourne. No Indians were seen.

The Henderson Democrat states that the fire at Magnolia, which destroyed over 1,700 bales of cotton, was supposed to have originated from a lighted candle, which some gamblers had been using. The principal losers were C. Vincent, of Mount Enterprise, who lost 347 bales; G. R. Grimes, of Cherokee, 147 bales; Lightfoot, of Palestine, 107 bales. The balance of the loss falls mostly on planters of Anderson and Cherokee counties.

A gentleman named Frank Lee, of Kentucky, is making public addresses in the Western portion of the state in favor of a prohibitory liquor law. The Waco says his speeches are the best it has heard on this important question.

We learn from the Texan, that Mr. George Giddings, who is now the contractor, left San Antonio on the 3d inst., for Santa Fe with the largest mail that has ever passed between the two points, and five passengers. It is understood that the compensation is $33,500 per annum, and the mail is to be carried twice a month.

A person writing from Wheelock, Robertson county, states that Mr. Wm. D. Miller, a lawyer, was shot and killed on the morning of the 21 inst., in an affray with Lewis Tubbs, Burl Brown, and T. A. Johnson and brother. The fatal rencontre appears to have been caused by an old difficulty between Miller and T. A. Johnson, who had been partners in land speculations. Miller was a native of Kentucky, and removed to Wheelock in the fall of 1865.

The San Antonio Ledger, of the 7th, reports every branch of business quite active in that city. The population, now numbering about nine thousand, the Ledger says is increasing rapidly. The Ledger is of opinion that no place in the State improves so fast as San Antonio.

Deaths.

Died—In Thibodaux, on the 28th ult., after a few days' illness and extreme suffering, Mary Ann Dixon, aged 26 years 11 months and 3 days.

Sister D. was a native of New York. At the age of nine years her father (a Mr. Byers) removed with his family to New Orleans, where her mother soon died with the yellow fever, and her father some time after, in Liverpool.

The orphan girl grew up, and on the 12th of November, 1848, was married to Joseph Dixon.

Some time after, removing to Thibodaux, she fell in a revival under the labors of brother [illegible], in the year 1852, they both united with the M. E. Church, South, in which she lived a consistent member till death.

She bereaved husband, with three children, and an infant three weeks old, together with a number of friends, mourn her decease. Sister Dixon was ready. Trusting in the merits of Christ, and resigned to the will of God. After prayer and singing the hymn—

"Bright angels are from glory come,
They're round my bed, They're in my room,
They wait to waft my spirit home,
All is well! all is well!"

the frail form of nature was hushed into the stillness of death, and the spirit took its flight to dwell! We miss thee on earth, but will meet thee in Heaven. Sam'l Hawes.

Thibodaux, April 10, 1855.

Died—At the residence of the late Thos. Howe, on Red River, Natchitoches parish, on the 1st inst., Alice McCallen, aged 2 years. In October, 1850, she experienced the pardoning mercy of God, cast her lot among the people of God called Methodists, and till her death lived a consistent Christian.

In her last illness she suffered much, but did not repine. For her, death had no terrors.

Shortly before her death she remarked, "I know, father, you'll give me up freely, as I am going to Jesus." Never have I seen before so young as onlm and collected in the prospect of death. She frequently said to me, "Oh, father, how true the words of the Bible: 'Jesus can make a dying bed feel soft as downy pillows are.'"

Her loss has left many friends to lament her death; but their loss is her infinite gain.

H. McCallen.

Died—In Greensboro', Ala., April 8th, of scarlet fever, James Elmer, son of Rev. T. J. and Mrs. S. J. Kogor, aged 9 months and 15 days.

The Quarterly Review for April.

This number is now on its way to its destination, through the length and breadth of South and Southwest. It will carry to readers a rich variety of matter, adapted, more or less to the great object of publication. It has cost us not a little anxiety. He is greatly mistaken who supposes the preparation of such a work for the public eye to his without pains or solicitude. Experience only can realize the difficulties. A peculiar class of responsibilities are encountered, in addition to an editor's ordinary labor. The work must sustain a life-character. Its reputation and its utility must, to a great extent, upon this feature. It must exhibit the higher forms of cultivation both of thought and of expression, in order to meet the expectation which it justly awakens. It must take rank with the progress of the age, now so rapid and influential around us. It must be the companion of cultivated ladies and gentlemen, of academies, colleges, of universities, of all classes of intelligent readers. It must minister to their need, inform their understandings. It must occupy, not the fugitive moments, but the quiet, thoughtful hour. Such is one of the responsibilities which we would foreign large, but of which we are conscious of going too far short. There is one yet still higher: the soundness, the purity, the edifying, and the religious tendency of the matter which it contains; the influence which it should exert upon its readers. To comprehend this idea, as a whole, and to accomplish the purpose, is the most serious and difficult of our duties. Something infinitely more than a mere editorial despatch is required here: more than a mere exercise of the judgment. "The wisdom that cometh from above," without which we must ever wander, in endless mazes lost." With a sufficient study of this wisdom may God endow us! In deciding upon the merits of a variety of materials, sometimes painfully scant, how difficult it is always to satisfy ourselves. In a good degree, we are persuaded, these wants are met in our Quarterly; and it will be our steady aim to approximate them more nearly. But we have stated these facts, in part, at least, to show that they cannot be fully realized without the zealous co-operation of the ministers and members of the Church. We cannot obtain articles of high literary merit, of well digested matter, with any constancy, without paying from $1 to $2 per printed page. It is preposterous to think of it. Occasionally voluntary articles of this class may reach us, but we cannot depend upon them for our regular issues. And then, are they to be procured? We do not solicit donations for the Review. We only ask that its circulation be extended, that the subscription list be so increased that we may be able to contract for the necessary labor. Thus while each subscriber will receive for $2 the very best publication of the kind in the South, the editor will be enabled to meet all the expenses of the publication, without encumbering the general agents with the weight of debt. This has always been our aim. Four thousand paying subscribers would suffice to do this, and even more. And where are these amongst the tens and hundreds of thousands in our Israel? We regret that in view of the increase of our list we were struck off a larger number of copies for the present volume than we have ventured before. We beg, therefore, that subscriptions be obtained for the entire volume, for every copy. If our friends will exert themselves on the appearance of the April number it will be in time to secure our object.

D. S. Doggett, Editor.

Richmond, Va., April 7, 1855.

New Publications.

Mr. H. D. McGinness has laid the following books on our table, from the publishers, Harper & Brothers, New York.

The Literary Life and Correspondence of the Countess of Blessington. By R. R. Madden, M. R. I. A. In two octavo volumes: 1855.

This work has made a sensation, and has been extensively noticed by the secular press in dealing with his subject the author has presented the public with a plausible and ingenious specimen of moral and literary whitewashing—we speak of his estimate of the Countess' character as a woman and her merit as an authoress. The work is of interest chiefly for the sketches of letters which it contains of nearly all the literary, political and fashionable celebrities of the past half-century. It is a panorama of literary personalities, a paper firmament in which the greater and some of the lesser lights of genius are set. Lady Blessington was the centre, Count d'Orsay the Mercury of this world of stars.

Travels in Europe and the East—A year in England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austrin, Italy, Greece, Turkey, Syria, Palestine and Egypt. By Samuel Irenæus Prime. In two vols. octavo.

The typography and illustrations of these volumes are refreshing to weak eyes. If the author has performed his part as well as the publishers have theirs, this is a work of rare merit. Some of the chapters which we have read are highly entertaining. Others are too much in the mill-horse path, abounding in the commonplaces of tourists. The first chapter is like all first chapters, running, thus in its contents: "Leaving home—on the sea—the voyage—a storm—a wreck—a man overboard—land." When will there rise up a traveler with sufficient originality to say nothing about a man overboard, and not nauseate his readers with stereotyped descriptions of sea-sickness?

These books of travel, for the most part, read very much as though they were prepared to order before the voyage, and afterwards completed by the filling up of a few blanks here and there. Mr. Prime brings to his task a fresher eye and more graphic pen than most in this kind of book making.

The Story of the Peasant Boy Philosopher—Or, A Child Gathering Pebbles on the Seashore. Founded on the early life of Ferguson the shepherd boy astronomer, and intended to show how a poor lad became acquainted with the principles of natural science. By Henry Mayhew.

This is a beautiful 12mo, interesting and instructive. One of the best of books for ten year old boys and girls, and not unsuitable for children of larger growth. The preface by the author is an essay which abounds in excellent thought and suggestions.

Harper's Story Books, No. V.—Frank. April, 1855.

A little book for little children; beautifully illustrated, with a taking cover.

An Introduction to Practical Astronomy, with a collection of astronomical tables. By Elias Loomis, LL. D., Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the University of the city of New York, author of a Course of Mathematics, &c.

This work is large and complete. The author proposes it for the use of the following persons, chiefly—1st, amateur observers, who have in their possession astronomical instruments which they wish to employ to the best advantage, and feel the need of more specific instruction than can be gathered from the elementary text-books; 2d, practical surveyors, engineers, astronomers, and all persons who have occasion to engage in astronomical computations; 3d, the entire corps of young men who are engaged in a course of liberal education. To these and all other star-gazers we commend the work.

Quarterly Review of the M. E. Church, South.

The April number of this periodical is at hand. The rapid and unsatisfactory glance that we have been able to give it leads us to a very high estimate of its contents. We think it has not been surpassed, in many respects, by former numbers. The face of the venerable Dr. L. Pierce adorns the first page.

Article 1 is a biographical sketch of Bishop Capers, by Rev. Wm. M. Wightman, D. D. It will be read with interest by all who have access to the pages of the Review.

2. "Fitzhugh's Sociology for the South," by Geo. Frederick Holmes, Tazewell county, Va.

3. "Haggai." A new translation, with explanatory notes, by Rev. T. Y. Moore, D. D., Richmond, Va.

4. "The Heredian Family." From the German, by John D. Reiley, Petersburg, Va.

5. "Italian Literature," by Joseph B. Cobb, Esq., Mississippi.

6. "The Beatitudes." From the German, by Rev. Nelson Head, Lynchburg, Va.

7. "The Rhemish New Testament," by Rev. A. Spence, Ala.

8. "Rosser on Baptism," by Rev. G. W. Langhorne, Petersburg, Va.

"Remarks on the meaning of Heb. 1: 7," from the Journal of Sacred Literature.

9. Brief Reviews.

A dispatch of the 8th inst. from Baltimore, says:

The mate and part of the crew of the John Cheston, taken off the brig Two Friends, by the Lucy Sharp, arrived from Wilmington this morning. They represent that they pumped the vessel twenty-one days and nights, that the water tanks leaked, and that the water was unfit for use; that the crew were all sick with the dysentary and scurvy, from using bad water. The brig Two Friends could furnish no water and no relief; the water still gaining on them, and believing it impossible to get her into port, they concluded to abandon the vessel. They deny all knowledge of the sugar holes.

We believe this statement agrees substantially with that made by a portion of the crew arrested at Havana.

Shipments of Sugar.

The Railroad Necessity.

We clip the subjoined statistics from the Franklin (St. Mary) Planters' Banner of the 12th inst. They will be found interesting and important, not only on account of their bearing upon the sugar trade of this city, but for the detailed information furnished:

Shipments by Sea from Franklin of the Crop of 1854-5, up to April 1, 1855.

Crop of Same Last Year.

Total number of hhds. of Sugar	24,985
" bbls.	5
" hhds. Molasses	1

According to the above figures 37,622 hhds of sugar and 55,012 barrels of molasses were shipped from the port of Franklin for the year ending 31st of March last. For the year ending on the 31st March, 1854, there were shipped from the same point 24,985 hhds. of sugar, and (we omit the two small items) 31,854 barrels of molasses. This exhibits an increase of shipments by sea the past year over shipments of the previous year of 12,637 hhds. of sugar, and 15,158 barrels of molasses. The value of the produce thus shipped, according to the estimate of our cotemporary, is very near two millions of dollars. The city of New York took more sugar and molasses than all the other ports named. Of the 37,622 hogsheads of sugar that sought a market by sea, she received over 19,000, and of the 55,012 barrels of molasses, over 31,000. Quite a large contribution of sweetness from a single, unprotending Louisiana port. And, while we furnish sweetening for nearly all the good things used for household consumption at the North, including the raw material which forms the basis of the candy manufacturers—and how children do love candy—a great number of the people there make it a point to look at us as sourly as possible. This is an egcousistent outrage. They should abandon the use of our sugar, or gaze sweetly upon us. We don't care a fig which alternative they take; but they should adopt one or the other. They have no right to use our sweetening and then abuse us because we accommodated them. Such a course looks more like borrowing a man's money and then villifying him for lending it, than any thing else we can think of just at present.

But, a truce to badinage. The subject is a serious one, especially to us of the city. We cannot afford to laugh at this diversion of trade, small and unimportant as it is in itself, for the simple reason that it is but one of innumerable diversions of a similar character—all united, constituting an aggregate of formidable proportions. These small contributions make up the mighty sum total of the commerce transacted in this commercial mart, and are to New Orleans what the larger and smaller bayous and greater and lesser tributaries are to the Mississippi river. Let these diversions continue to multiply on every hand, and the far-famed Crescent will soon cease to be a city of much mercantile importance, just as the old Father of Rivers would speedily hide his diminished head if all of his subject streams should dry up. He could stand the drying up of a dozen or so of his customers and not feel it, but if the epidemic should become general it would destroy his usefulness and grandeur. Just so with us. We have stood a good many diversions of trade, like that mentioned above, but we cannot afford to indulge in the amusement any longer. It is too expensive and risky. Besides, the further we go the worse we are off, and the future, instead of brightening, grows more and more gloomy.

The figures given above, in reference to the port of Franklin, illustrate and prove one great necessity, as well as clearly indicate the only remedy within our reach—railroads. Superficial readers may think we attach too much importance to a small illustration. To all such we would propound the interrogatory—how great was the incident that rendered Isaac Newton the most illustrious astronomer the earth has ever produced? "Straws show which way the wind blows" just as accurately as the most conspicuous vane upon the top of the loftiest steeple. Slight causes very frequently lead to great results; just as a trifling disease, if unattended to, produces death; or a small break in our southern levees, if not promptly repaired, eventuates in the inundation of a vast tract of country and the destruction of an immense amount of property. For instance: low waters and the absence of railroad communication—and these are the solo causes—have sent to other, if not rival ports, in a single year, from an obscure point, over 12,000 hhds. of sugar and over 15,000 bbls. of molasses. Had we enjoyed railroad facilities, this sugar and molasses would all have sought our levee, its legitimate market, and brought with it as much more. Here would have been a large gain instead of a loss. Owing to the same causes precisely we have lost, the past two seasons, an enormous trade from St. Louis, Cincinnati and Louisville—enough of actual cash to have built all three of the great railroads now in progress in this State. What has been lost from these sources is lost for ever. There have been other losses of no small magnitude, all chargeable to the low waters and the lack of railroads. Northwestern Louisiana, Arkansas, and many other sections that must necessarily seek this port for an outlet, have been, as it were, a sealed book, a sort of terra incognita to us. Their produce, if the rivers ever do rise, will come here; but in the mean time the sacrifices, troubles and inconveniences of both planter and merchant, have been of the most serious description.

We might pursue this subject at great length, and multiply instances upon instance, and illustration to illustration and pile proof upon proof, all going to show the overwhelming necessity which is pressing upon us that we must emancipate ourselves from the ruinous thralldom of low and uncertain rivers. Until this is done we can look for neither certainty, regularity or profit in our business transactions. We will be in a state of dependence and suspense all the time. The experience of the past two seasons—bitter, protracted and ruinous—demonstrates this but too sadly. Were the New Orleans and Opelousas, the Vicksburg and Shreveport, and the New Orleans and Jackson roads completed, a very great relief would be at once experienced. The Jackson road and its connections would save us on the East, while the others would render us comparatively independent on the West. Then let the railroads be rushed along. The iron horse and his attachés will prove our best and surest friends. [Daily Crescent.

Weather Prospects, etc.—We clip the following from the Richmond (Madison Parish) Journal, of the 6th:

A glorious shower on Wednesday night has given the earth a new appearance. We may now reasonably expect a speedy stand of corn and a supply of vegetables, the want of which has been sensibly felt.

The river water made its appearance in Roundaway Bayou at this place on Tuesday last. The rise is so slow that we fear there will not be sufficient water to enable our Tensas friends to get off their crops.

Later from Havana.

The United States mail steamship Black Warrior, Captain J. D. Bullock, left New York on the 26th inst., arrived at Havana on the 14th, and sailed for this port next day. She crossed the bar on Sunday, at half past four, P. M., and arrived at Pollock Wednesday morning, having been detained several hours by the fog. We are indebted to her purser for the following memoranda:

The U. S. steamer Princeton was still in port. Her officers and crew were all well.

On the Morro the Black Warrior spoke the U. S. sloop of war Jamestown, Comdr Ellicott, bearing the broad pennant of Com. Crabbe, from Norfolk, bound to, with all well on board.

Dr. Peck, the person who was arrested at Puerto Principe, comes passenger in the Black Warrior. He was arrested by mistake and brought to Havana; but he was afterwards released, with the freedom of the island, excepting Puerto Principe. As his business was in that town, however, he preferred coming to the United States.

Sixteen companies of mulattoes are being organized, to be attached to the infantry as soon as arms are delivered to them.

The Military Commission was in session last Friday and Saturday. Nothing of their proceedings had transpired.

We have received by this arrival full files of Havana papers to the 15th.

La Prensa of that date has an elaborate article upon the prospects of the next Presidential campaign in the United States, wherein it predicts will be the most hotly contested of any that has been known since the foundation of the Republic, and it expresses much surprise that many of the very States that constituted the largest majorities in the election of the present Chief Magistrate, should before his term expires, give evidence of the utmost hostility to his administration. The writer goes on to state that the Democrats have evidently chosen as their favorite candidate for the Presidency no other than the filibuster, Gen. J. A. Quitman.

"We have believed," says the writer, "that this personage aspired to the first position in the nation, and also, this ambition was what induced him to become Chief of the filibustering expeditions, believing that he would thus become popular with classes most powerful at the elections in that country, where fists and slung-shots are the most eminent arguments employed."

We quote this opinion as one eminently Spanish.

The officers and soldiers of the four battalions of Havana volunteers have commenced raising a subscription of one dollar per month each soldier, and four dollars per month each officer, for a given time—12 months or longer—for the purpose of arming said battalions with Minnie rifles, without cost to the Government. Four merchants, officers in the battalions, had undertaken to advance the sum necessary to purchase and import the guns, and it was thought they could be obtained immediately.

The Prensa states that the commerce of Havana and of the entire island has suffered much during the two past months of February and March, in consequence of the condition of things in which the island was placed, but that American commerce has also suffered, and that it is as much the interest of the American as the Cuban merchant to put an end to the confusion arising from reports of invading expeditions.

The Diario fires up indignantly because the Delta saw fit to speak of the Spaniards as brave and resolute dogs. The Diario admits that the Spaniards may be likened to dogs in one respect—that they stand ready to defend their domicils against thieves who are intent upon breaking in to steal. It intimates that the writer of the Delta's article has lived a long time in Cuba.

By Magnetic Telegraph.

Charleston, April 13.—The steamship Isabel has arrived at this port with dates from Havana to the 10th inst., being the same as received by the Philadelphia at New Orleans.

Many assassinations had occurred during the holidays. Senor Rabiestra, the manager of the railway, and Lawyer Cultra had been liberated by Concha, and are allowed to travel in Europe.

The British steamer Clyde arrived at Havana on the 9th inst., in six days passage from Vera Cruz. By her, the Courier has advices from the revolution, said to be six days later than those received by way of New Orleans. Every thing indicates the speedy fall of Santa Anna. Moreno's disaffection, subsequent capture and execution were all a fable to entrap Alvarez.

Col. Zires was recently discomfitted at Cazeres, his whole regiment dispersed by the revolutionists, and three in attempting to cross the Passagayo River, were drowned.

Governor Mximo Ortez, on a march from Ichtucan, to Tehuantepec fell into an ambuscade, and his whole force of six hundred men was nearly annihilated.

Accounts from the South are favorable to the cause of the revolutionists—Alvarez is supreme in Guerrero. It is the universal opinion that Santa Anna will be obliged to fly the country, and it is also evident that the Allied European powers stimulated Mexican internal commotions, to bring Mexico on their side, and indirectly her with Cuba.

Results of the Fort Laramie Massacre.

The St. Louis Republican publishes an interesting letter from Platte river, dated March 12, in regard to the consequences resulting from the line of policy adopted against the Sioux Indians since the Fort Laramie massacre. We make the following extracts:

It is known when the soldiers fired they wounded the Bear in three places, of which he died after six days. The brothers and near relatives of the chief, desirous of revenging his death, started out to steal and kill; they saw the mail party coming, laid in wait, and you know the result.

The village of which they were members have offered to give up these murderers, (five in number,) and the murderers themselves say they have revenged the death of their chief, and are willing to die, and will go to the Fort whenever their Father calls for them.

The present situation of the Indians is distressing; they have been so long accustomed to sugar, coffee and other luxuries of the white man, that they cannot well be suddenly deprived of them without seriously experiencing their want.

The course pursued in stopping all trade with the Sioux, and not holding any intercourse with them whatever, is thought not to be a very judicious one, and is certainly a very hard one upon us traders, who make a living in that way. If the Indians could get no ammunition, sugar, coffee, etc., from any other place than the traders on the Platte, I would willingly submit to lose what little I have, to starve them out and bring them to terms, but they have only to travel a few hundred miles to Fort Pierre, where they can get guns and ammunition in abundance, and I have been informed that the traders from Fort Pierre are on the Cheyenne and White rivers waiting for the Platte Indians to come and trade with them; therefore it is that I think it peculiarly hard for us here to be made to suffer, when it affects not the object for which it was intended. I hope, soon, relief will come to us in the shape of opening the trade for the poor people of the country are in a destitute situation, having no employment nor means of support, and after the buffalo are gone, it will be tolerable tough times to live.

The people in this country are entirely dependent upon trading with Indians for support, and when we have no trade, there is no employment to be given, and consequently they have no means of making money to purchase meat and bread. Every trading post has its full complement of destitute men, whom they have known for years, and cannot refuse the actual necessaries to sustain life, and scarcely a day passes that you do not see men seeking employment and something to eat; one poor fellow, who came from the Arkansas river, destitute of money, applied to me for employment, which I had not to give him. He had applied at the Fort without success, and a short time afterwards he was found a few miles up the Platte, dead; and no doubt starved to death, for he had no wound or bruise to indicate violence, nor had he anything about him—gun, hatchet, knife, or anything to make a fire or cook himself with. [illegible]

The Indians have all left the Platte, and gone to Wilds River and Leasquicourt; they have been impatiently waiting to hear from their great Father at Washington, to see if the whites are determined to fight. They now begin to think it "all day" with them. They say they are determined not to fight the whites. But I should not be surprised if they moved to the Missouri, to hear of murders and thefts where they have a chance. I believe we all (outside of the Fort) have serious cause to be alarmed for our lives and property.

—The Thibodaux Minerva of the 14th has the following:

We are again in the enjoyment of warm weather, and the crops are beginning to shadow forth more promise than heretofore. All creation has put on spring clothes, and we begin to realize that the charming month of April is present in all its glory.

At a meeting of the Lafourche Dragoons, at Prince's Hotel, on Sunday evening last, the following gentlemen were elected officers: E. Dres, 1st Lieut.; Pic. J. J. Haines, 1st Sergeant; Towson Ellis, 2d do; J. Gautreau, 1st Corporal; L. N. Falcon, 2d do.

We notice that Mr. Howes, Judge Myers and Capt. Soger, of the railroad, passed through our town on Monday, en route to Chacahoula. We interpret this as an omen favorable to the speedy completion of the road to that point, and we doubt not but that very soon the dead-level of that swamp will be roused from their morning nap by the shrill snort of the iron horse.

Sons of Temperance.—At a regular meeting of Magnolia Division of this place, the following gentlemen were elected officers for the present term: W. H. Rogers, W. P.; F. M. Hancock, W. A.; F. L. Mead, R. S.; E. T. Buchanan, A. R. S.; H. A. Thompson, F. S.; L. A. Reed, T.; G. W. Westbrook, D.; James O. Ballard, A. C.; Louis Corbit, I. S.; James Ashworth, O. S.; Rev. L. A. Reed, Chaplain; W. H. Rogers, D. G. W. P.

Mississippi.—The Port Gibson Herald is in mourning for the death of its editor, E. Bruner, Esq., who died on the 6th inst. His death was sudden, he having been engaged in business up to a late hour of the night of his death. He was a native of Massachusetts.

We learn from the Columbus Democrat of the 7th inst., that Jeffy Alleman by the name of Alex. N. Mings, committed suicide at his residence in that county, eight miles from Columbus, on the Gilmer road, the evening of the 3d inst. The fatal deed was done by sticking a cedar reed 3 in the region between the breast and stomach, which caused his death in an hour afterwards. The deceased had been partially deranged for the last three years, through the influence of religious excitement.

An Excursion to Amite and Osyka.

A balmy myself of the opportunity of participating in a gilfood ride of one hundred and seventy-six miles over Jersey New Orleans, Jackson and Great Western Road, on Sunday last, and having enjoyed one of the most delightful excursions I ever made out of the city and back in the same day, I feel an inclination to communicate my impressions of the developments this magnificent enterprise has already produced in a portion of country whose resources position and resources have hitherto remained almost entirely unknown to our citizens. Many doubtless have been allured against the sameness of this landable undertaking, despite the feasibility of a continuous rapid ride from Hagerty, which, to my mind, are now forever dissipated. The intervening swamps, prairie ronchaud, and large passes between the city and the pine hills, which were denoted as formidable barriers, are now traversed at a speed of twenty five miles per hour by the locomotive, in a sensation of danger or fear of its celerity seeming to enter the mind as you are whirled along towards the rolling lands of Pontchitoula, Amite and Osyka. Over coming an elevation of one hundred and fifty feet in sixty-eight miles within three hours, the train arrived at Amite City, where apparently attracted by the diminutive commotion, and airy appearance of the new hotel, erected by Messrs Pelicaun, Bach & Co., many of our most sagacious sojourned for dinner. Concluding to lose the present terminus of the road, I felt richly repaid by my visit to Osyka, for to any sojournment I was handed in the center of a thriving town which had apparently sprung from the primeval forest to bustle in the ranks of commerce, as full fledged as those mysterious warriors from the brain of Jove. A beautiful amphitheater of hills surrounds the site of this Atlanta of the valley, and within short distance the serpentine but limpid Tangipahoa leaves the white sand beds, where the tall and luxuriant cane waves a rustling lady to the zephyr's breath, and the rays of the noon-day's sun is pleasantly by the thick foliage of the magnolia and laurel. The road at the place of debarkation or venture westward through a deep cut, where the grading is excellently executed. About three miles beyond, I am told, one may enjoy a view of Carter's Hill through which the grading is already made to a depth of sixty feet, connecting a level course along the valley for a distance of seven or eight miles.

A good dinner, though hurriedly eaten, satisfied an appetite sharpened by the exhilerating exercise and pure air, and at twenty P. M. I found myself whirling toward the Crescent City. At Amite our party were again united and the hilarity and good humor which prevailed among the guests of that model proprietor, P. D. Hosier, Esq., was sufficient evidence of a sumptuous repast.

Amite is destined to become a favorite resort for families and parties who wish to enjoy a day or a week in the country. Ample accommodations, an obliging landlord a sociable neighborhood, and healthy position, are sufficient to make it so. A number of model farms and other improvements are already commenced in the vicinity.

There are other points along the route worthy of notice which may claim my attention hereafter. Suffice it to say, that life and animation to improvement and civilization appear to be dispelling the lethargic slumber which for long time hung over the locality of the Choctaw and the tracks of New Orleans, April 13 1855. Loss of the Ship Hudson.—We u few days since noticed the intelligence of the packet ship Hudson, from New York, bound to this port, as being ashore. She belonged to the Union line of packets, Woodruff & Co., agents. The following is the full particulars:

Nassau, (N. P.) March 28.—We have to report the loss of the ship Hudson, Ingersoll, of and from New York bound to New Orleans with an assorted cargo in the lower hold. On the 14th March, about 3 o'clock P. M., in latitude 27 deg 27 min N., longitude by bearing S. W. 3 seventy-nine miles, ship making about two knots an hour—she struck on Elbow Key; weather very hazy at the time. The captain and crew succeeded in getting the ship to shore, to NE. by N., and tried to force her off. She moved but a short distance and stopped. The captain then ordered all sails to be furled, and at 4 A. M., on the 16th, he was found that she was standing a good deal, and had become very much broken up, hauled and fifty feet in the forward terminus of the road, I felt richly repaid by my visit to Osyka, for to any sojournment I was handed in the center of a thriving town which had apparently sprung from the primeval forest to bustle in the ranks of commerce, as full fledged as those mysterious warriors from the brain of Jove. A beautiful amphitheater of hills surrounds the site of this Atlanta of the valley, and within short distance the serpentine but limpid Tangipahoa leaves the white sand beds, where the tall and luxuriant cane waves a rustling lady to the zephyr's breath, and the rays of the noon-day's sun is pleasantly by the thick foliage of the magnolia and laurel. The bill repealing tavern licenses passed the Senate of Pennsylvania by 16 to 11. It prohibits the granting of licenses after the first of July, but does not interfere with the existing licenses. The other House has to concur in some amendments before it can become a law.

The Plaquemine National of Saturday last has the following:

Fears are entertained here that the rice crop will fall rather short this year. By the want of rain and the low stage of the river, no rice has yet been sown. There are but little hopes that the corn now planted will be of any benefit, inasmuch as it is lingering for want of rain.

By the present prospect, the orange, citron and lemon crops here will be larger productive than we first expected.

The difficulties between the President and Directors of the Fayette and Western Railroad, N. C., and the New York contractors, have been satisfactorily arranged, and the prospect is said to be fair for a speedy completion of the work from Fayetteville to the coal mines. There now remain to raise $100,000 additional by individual subscriptions.

A dwelling house in Brooklyn was destroyed by fire a few night ago, and a boy named Patrick Riley was so badly burned that he died next morning.

On the 5th inst., the brig Dungan, Capt. Porter, from Philadelphia, for Bath, Me., went down with all on board, fifty miles north-west of Cape May, during a violent gale.

Two young men named Wm. G. Gane and Henry Moore, are charged with robbing letters in the Cincinnati Post Office. Moore gave bail, but Gane, in default of $2000, was committed. Both of the young men are very respectably connected.

On Sunday night, the 8th inst., the storehouse of Messrs Moss & White, near Buckingham Courthouse, Farmville, Va., was destroyed by fire, and two young men named Deny and Chenault were burned in it. The young men were in the habit of sleeping in the store, and the general impression is that the store was entered by burglars, the young men murdered, and the building then fired.

A riot occurred at Oxford, N. Y., on the 8th inst., among the Roman Catholics, in consequence, as the report goes, of a certain excommunicated member being ordered out of the church by the Priest. The services were suspended, and a general fight ensued outside the building between the Roman Catholics and Protestants. The result was not serious.

Desperate Attack Upon a Jail.—A large party of men, armed with pistols and knives, attacked the jail at Yreka California, one night last month, for the purpose of rescuing a prisoner. In the melee which ensued, two men were killed and seven or eight wounded.

The Pine Bluff (Ark.) Republican of the 7th says:

We have had a glorious rain, and confidently anticipate boats in a few days; but the people in the Arkansas railroad spirit to abate, but will push the Napoleon railroad to its completion as though there were no river in the valley. We have a daily evidence that this great enterprise is growing in popular favor at home and abroad; all agree that necessity will complete it.

The St. Louis Republican of the 11th inst contains the following dispatch:

Rockville, April 10.—The steamer El Paso struck a log near and a half miles below Rockville, and sunk. She has got three feet of water in her hold. It is thought she can be raised by to-morrow. All her deck load was thrown overboard. The Sam Gibson went to her and took all the freight out of her hold and put it on shore, and also took her passengers off.

Sad Accident.—Moses Robinson, an old man seventy years of age, was burned to death in his house, at Mount Vernon, Me., on the 5th inst. The house was all in flames when discovered, at 4 or 5 o'clock A. M., the inmates, with the exception of Mr. Robinson, barely escaping with their lives. One young man in the second story was obliged to leap from the window. The bones of the old man were found upon the hearth; it is supposed he was bewildered and unable to find his way out.

Quick Passage.—On the 7th inst., the steamship United States arrived off Sandy Hook from Havana, having made the shortest passage on record—three days and twenty-three hours.

THE PERILS OF THE SEA;

Or, a Night on a Whale.

The King Harold, whaler, was cruising off the King's Mail, troop for sperm-fish, with th[e] intention of [re]maining the winter months there and in the [ne]ighboring further south to catch the rest of [the] year. At last, however, their efforts were destined [to] be crowned with success, and one of the boats [in] connection with the adventure which formed the [subj]ect of this paper.

The [boa]t was [Pa]trick, named Pat; an active young [Irish]man who had been promoted to perform the important duty of boat's header, or harpooner. At the first summons, four boats left the side of the King Harold, exerting their utmost strength to outstrip each other. An exciting [scen]e usually prevails on such occasions as these, when [the] different boats, as it becomes a point of honor [in] which shall throw the first harpoon and [draw] the first blood, ahead of that commanded by Pat, whose [boat] to the right of him, but at a considerable distance, [pursued] another whale was seen to blow, and as at once turned towards it, while [pulled] away from his companions.

The [boat] had too much work on their hands to pay any attention to him; and as the [whale] and they were in pursuit of just the [same] within thirty feet, one of the harpooners immediately drove his iron home. The [two] others were also "fast" soon after; but [one] of the second boat came out again [and] the [whale] sank to a great depth, it was compelled to follow the third, and help in capsizing it. This they eventually succeeded [in] doing, the [whole] leviathan set off at a northerly direction, towing [the] boats after them, and dashing the water [furiously] over their bows. However, after much trouble they finally secured two, and then lay on their oars to await the ship, as it would have [been] impossible for them to row with such a [tremendous] mass in tow.

While [waiting] for their vessel, which was at a [great] distance, they had leisure to look round for the fourth—that of our friend Pat—but they searched in vain for its glistening sail. It had disappeared, and their consolation was it the hope that it had been kept in sight from the mast-head. The King Harold, however, was by no means a quick sailer, and the afternoon was spent ere she reached them, and secured the two fish alongside. A man was immediately sent aloft to see where the fourth boat was, but nothing could be seen of it, and at length the skipper summoned all the crew followed to the [cabin] for a similar purpose; but all in vain. One of [the] swine they fancied they could see a dark spot on the water to the southwest, but on looking closer it disappeared. The watch was kept up until dark, but not the slightest trace of it could be discovered.

As the captain could not cruise about, on account of the fish alongside, even had he known in what direction to steer, he determined to continue [on] during the night as far as possible, and [then] to heave to, leaving the remainder with a [lan]tern, by which they could pick the missing boat and its crew in the still had a chance of finding them [in] the [mo]rning, as the ship was drifting in the [direc]tion of the trade wind and equatorial current. It was most probable that a wounded sperm will have destroyed the boat, and that the [crew] were [com]pelled to keep on long ahead of the ship, as they certainly could not [pull] against the wind. They were certainly calm enough, as the [usual] mark speedily across the blue of a [storm] fish; and, as at the present moment there [were] not [a] dozen greasy brutes were swimming [lazily] around the vessel, and making unavailing [efforts] to [get] a piece of the sough and slash [with] their tails, it could be only too certain that [they] had [not] struck any where near the other boat [in] search of the unfortunate men who were [now] at their [mer]cy.

But there was [one] possibility that the boys had managed to [get] to leeward [that] it could [not] be seen, and two lanterns were hung [out] as [sig]nals, in order that they [might], [pull] past in the gloom [of] night, and before the ship [was] [out] of sight the gun fired; but [in] vain. Not without anything being [seen] or heard of the [boat] at once. The cutting up of the [fish] was [act]ively in the meanwhile, and [the] [work] was immediately commenced. [Large] [strips], fat by strips of blubber, hung [in] [festoons] in a [row] [be]tween the [ship] and the dark ocean, giving the [latter] [at] a singularly transparent hue.

[At] [day]break, two harpooners were sent to [the] [mast]-head with good glasses, to again look [out] [for] [the] missing boat, and in vain had they searched [the] [horizon] without being able to [discover] [even] [a] [speck] on [the] [wave] which [could] [be] [seen] [by] [the] [naked] [eye], when a cry from the look-out announced that a whale was [spouting] on the [lee] [bow], but [it] [lay] [to]windward. [Pat] [and] [his] [boat] [had] [passed] [it] [in] [the] [night], [and] [the] [latter] [was] [ordered] [off] [with] [the] [remainder] [of] [the] [boats]. [Even] [if] [it] [were] [not] [found] [it] [would] [probably] [be] [a] [dead] [whale], [and] [they] [would] [save] [the] [trouble] [of] [towing] [it] [home]. [They] [surely] [put] [them] [on] [the] [right] [track], as the fish, if struck, [would] [in] [any] [case] [have] [one] [of] [the] [ships] [harpoons] [in] [it].

"[Pull] [away], [pull] [away]. By heavens! if that is not [a] [sail] [or] [boat], or something [else], [pull] [away], for I fancy we are [only] [just] [in] [time]." Then uttering aloud "Hallo-[o]-[o]-[o]!" [he] [waved] [a] [signal] [to] [attract] [a] [responsive] [echo]; but [none] [was] [returned] [him], [and] [the] [boat] [bounded] [on] [in] [course] [towards] [the] [extraordinary] [object]. "[I] [see] [a] [man]!" [the] [man] [in] [the] [boat] [now] [shouted]. "By heavens! if that is [not] [Pat] [and] [the] [boat]'s [header], who was also [the] [harpooner]!" [the] [harpooner] [replied]; "but [where] [are] [the] [rest]?"

The poor fellow looked deadly pale, and could [not] [utter] [a] [single] [word] – his eye was wildly fixed [on] [the] [boat] [as] [if] [he] [did] [not] [recognise] [it]. [He] [was] [quickly] [lifted] [on] [board], [and] [fell] [down] [exhausted] [as] [soon] [as] [he] [felt] [the] [deck] [under] [him]. He had lived through [a] [night], and we must return to the period when he quitted the others with his boat, in [pursuit] [of] [the] [whale] [on] [his] [own] [account].

[It] [was] [a] [bright], very cleverly steered away [from] [the] [rest] [of] [the] other three boats and fol[lowed] [the] [whale], which was lazily breasting [the] [waves] [at] [some] [distance] [from] [the] [fleet] [of] [boats]. [It] [was] [hardly] [on] [an] [even] [keel] [for] [a] [moment] [during] [the] [rush] [of] [the] [sperm], [and] [great] [care] [was] [required], [for] [the] [fish] [was], as yet, [ignorant] of the danger that threatened it. At the same time the sperm warred more and more from its former course, and went westward [with] the [wind] and current. Patrick now set his sail in order to get nearer to the fish without any unnecessary noise. The whale, however, [appeared] to have scented the approach of [danger], [for] [it] [started] [off] at the top of its speed. [Had] [it] [stood] [on] [with] [the] [favorable] breeze, [it] [would] [be] [little] [from] [it]. Suddenly, just [as] [the] [boat] [was] [within] [striking] [distance], [and] [the] [boat] [was] [in] [the] [act] [of] [raising] [its] [harpoon], [the] [whale] [was] [still] [there], [but] [the] [sperm] [were] [gone]. "Sail in!" [the] [boat]-[header] [quickly] [shouted]; but the boat [had] [already] [attained] [a] [great] [distance] [from] [the] [impetus] [it] [had] [received], [and] [the] [boat]-[steerer] [stood] [with] [his] [iron] [already] [awaiting] [the] [signal] [to] [dart] [it]. [The] [sail] [flapped] [idly] [in] [the] [wind], [and] [the] [boat]-[header] [held] [the] [sheets] [firmly] [in] [his] [hand], [that] [they] [might] [not] [lose] [a] [moment] [in] [pursuit]. [The] [whale] [looked] [down] [into] [the] [clear] [water] [beneath] [with] [the] [hope] [of], [perhaps], [seeing] [the] [sperm] [and] [discovering] [the] [direction] [it] [had] [taken].

[Suddenly] [the] [whale] [commenced] ["]swimming," one of the [boat]-[steerers] [said], in a half-suppressed and anxious tone; "its coming up straight from below."

"Hush!" the harpooner said—"gently, gently, or you'll startle him—there!"

"There he comes—there he comes!", three four shouted simultaneously, and grasped instinctively at their oars.

"Back—back for your lives!" the harpooner cried at this moment, who was well aware of the peril to which they would be exposed if the [whale], in rising, merely grazed their boat. Almost at the same instant the oars fell into the water, and the boat had scarcely shot its [own] length back, when the gigantic, rounded [head] of a powerful sperm fish, with its wide, [arrow]-jaws half opened, rose to the surface, and then bounded forwards, as if to escape the strange object, whose presence he was now aware of. In the bow of the boat, and close [under] the mountain of blubber, which actually [rose] under his very feet, stood the boat-steerer with uplifted lance; but his arm trembled, and till within reach of the fearful foe, who could crush them at a blow, he did not dare to hurl the harpoon into the flying monster.

"Give it him!" Patrick however shouted, perfectly careless of danger, and only thinking at the moment of the chase. "Hang the fellow, he'll let the fish slip through his hands;" and seizing his own lance, he appeared to be anxiously awaiting the moment when he could [hurl] the sharp steel into the back of his prey. The boat-steerer still hesitated, but only for a moment; for if he suffered the opportunity to slip, it was a question whether they would ever gain come up with the startled whale. The [fish] had again caught the wind, and the harpooner held the tiller firmly with his knees to bring the boat's head round, and rush after the flying foe. At this instant the harpoon whizzed through the air deep into the monster's back, and was imbedded in the tough blubber. In a second the sail was again taken in, and the boat-steerer, springing back to the tiller, made room for the harpooner to throw his lance and give the leviathan of the deep his death-blow. [A] [shriek] [stood] [in] [the] [bows], with his lance raised for a cast, and the crew tugged away at the harpoon rope, to bring their little barque close up to the prisoned fish. Patrick bent back, and while the flukes of the gigantic brute lashed the waves close to them, and it rose once again to escape this danger which it saw impending, the death-bearing steel sank deeply into the [left] flank of the foe. In a second the harpooner withdrew it to repeat the blow, and the whale, in its fury, suddenly turned at bay, causing the sea to hiss and foam by its rage.

"Thick blood!" the crew shouted at this moment; but the voice of the harpooner was heard. "Back for your lives!" And while the boat was thrown his whole weight on the tiller, and leaned overboard to bring her head round, and [ere] the crew could ship their oars, the furious brute came up with open jaws, and seizing and crushing the thin planks, tore them asunder as if made of paper. Patrick saw the danger, knew what impended over them, and with a [lan]shaking hand he again hurled the lance at the enemy, and pierced its eye, but he could not save the boat. The maddened brute probably did not feel the new wound in its death-struggles. For, blowing out the thick blood, and only thirsting for revenge, it tore the [boat] in pieces, and the foaming, blood-stained waves soon closed over a mass of fragments and [swimmers], who only tried to clutch at a plank, the instinctive feeling of self preservation which Patrick had, quite unconsciously, seized the line to which the harpoon was fastened, wound it round his arm; the whale dragged him along through the dissolved waters, and he could inevitably have been drowned had he [not] [lived] a few minutes longer. But the first [shot] gone home, and rising again to the surface, the whale swam once or twice in a circle [around] the [foaming] waves with its gigantic [flukes], and then floated slowly and dead upon the blood-stained sea. Patrick, who had risen with it, and had been so unwillingly taken into [tow] by the whale, swam quickly up to the floating monster, and seizing the harpoon still sticking in it, raised himself up at the very moment when a piercing shriek sounded close behind him. In horror he turned round; the cry for help was too agonizing; but he felt as if stabbed to the heart when he saw, at no great distance from him, the dark dorsal fins of two sharks, which shot greedily back and forwards, while the gurgling in the water just behind him, and the lashing of the waves, betrayed the spot where one of his comrades was fighting the fight of death in the merciless clutches of a third brute.

Here and there a few of the unhappy men belonging to the boat were still floating on oars and planks, but only three left of the merry fellows who, but a few minutes before, had boldly looked danger in the face, and now the hyenas of the deep were revelling beneath them. Of what avail was the powerless blow of the arm armed at them, or the yell of despair! It was music in the ears of the cold, fearful monsters, with their cat-like eyes and giant strength.

"This is fearful!" groaned Patrick, who had hardly strength enough to keep on the back of the whale that still offered him protection—"Fearful thus to die, and no help!" And his eye sought desperately across the watery waste for the saving ship, which was tacking to pick up the other boats, far, far away on the horizon. And when they missed him, and sought for him, and could not find the boat with the glass, and sailed about for days in search of him, of what avail would that be to him? Only hours, minutes, perhaps, were allotted to him, and his murderers were bounding in their insatiate greed after their prey. Shuddaringly he concealed his face in his hands, almost forgetting his own peril, to see the death-struggle of his comrades around him, which was only a counterpart of what awaited him; but the hissing and beating of the waves compelled him at last, with that instinct of self-preservation which clings to a straw, to think of his own salvation, or at least to defer his fate as long as was possible, in order to leave room for any possibility of help. The harpoon in the back of the whale, which drove still deeper into the blubber, offered him a support to keep him on the slippery, smooth mass. For, although he thought once or twice about cutting out the head and using it as a weapon of defence against the greedy sharks, still he immediately gave up the idea again. Once washed into the sea, even the sharp steel would be no protection against the ogilo sharks which would infallibly seize its prey eventually, and then draw him down in spite of all the wounds it might receive. But one thing he could do. The handle of the harpoon, a short, stout oak stick of about two inches in diameter, was still firmly fixed in the steel. This he pulled out, cut it away from the line with the lanyard knife every sailor wears on his person, and then fastened the cord to the ring of the harpoon. And while he twisted the cord tightly round his left hand to have a better holdfast, he seized the shaft, with renewed confidence, and awaited with tightly-clenched teeth and flashing eyes the attack of the foe, which, however, was deferred for some time.

The sharks were satiated for a while, and played in the streams of blood which stained the water around, rather than sought for fresh prey; they tried at times to catch hold of the slippery, broad carcass of the whale, or swam lazily or sleepily among the broken fragments of the boat, seizing a plank and holding it for a while between their teeth, and then pushing it before them with their round, spade-shaped upper jaws. The weather, fortunately, was quiet and calm, and the rippling waves, in which the whale rose and sank, washed over Patrick, but not one of the sharks had come near enough to scent him, or, if it had done so, had not noticed him; and he hoped, perhaps, that he would be able to hold his own unassailed until the ship could come up to save him, or, at least, send its boats. But where was the [ship]? Father of mercy! there was no prospect of release for a long, long while. For even at that instance he then was, it could not escape the sailor's practised eye that it was keeping away from him. The other boats, therefore, had caught their fish, and with their booty alongside, would not be able to look after him. At the same time, the sun burnt, hot and scorching, on his forehead, and his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth. Water! the limpid waves bathed his feet, and should he perish of thirst? He knelt down and washed his forehead and temples, and eyes and lips, in order to have a slight refreshment, and then he bound his handkerchief round his head—for he had lost his hat at the destruction of the boat—in order to protect it in some measure from the scorching beams.

Through this movement, however, the attention of one of the sharks must have been attracted to him, or else, though satisfied and over-satiated, it could not resist its desire for more prey; for just as he raised his hands, he noticed that one of the largest dark fins, which projected above the water, was swimming in a direct line towards him. He had, in fact, scarcely time to raise himself, and prepare his weapon for defence, when a tremendous fellow of some thirteen feet in length shot up to him, and tried to turn over on the back of the whale and pick off what was still upon it. But with the danger, all the sailor's daring courage returned to him, and swinging the heavy shaft in his hand, and holding the rope firmly in the other, he struck the head of the monster such a powerful and well directed blow that the shark, half-stunned, slipped off the whale and sank ere it could prepare for a renewal of hostilities, or perhaps make up its mind to such a serious step. But other sharks had been attracted by the noise and splashing, and although they did not dare an immediate attack on the bold mortal who ventured to withstand them in their native element, still they continually swam in narrower circles round the spot where he was sitting, and once or twice came so near that Pat gave them one or two hearty blows across the jaws, to teach them to be respectful to him and keep their proper distance. But the shark is a greedy, obstinate brute, and even if dangerously wounded, always returns to any booty it has once scented, as long as it retains the necessary strength. So it was in this instance. Again and again the heavy stick was required to teach them that there was nothing here for them to feloh—at least, so long as the young Irishman felt himself strong enough to struggle against hunger and thirst, the scorching sunbeams, and the constant, fearful excitement of his nervous system in the tremendous danger that ever surrounded him.

And the ship—no hope of salvation thence! Deeper and deeper sank the sun, and the ship lay to windward, with its brightly glistening sails. But the beasts that swam around him became more and more ravenous, and tried in vain to drive their teeth through the tough skin of the sperm whale; and when the stars were lighted, and gradually illumined the whole sky, as far as the bright strip which still lay on the Western horizon, he watched the glistening beams shooting athwart the limpid waves, as the sharks swam restlessly backwards and forwards, and the peril that beset him grew worse with the night.

He clearly saw the lights of his vessel hung out for him—he even noticed, when it grew quite dark, the bright glimmer of the blubber-lamps, and even the pale light which came from the stoves of the oil-fryers, and were reflected in the idly-flapping sails. But what availed that to him? How could he hope to be seen from the ship in the darkness, and to be saved from his fearful position?—and would merely human strength be able to endure it till the next morning? He was no longer strong enough even to keep on his feet, and sought to find some little relief in kneeling down for a minute, or so long as the approaching sharks permitted, upon his extraordinary float, and attempting to stretch himself at full length, even though it might be in the water. Fruitless hope! his tormenters left him no rest, and the danger of being surprised, seized, and pulled down to a certain death, was too imminent to allow him to await their attack. The most greedy of the brutes, a young fish of scarcely more than eight feet in length, once went so far as to seize the harpoon and hold it sufficiently long to be left half dry upon the sperm by the retiring wave; but the oak stick struck it such a fearful blow across its treacherous, crafty looking eyes, that the shark glided off the slippery whale, turned up its white stomach, and sank. But others took the brute's place, and only the glistening streak in the dark water revealed their approach, and warned the unhappy man to prepare himself for the renewed attack.

Hour after hour thus passed in this fearful contest for life; but fresh hope was aroused in him when the ship drew nearer and nearer to him, and the signal guns clearly and distinctly reached his ear. At last he was able to recognise the forms on deck, as they moved backwards and forwards in the flickering light. "Ahoy—ho—ahoy!" his wild despairing cry was wafted across the waters, as his comrades drifted slowly past without noticing him—"ahoy!"

Again he was compelled to defend his life; for the sharks, attracted by the sound of a human voice, came up from all sides, and their dark dorsal fins oleft the surface of the water in every direction. His blow fell repeatedly, and the end of the tough shaft was already splintered—blows which would have felled an ox, but produced no further effect upon the shark than to make it retire for a little while. And the ship? there it drifted, almost within hail. Again a signal gun resohed his ear, and he again employed the ensuing pause to send his cry for assistance across the waves to the spot where salvation lay—so near, and yet so unattainable. But the wind came from that quarter; though he could so distinctly hear the sound of the gun, and even distinguish the different voices on deck, he was unable to make them hear him. He only made his enemies around more and more active and rapacious, and their attacks became almost incessant.

His strength, his good spirits—which had till now been kept up by the hope of salvation—sank when he saw the ship drift past—sank when no moans were left him to announce his proximity. The love of life alone kept him upright, and urged him to defend it against the savage brutes until his last breath.

Thus night passed away. The southern cross turned slowly—very slowly—to the west, and day at length broke in the far-distant east. He saw it all; he saw the sun rising from its ocean bed, recognised the contour of his vessel, the graceful masts and the hellying sails, attempted to make a last attempt to announce his existence, and tried to pull off his shirt and wave it in the air—a signal certain to be seen by the lookout at the mast-head—but he was not able to do it. His limbs were stiff and rigid, even his voice refused its service, and he could only produce a hoarse, gurgling sound; his eyes burned, his head went round and round, and a new wild idea, like a will-o'-the-wisp upon the broadly-spreading sea, struck him and seemed to expel all else—every thought of help or salvation, every hope. He began to look out among the sharks that incessantly swam round him for the one on which he should hurl himself, and which he intended to destroy, along with himself, by means of the sharp knife he wore.—Again and again had this one attacked him, and he allowed him neither peace or rest, for even an hour at a time; again and again, although received by fierce blows and driven back, it returned, the most rapacious of the rapacious band, and revenge he determined to have on that enemy.

But his strength deserted him, the painful excitement of his mind and body threatened to overpower him, and although the sharks had not renewed their attack since daybreak, though they still kept round the dead whale—for they felt that he must soon become their prey without further trouble—he had fallen on his knees, and, half unconscious, only followed with his glance the dark, threatening fins. He had utterly forgotten the ship.

The loud hallos of the sailors that came to save him first aroused him from his lethargy. He saw the boat, but he could scarcely comprehend; it seemed, what it all meant, or where he actually was; but he raised himself once again, felt himself supported by friendly arms, greeted by cheering, encouraging words, and sank back in a fainting condition. The harpooner had received orders that, on arriving at the dark spot which had been seen from the deck, if he found it was a dead whale, he was to give a signal by waving a white flag he had taken with him, and remain there till the other boats could be sent to his assistance to take the dead fish in tow. But they had not expected to find a single half-dead mammate upon it. He therefore gave the signal and stuck the flag into the body of the dead whale, in order that the other boats might find the spot, and then rowed with the saved man, as fast as he could, to the vessel. Three of the sharks, which were not inclined to let their prey be so easily torn from them, followed the boat, and were severally lamed and killed by the harpooner, who could easily imagine how they must have terrified and tormented his predecessor.

The inconveniences of a copper currency are forcibly illustrated by the following paragraph cut from a Philadelphia paper:

A lady, named Wilkenson, was defrauded out of twenty-five cents in the South Second street Market, on Saturday. A man tendered her, in payment for eggs, a paper containing, as he represented, twenty-five pennies. In the hurry of business she took what she supposed to be money, and subsequently discovered the contents of the paper to be a piece of lead pipe.

A STORY FOR THE CREDULOUS.—A Rock of Gold.—The California Chronicle of March 6th, gives the following extract of a letter dated Kern River, February 14th:

I have discovered a rock of gold. I estimate its value at not less than $8,000,000, or $16,000,000 it might even be! Now, Bob, don't laugh at me. I was desperately wild with joy, I, who had been a dreamer—a poor devil—so long, was to be rich! to be a King! to be able to carry into execution all the darling schemes which have so often brought the ridicule of the stick-in-the-muds upon me. I—I was at last to be able to go home and claim Rosetta, under the hard conditions claimed by John father.

Toward noon I got hungry. I went up the side of the mountain to some pine trees, in the sides of which the squirrels had placed acorns in holes made by woodpeckers in search of worms. I dug out a lot of the acorns, carried them down to the creek, ate them with fine pepper-grass growing alongside of a spring. I went back to the rock and staid their till three o'clock, studying what I should do. I could not resolve. I then went to my camp, about eight miles off. The folks wanted to know what was the matter. I said I had wounded a buck and got lost in chasing him. The next morning I found that my horse had been stolen. I bought some provisions, another revolver, and a pick and shovel and pan, and went back. About fifty yards from the rock was a trail upon which miners passed every day, and I was afraid to work in the day. At night I went to work to cut off a corner of the rock, but I soon broke the pick so that it was useless. I could find no chisel or hammer. People got suspicious of me. Several followed me. One man found me sitting down not no hundred yards from the rock. I got scared. I carried water in my bucket the whole two miles from the stream, and made mud with which I washed over the rock. In doing this I had to get twenty-seven buckets of water; and just that job alone compelled me to walk 108 miles, and I was a whole week about it, doing a greater portion of the work at night, and sleeping in the day-time.

I am nearly starved out watching the rock. I went to mining at Jones' camp for a few days, and now am waiting with the greatest impatience for you to come, with every preparation necessary for breaking up the boulder. After we get it into pieces, we can melt sufficient in crucibles, to pay all our expenses, and buy the mules necessary for carrying off our rock.

I am in ——— till you come. The rock is in sight from the trail. Before I washed it over, I could stand on the trail and see the gold glitter in the sunshine; now the dirty yellow wash may attract attention. What gives me most pain is, that miners make a short cut by passing within ten feet of the rock, and save an ugly gully which starts just before it. I must stay near the rock, and I have no heart to work, and when I want to mine can get no good diggings, though other people are making plenty of money. I am very glad that the report of rich diggings higher up the river is taking nearly every body away from this neighborhood.

Later from Texas.

FIGHT WITH THE INDIANS.—By the arrival Tuesday, of the steamship Perseverance, we have dates from Galveston to Saturday last. The Journal of the 15th has the following items:

We have scarcely ever known so long a period of dry weather as that from which we are now suffering. Nearly every cistern in the city is dry, and much difficulty and economy will be necessary to make the supply of water now on hand last till we have rain. At the present writing it is cloudmy and lowering to the North and West; we are in hopes these signs will not fail us.

Forged Texas Scrip.—It turns out that the Peter G. Merritt, alias P. Gholson Merritt, of New Orleans police report notoriety, who uttered forged Texas scrip in that city and appeared to have quite a stock of the article on hand, is none other than Plutarch U. Merritt, formerly of this city, the same who in divers law suits was charged before the late State with having fraudulently covered up a large amount of real estate from his creditors under the name of a fictitious person, "E. Augustus Curtis," his son, E. Smith Merritt, or Edward S. Merritt, the name who left suddenly to avoid the consequences of the forgery of the name of a mercantile house in this city in whose employment he had been, was the individual not long since arrested in New York city for attempting to pass forged Texas scrip.

Although both father and son are now at large, notwithstanding their fertility for the change of names and localities, as the officers of justice are keeping a sharp look-out for them, and are also keeping a strict eye upon their confederates in this and in some other matters, they will find it difficult to elude their vigilance.

The San Antonio Texan furnishes the following piece of news:

On Tuesday, the 27th of March, various citizens of the Medina and Hondo Valley, assembled at the residence of Mr. Boon, on the Hondo, to take into consideration the numerous depredations committed upon the inhabitants by the Indians, and to devise some means to check them. Resolutions were passed condemning in strong terms, the present disposition of the military force of the country, by which our citizens have been left at the mercy of the savages, and the shameful neglect, by those in authority, to secure the inhabitants against their attacks; and since no provisions had been made for the safety of life and property by those from whom protection legitimately comes, that it became the duty of the citizens to protect themselves by every means in their power. It was determined to organize a company of minute-men, to hold themselves in readiness to pursue the savages and recover property. On the next day, Indians having been seen, horses stolen and cattle killed, the company, consisting of eleven men, well armed and mounted, started on a scout up the Hondo. No sign of Indians was discovered until the main right-hand branch of the Hondo was reached, where a trail several days old was found, making in the direction of the settlements, which was pursued several miles and lost, becoming mixed with other trails.

After traversing the foot of the mountains which surrounded the valley, a fresh trail was discovered, leading in the same direction, and was pursued vigorously for seventy-eight miles, to where the Indians were encamped. It was a complete surprise to them, as they knew nothing of the vicinity of danger until they were fired upon. Their position was such that they could not be approached without discovery, which rendered them careless. Three out of four were wounded the first fire, but they succeeded in gaining the dense chaparal, where one of the number fell, unable to proceed, when immediately he plucked an arrow from his quiver and dispatched himself. A number of pistol shots were fired at them before they reached the thicket; many of them taking effect. They had two horses, one of which they had just taken from Bandera Pass, where they had just killed a beef also. They were well prepared for taking off horses, having four bridles and a number of ropes and other conveniences for such depredations. According to the judgment of a knowing one, they belonged to Waco tribe.

The Austin State Gazette says:

In another column we give numerous extracts from our cotemporaries, showing the state of the crops and weather in Texas. On Wednesday last and since then there have been many copious showers, and we have now a better prospect of making a crop than at any time the past season. Corn is sprouting finely.

The Nueces Valley says: There were, on Thursday last, between twelve and fifteen brigs and schooners in Aransas harbor. The looks business like.

The Dallas Herald says: The wheat crop in this region was not injured to any serious extent by the late frosts, as we were at first induced to fear. It was only those crops which had not been kept down by grazing, that were seriously blighted. Unless some untoward casualty should yet befall it, the amount of wheat grown this year will exceed that of any previous year.

The Bastrop Advertiser, of the 7th inst., says that most of the planters of that section have replanted. Their crops are just beginning to make a second showing, and another failure would find many of the farmers without a sufficiency of seed for replanting; however, so far, but few have sustained much damage of cotton, either by frost or cold weather. Fruit has suffered materially.

The Columbia (Brazoria) Democrat, of April 10th, says:

We regret to hear fears expressed that cotton planters are going to be short of seed this spring. The frost having killed the first planting, and the wet weather of last fall having prevented the saving of seed in any large quantity, many are now pinched to replant even by this dropping. We have heard of no place where the case is really wiuter, killed, as was feared, though it is much more backward than usual. But backward springs usually foreruu good harvests.

The Gonzales Enquirer, of the 17th inst., says:

We still hear complaints of the ravages committed by the farms and gardens by the grasshoppers. In some of the fields we learn that they have abandoned the corn and commenced on the cotton, one or two patches of which have been entirely eaten up by them. We are led to hope, however, that their work of destruction will not continue much longer, as the birds seem to be making sad havoc among them.

LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.—The editors of the Paris journals have been summoned to the Ministry of the Interior, and told that in future they would not be permitted to publish any intelligence respecting the movements of the French army, ever should it relate merely to the transfer of a regiment from one part of France to another. A representative of one of the papers inquired, by asking for an example, whether they were not to be at liberty to reproduce from the Journal de Toulon the par graphs that that journal was in the habit of publishing about the military movements in that port. The answer was that the Toulon Journal would no longer be allowed to publish those paragraphs; that all products had been enjoined by a ministerial circular to enforce the same secrecy in the provinces which the Government was determined to enforce in the metropolis; and that if by any accident, military news of any kind alluded to should appear in a provincial newspaper, the Paris press would even be less at liberty to adopt it. The editors were at the same time enjoined not to report a word of what might be said about the possible journey of the Emperor to the Crimea.

HELL A LOCAL HABITATION.—A curious sermon was delivered a Sunday or two ago at the Roman Catholic Church of the annunciation, at Manhattanville, New York, by the Rev. Mr Walworth, a son of ex-Chancellor Walworth of Saratoga. The topic of this discourse was the location and torments of, hell. He undertook to demonstrate that hell was situated in the inside of this earth, commencing about twenty-one miles from the surface, where granite begins to melt. He also affirms that heat was the predominant characteristic of this abode of the damned, and illustrated the proposition by reference to the uniformly high temperature of every thing which had reached us from that quarter of our globe.

NAVAL.—In the Washington Union of the 11th, we find the following:

The African Squadron.—The United States frigate Constitution, bearing the broad pennant of Commodore Mayo commander-in-chief of the African squadron, was off Gambia river on the 7th of February. She had just been on a cruise, touching at Madeira, Teneriffe, St. Vincent and Porto Praya, and intended to proceed along the coast of Senegambia.

The sloop Marion, Commander Purviance, had visited all the slave stations on the coast without having seen a slaver of any description. He reports the slave trade at a low ebb. The Marion was at Porto Praya on the 3rd of February, and had been ordered to proceed to the Cape de Verd Islands to look after distressed American seamen and the interests of the whaling fleet.

United States Ship Falmouth.—The imprisonment and escape of two American Seamen at Gonaives.—The United States ship Falmouth, Commander T. D. Shaw, was at Gonaives, St. Domingo, on the 21st of March last, the latest dates from that island. Her officers had been treated with great politeness by the local authorities. The presence of a man-of-war had produced a good effect at that port, showing the authorities and people that the interests of her citizens were cared for and looked after by the American Government. The Falmouth would remain at Gonaives until the 24th of March.

In the case of the two seamen of the American schooner Philadelphia, of Ellsworth, Me., Monroe and Ricker, who were arrested at Gonaives on the 25th of May, 1854, for passing two counterfeit Haytien bills of $2 each, worth about fifty cents in United States currency, Ricker had been discharged, after two months' imprisonment, on the evidence of Monroe. The latter was tried before the criminal court in September last, and sentenced to be shot. The U. S. vice-commercial agent for that port, Mr. Brooks, who interested himself actively in the defense of Monroe, caused an appeal to be made to the court of cassation for a new trial. To avoid the expense of a new trial, Monroe, under the direction of the consul, petitioned the Emperor for pardon; but the return mail brought an order for his execution if he had not already appealed to the court above. No doubt was felt that the judgment of the court below would be confirmed, and the unfortunate man be obliged to suffer the extreme penalty of the law; but fortunately, on the night of the 30th October, taking advantage of a heavy fall of rain, he escaped from prison, and had not since been heard of. During the imprisonment of these men they were allowed by the Haytien Government about three cents a week for their support; had it not been for the charitable assistance of the consul, they would have starved to death.

The Brazil Squadron.—The United States frigate Savannah, the flag-ship of the Brazil squadron, Commodore W. D. Salter, reached Rio de Janeiro, on the 21st of February, from a cruise of nearly a month to the northward of that port. Considerable anxiety was felt for the Bainbridge, the Commodore being in doubt whether her commander had carried her to the United States, to the Mediterranean, or the ship had been lost. Doubtless information has reached him ere this of Lieut Hunter's arrival in the United States, and his dismissal from the service for deserting his post.

Another American Vessel Fired into by a Spanish Cruiser.—We have received advices of another belligerent act by the Cuban authorities upon the American brig P. R. Hickborn, Stephen Ellis, Jr., master, bound from the port of Boston to the port of Matanzas. While the brig was steering for the port of Matanzas, and but a few miles from the coast, she was fired at by a Spanish man-of-war, the ball from which passed about half a cable's length astern of the brig, when she showed her colors. Shortly after another ball was fired from the man-of-war, which passed directly ahead of the brig; and soon after, the position of the ships being relatively changed, another was fired, which fell just behind the brig, evidently throwu with the intention of hitting the American vessel. In a few moments after, the officer of the Spanish man-of-war came on board the brig, and, after examining her papers, allowed her to go her way.

The New York Spiritual Telegraph publishes the following:

Miss Emma Jay, the eloquent speaking medium who has lately been entertaining the audiences at Dodworth's Hall, this city, for several successive Sundays, informed us that while speaking in the entranced state she seems to stand by the side of her own body, and look upon it, and is a passive auditor to what is being spoken by another intelligence through her vocal organs. She says she sometimes enjoys exquisitely, and is very much edified by the addresses over the utterance of which she feels she has not the slightest control. Mrs. French, and one or two other trance mediums, have given us similar accounts of their own experience.

RAILROAD ACROSS FLORIDA.—The Florida News informs us that Mr. Bangs, the managing contractor of the railroad across the Peninsula of Florida, from Amelia Island to Cedar Keys, has commenced operations. Contracts have already been made for Palmetto timber for the wharves at Fernandina, also for timber to build bridges and pilings for the adjacent marsh. A number of hands have already been employed, and it is the intention to push forward the work with energy and activity.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and feed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment; while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has so ently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to effect. Settlements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and mote well. NUMBER OF RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES.

We often hear it said that if there were fewer religious denominations in the United States there would be sufficient church accommodations for everybody. The argument is a particular favorite with a certain class of persons, when they are solicited to subscribe for the erection of houses of worship; but in the face of this round assertion there are in the entire country, with its population of twenty-six millions, church accommodations for only fourteen millions. Allowing three millions for children too young to go to church, it follows that one-third of the entire population have no church to go to, even if they were disposed.

The number of religious sects in the United States is twenty, without counting the Chinese Buddhists, in California, or sundry minor Christian denominations. The whole number of edifices of worship is about 36,000, capable of accommodating, as we have seen, fourteen millions of people. The total value of the church property held by these twenty denominations is nearly ninety millions of dollars; in exact numbers, $86,416,639. The average value of each church and its appurtenances is $2,400. These facts which are derived from official tables for the census, explode another false notion, which is that there is too much luxury and wealth in American churches.

The most numerous sect in the United States is the Methodist, the second the Baptist, and the third the Presbyterian. The first has church accommodations for over 4,000,000 worshippers; in other words, the Methodists have houses of worship for one-fifth of the entire population. The Baptists have accommodations for more than 3,000,000, and the Presbyterians for more than 2,000,000. The fourth sect, in the extent of its accommodations, is the Congregational, the fifth the Episcopalian, and the sixth the Roman Catholic. The number of churches belonging to the three leading denominations does not always follow this proportion, however, The Methodists, for example, while they can accommodate but twice as many worshippers as the Presbyterians, have three times as many churches. The Romans Catholics, though sixth on the list as regards accommodations, stand seventh in the number of their churches. Of the principal sects, that which has the smallest edifices for worship is the Methodist, and those which have the largest are the Unitarian and Dutch Reform. The smallest denomination is the Swedenborgian, and the next the Menonite. There are no less than fifty-two Tunker churches, and 35,000 worshippers. The Friends, so numerous in this city, have accommodations for about 300,000, or but little more than one-hundredth of the entire population of the United States.

The richest denomination is the Methodist, which is set down in the census tables at $14,636,671. The next is the Presbyterian, which is rated at $14,369,889. The Episcopal, which in number of churches stands fifth, ranks third for its church property, being estimated at $11,261,970. The fourth is the Baptist, $10,931,382; the fifth the Roman Catholic, $8,973,838; and the sixth the Congregational, $7,973,962. Of these various sects the two which sympathize most in doctrine are the Congregationalists and Presbyterians, both adhering to the Westminster Catechism, and differing only in their form of government, the one being republican, the other democratic. Together, these two sects have over 6,000 churches, and count nearly 3,000,000 worshippers, and hold church property to the value of more than $20,000,000.

The sect whose average value of property ranks highest is the Unitarian. Next comes the Dutch Reformed, and next the Jewish: the Swedenborgians, Roman Catholics and Episcopalians follow in the order named. Of the leading denominations the Methodists stand lowest on the list, and the Baptists next, while the Presbyterians and Congregationalists hold a middle place.—Philadelphia Ledger.

BIBLE ANECDOTE.

The following is published in a French paper. A poor shepherd of the environs of Nerac, farther of a large family, for whose wants he provided with very great difficulty, purchased last summer from a dealer in old clothes, furniture, &c., an old bible, with a view to occupy his leisure evenings during the ensuing winter. Sunday evening, as he was turning over the leaves, he noticed that several of them were pasted together. He immediately set himself to work to separate those leaves, with great care; but one can scarcely form a conception of the surprise of the man when he found thus carefully carried a bill of five hundred francs ($100.) On the margin of one of the pages was written these words: "I gathered together this money with very great difficulty; but having none as a natural heir but those who want nothing, I make thee, whosoever shall read this Bible, my heir."

"UBINAM GENTIUM SUMUS?"

Mr. Editor—Out of late contingencies has grown a query of curious and important interest to a certain family of children. These children, until recently, had a well defined mother, which mother had a local habitation and a name. But of late the mother has accomplished a wonderful transition, or metamorphosis; so far from a demise, she seems rather to have resolved herself into twain. Now the question of important interest to the children is this: Which of the twain is the real mother? If both bid, at whose call shall we come? Whose nod shall we obey? Solomon decided for the mothers whose was the child, but who shall determine for the child which is the mother? Now, a mother with two, or even more children, is quite an ordinary occurrence; but a child having two mothers would be something new under the sun.

Erstwhile our mother dwelt in castle-like mansions on the mountain's brow. It was a sequestered place, begirt with rocks and overlooking the peaceful valley of the Tennessee. There, under the tuition and fostering care of our "nourishing mother," we spent some happy years of our lives, and we delighted in her patient efforts to store our minds with useful knowledge. Now, she unfolded the musty pages of history, and told us the long story of bygone ages. Again, she revealed to our wondering eyes the hidden mysteries of mother earth, and anon led our young fancy far out into the celestial, to contemplate the burning sun or starry world beyond. And she bade us ever look to the boundless future.

Such was our "alma mater." LaGrange was her name. We cherish fondly her memory, and will with pleasure revert to the days of our minority passed beneath her fostering care. That while rude Boreas whistled through the keyholes and crannies, or made music around the old college walls, we trimmed the nightly taper and poured over ancient tomes. There, too, when "cold winter's winds had passed away," we rejoiced at the voice of returning spring, and watched the tender leaves and early flowers that came forth to meet the warm sunshine.

But what about the metamorphosis? Well, our alma mater becoming old, joints rickety, and strength decaying, contemplates a suggestion of rejuvenescence, change of abode; or, like the fabled Phœnix, to spring anew from the ashes of her present self. Finally, acting upon this suggestion, she hath departed from her old mountain seat, developed new energies, and now burns with vigorous and brightening blaze, "LaGrange College, at Florence." But, wonderful to tell, (and herein she differs from the fabulous Phœnix,) instead of becoming extinct as to her former self, the fire of existence still burns on at the old place of abode! You may now be able, Mr. Editor, to comprehend the nature of this curious question. Which of the twain shall the children look to as their nourishing mother? "Ubinam gentium sumus?"

REPEATED TEACHINGS.

A German writer has said that "repetition was the mother of culture." Let teachers feel what they say, let the child observe it, let them repeat it again and again, and never be weary of inculcating it. It was said that the father of John Wesley happened one day to pass the door of a room in which Mrs. Wesley was teaching her children. He heard that excellent woman repeating the same thing over and over again; and at last, tired out, he said, "How can you bear to tell that blockhead the same thing twenty times over?" What was the reply of that wise and excellent woman: "Because, if I told it nineteen, and omitted the twentieth, I might lose all my labor." Every analogy from nature to science should teach them the great importance of repetition. The painter did not transfer the living landscape to canvas by a few dashes, but by touch after touch, by a succession of strokes. Look at nature: a drop of water on the solid rock seemed to do nothing, but then thousands of drops would wear a deep indentation in the hardest granite. This showed the value of "line upon line, precept upon precept; here a little and there a little."

FOUR QUESTIONS.—Ask these short questions, whereby to know whether your heart be truly changed: Hath thine heart been turned into sorrow for sin? Hath thy sorrow been turned into prayer? Hath thy prayer been turned into faith? Hath thy faith insured universal tenderness and obedience?"

The love of money has proved the ruin and eternal overthrow of more professing Christians than any other sin, because it is almost the only crime that can be perpetrated and yet anything like a decent profession of religion be maintained.—Fuller.

BREVITY OF THE SCRIPTURES.

BY REV. WM. JAY.

"And there are also many other things which Jesus did the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. Amen."—John, xxi, 25.

This is the language of the writer of this gospel in concluding his narrative. After all that he had brought forward, much more remained behind. He had composed a memoir, rather than a history, and only furnished a few specimens of a subject boundless in itself. Yet the expression he employs in asserting this may seem to many surprising, if not confounding. There are two ways of solving the difficulty: First, the language is a figure, a strong hyperbole. This was very common in the East. Indeed, it is frequent with writers and speakers in all countries. Even in our familiar discourse, we often, without being aware of it, express ourselves as remotely from truth: "I am tired to death," "I have no strength left," "Everybody knows it." Such a thing is "provided at the shortest notice," which would be a moment. But no deception is intended, and no danger of mistake follows.

Yet, secondly, though this meets the difficulty, some have also a little altered the rendering, and read, not the world would not "contain," but would not "receive" the books that would be written. So Doddridge and others. This is allowable in criticism; but let us observe the justness of the inference. If all the particulars of his birth, and infancy and youth, and manhood—if all the occurrences of his private and public life—if all his actions, his miracles, his speeches, his prayers, with all their relative circumstances—if all these had been recorded, instead of a book, we must have had books, and books so large and many that the design must have been counteracted. For then there were no books, but were in manuscript. And who would have had leisure to transcribe them? Who would have taken the trouble? If they were purchased from transcribers, who would have endured the expense? They could have been the property of the very rich; and when they had become their own, who could have had time to read them! Who could have remembered them all? How multiplied would have been the difficulties for explanation! All these would have been with men reasons for not procuring, or not perusing, or not understanding them.

Therefore, each of the inspired lives of our Saviour himself is not so long as many a sermon, and the four put together are far shorter than the published account of many a modern, insignificant character. But let us not complain that the whole is so compendious and brief. It is not a defect, but an excellence. The wisdom and goodness of God appear in it. It meets the more our situations, engagements and capacities. More would only have perplexed us, or multiplied our diversions.

And let us remember, also, that we do not want the aid of traditional supplement or human additions to the Scriptures of Truth. Though short, they are sufficient. They leave nothing obscure as to our duty or welfare. They are able to make us wise unto salvation, through faith that is in Jesus Christ.

And may we not suppose that it will be a part of our engagement and blessedness in Heaven to derive from those acquainted with them, or from the Saviour himself, the knowledge of a thousand things concerning his eventful history of which we are now ignorant?

Above all, let us rejoice at what has been furnished. Let us rejoice that it is so divinely proved, and that it has been preserved uncorrupted down to our own time, and that we have it in our own language, and are allowed and able to read it. And let us keep the end of the whole in view, and never be satisfied till it be accomplished in our experience. "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye might have life through his name."

HOW TO BE HAPPIER.—Said a venerable farmer, some eighty years of age, to a relative who lately visited him: "I have lived on this farm for more than half a century. I have no desire to change my residence as long as I live on earth. I have no desire to be any richer than I now am. I have worshiped the God of my fathers with the same people for more than forty years. During that period I have rarely been absent from the sanctuary on the Sabbath, and have never lost but one communion season. I have never been confined to my bed by sickness a single day. The blessings of God have been richly spread around me, and I made up my mind long ago that if I wished to be any happier I must have more religion."

It is stated that Bishop Whitehouse is about to resign the Episcopate of Illinois, but intends previously to publish a book.

THE CHINA MISSION.

To Rev. E. W. Sehon, D. D., Secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South:

My Dear Doctor—On the 18th of September, upon my arrival in Shanghai, I set about getting my house in order, by repairing the roof and the numerous holes which had been made in it by the contending parties of rebels and imperialists, who, for nearly a year, had fought most of their battles in its immediate vicinity. I designed putting up a suitable building for a printing office, as there was quite enough vacant land in my lot; but the frequent battles, during which balls frequently not merely came inside the fence, but even through the windows and the roof of the house, showed that it was not prudent at that time to put up any new buildings in that vicinity. I repaired all the damages to the house, and was anxiously waiting for peace, that I might enter it, when it became necessary for our family to fly even from Dr. Taylor's house, which was farther from the the common field of action; and this they did during a fight, in which the imperial soldiers fired not only upon the rebels, but even upon an American guard of sailors, under the command of Lieut. Whiting, of the U. S. ship Vandalia, who had gone out for the protection of foreigners.

On the 7th November I succeeded in renting half the house formerly occupied by Rev. Mr. Milne, now absent; and soon after, brothers Cunuyaghmm and Kelly abandoned Dr. Taylor's house, giving it up, at the direction of Mr. McLain, the U. S. Minister, and Mr. Murphy, the U. S. Consul, to the Imperial Government of China. Three days after I handed my deeds to Mr. Murphy, the U. S. Consul, my residence was burned to ashes; whether by imperialists or rebels I cannot now say, but the probability is that the rebels, esteeming it imperial property after I had abandoned it, set it on fire. Dr. Taylor's, Mr. Yates's and Mr. Shuck's houses, although given up likewise to the Imperial Government, have not yet been burnt, but the thieves are now carrying them away piecemeal. I noticed yesterday, in Dr. Taylor's house, that the thieves had carried away nearly all the moveable windows, and the flooring from two of the rooms. The Consul promises that he will endeavor to obtain compensation for the property, which was abandoned at the urgent request of the U. S. Minister, who stated to us all that the pecuniary consideration, he thought, would undoubtedly be met.

Brother Cunyngham is for the present residing at Nelson's, of the Protestant Episcopal Mission.

The articles ordered before I left New York for the printing concern have all arrived, with the exception of the Napier press, which was not yet finished at the date of the last advices from New York. We shall be compelled to build more houses at Shanghai, or to abandon the field; for houses cannot now be rented at any price. Nearly all the Chinese houses in the vicinity of the city have been pulled or burnt down; and as to foreign houses, the rent of one for a year would be about as much as its original cost, if it could be had.

The revolutionary party in China does not appear, on a view of the whole field to be gaining ground; they have lost many of the cities they formerly held. Their Christianity is of a very doubtful character, if it can lay any claim to that name. The rebels in Shanghai, if they lose the city and escape with their lives, will undoubtedly return to their former occupations; and most of them were pirates and thieves. I will do the revolutionists of Nankin the justice to say that I think most of the Shanghai rebels would be put to the sword should they come down as far as this place.

The mission families are all in good health. Brothers Lambuth, Kelley and Bolton are all crowded into the small mission-house recently built; and I know not where they could get a place to live in if it had not been erected.

As soon as the press arrives, and I can get a building put up for the purpose, we shall probably put to press an edition of the Sacred Scriptures, authorized by a committee recently appointed by the American Bible Society.

Hoping to hear from you at your earliest convenience, and beseeching still an interest in your prayers, as well as those of the whole Church, I remain, most affectionately and respectfully, yours,

B. JENKINS.

Shanghai, China, Dec. 29, 1854.

ARY SURVEY.

What other faults soever may be laid to the door of the American Government, there is certainly one department against which no charge can be justly brought. Our Administrations may not have done properly nor acted up to the spirit of the country concerning their foreign relations. Some errors may be found with regard to domestic affairs, but in those matters of discovery and general usefulness that have harvested so great an amount of praise and commendation for England and France, we are equal to our older rivals. The most remote ice banks of the Southern Pole, the most insignificant islands of the Equator, the wildest nooks and closet retreats of the Pacific have been visited by the stars and stripes—their location taken and their whole geography described. Com. Wilkes has surveyed one part of the ocean, Lieut. Lynch has mapped out the Dead Sea, Lieut. Strain has pictured Darien, Col. Fremont has explored the Rocky Mountains, Dr. Kane has hid himself in the North Sea, and Commodore Perry has sounded and measured the waters of China and Japan.

But, beyond these worthy and honorable achievements, prosecuted for the honor of the country and the general increase of knowledge, our Government has done much, in a quiet and unobtrusive manner, for the commercial benefit and prosperity of the world at large, by an extensive and well conducted series of surveys along our own coasts from Nova Scotia to Corpus Christi, and from Lower California to Upper Oregon. These surveys have been under the general supervision of Professor A. D. Bache, assisted by some of the oldest members of the naval and topographical departments. Their reports are now before us in a volume of considerable size, abounding in particulars, maps, charts and specifications, showing the soundings near every important port, the shoals that lie near it, the bearings and beacons for mariners, and much miscellaneous information of great general interest.

The coast of this country is unlike that of any other. In the first place, it is larger than that of England, counting in all her colonies and dependencies, or of any other nation. Secondly, it is more difficult of navigation. Some of the ports and harbors are as fine as the world can show, but the entrance to all is environed with difficulties not known to Liverpool, Dover, Portsmouth, Calais or Havre. The approach to Boston is perhaps as easy and open as any on our Atlantic seaboard, and yet Minot's Ledge will tell a story of wreckage and disaster that, in proportion to the tonnage risked, eclipses the Goodwin Sands. New York, too, can only be approached through dangers that in a stormy time make navigation as uncertain as at the period of the Argonautic expedition, and leave the bones of many men and ships to bleach on inhospitable islands and barren shores. From the capes of Delaware and Virginia to Abaco, and from Abaco to the Tortugas, there is no safe navigation at all, but a continuity of low sandbars, coral walls, keys and islets, making it imperatively necessary that captains who make a coasting voyage should have a thorough knowledge of the nature of the region through which they sail. The same may be said of our own Gulf coast from Florida to Corpus Christi. It is in many places utterly closed to navigation by large sand-bars, and in others the channel is difficult of discovery.

For many years past the surveys and soundings of the French, English and Spanish, have been all that our navigators have had to rely upon. We have made new charts of regions comparatively unknown and unimportant, while we left the waters at our own doors as unexplored as ever. The surveys of Prof. Bache have remedied this, and now every mariner can obtain a chart with the soundings of every American port he may desire to visit; the distances from one to another; the bars in the neighborhood; the channels, the kinds of bottom; the conveniences and inconveniences to be met with.

Such labors as these are not only honorable to the nation that undertakes them, but profitable to the whole world. Private enterprise is not sufficient for their accomplishment, and can only follow after in the way of maps and charts compiled from them. They are nevertheless of broader usefulness and more general importance than all the Crystal Palace Exhibitions ever dreamed of, or ever achieved, and in their ultimate results they are more beneficial to the country than any investment it could make in stocks or bonds. The true path of this country's enterprise is through the billow and the wave. Whatever tends to make that path clearer and easier is beneficial and to be praised. The coast surveys to which we allude are, therefore, worthy of the warmest commendation.

THE LAST OF THE KNICKERBOCKERS.—Passing up Broadway last week, I encountered near the Park a figure which brought Rip Van Winkle's experience vividly to mind. In the midst of the crowd of eager pedestrians, in ugly round hats and grim overcoats, shrieking newsboys, and feathered dames, moved a slender but handsomely-formed man, with a gray beard, long and fluttering in the wind, a cocked hat, small clothes and buckled shoes. His dress fitted admirably, and was entirely black; his expression benign and serene, his gait leisurely, and his bearing graceful. He looked every inch the old Knickerbocker gentleman, and carried me back in fancy to the palmy reign of Von Twiller and Stuyvesant.

How vain and weary the impertinent bustle around must have seemed to his conservative mind! He thronged the crowd like a being of another sphere, as if a reanimated portion of a New Amsterdam scholar had stepped from its frame. The sight was picturesque, refreshing and suggestive. I learn that he is an apothecary, who keeps a little shop in the heart of what was once the fashionable region of the metropolis. Like good old Major Melville, who used to perambulate Boston in our young days, he rejoices in the now almost extinct title of the "Last of the Cocked Hats." [Cor. Bost. Trav.

FACTS ABOUT NEWSPAPERS.—An Albany paper says:

The people of the Union spend in a year for newspapers $15,000,000, or would if they all paid their debts.

The newspapers that they read, if all put together in a continuous string, would reach more than ten times around the world, and weigh 70,000,000 pounds! If they were spread out to dry, they would more than cover the whole District of Columbia like a blanket.

The origin of newspapers is traced to Italy. The first in England appeared during the reign of "Good Queen Bess," at the time of the Spanish Armada. It was named Ye English Mercurie, imprinted in London by Her Highness's printer in 1588. Franklin's Boston News Letter was the first in America. It commenced in 1704. A hundred years ago there were not more than twenty-five published in America.

A WIFE'S DEVOTION.

BY GEO. H. RAYMOND.

The long and desperate struggle which had for years been carried on between the Imperial Government of Brazil and the revolted southern provinces was drawing to a close; and I, who for nearly five years had been almost constantly on the wing, or, what amounted to about the same thing, on horseback, in the patriotic service, was on my way to join my little Brazilian wife to whom I had been united some five months previously, and from whose side I had been summoned within three hours after our marriage to lead my command against a body of Don Pedro Pequado's Lanciers, who were committing depredations in the neighborhood.

I had been severely wounded in the side and shoulder, and what with the exposure in our wild, uncomfortable camp, the entire lack of proper medical and surgical skill, and the slow fever which had for three weeks been consuming me, my iron constitution had given way at last, and I was as near dead as a man could well be and maintain his seat in his saddle.

My home, or rather that of my wife, was on the banks of the beautiful Uruguay, on the extreme western limits of the Brazilian Empire, and my way thither led across the serried peaks and through the wild passes of the Southern Brazilian Andes, a region swarming with every species of wild beasts, fierce savages, murderous banditti, who killed for mere pastime, and bands of Imperial troops, more savage than brutes, Indians, or robbers.

Pleasant, very; don't you think it was? for an invalid scarce able to keep his seat in the saddle, and accompanied by only two negro slaves possessing but little more sense or reason than the horses they guided.

Seven long, tedious days went by, and I had struggled on thus far without coming in contact with the wild beasts, savages, robbers, or imperial soldiers, to within fifteen leagues of my journey's end; when my overtasked energies could bear me up no longer, and dispatching the most intelligent of my servants to apprise my wife and family of my situation, I lay down under the shelter of a shelving rock in one of the most rugged, desolate mountain passes I had ever seen, but with slight hopes of surviving till aid should arrive from my friends on the Uruguay.

It was near noon when the negro departed on his mission, and, as I had promised him freedom and ten ounces in gold if he reached my wife's home that night, I knew he would not lose a moment, and I might expect relief before night next day, provided I lived till that time; which did not seem very probable, as within two hours I was half delirious. The hot blood driven to the extremities by the raging fever seemed like leaping liquid currents of fire; while my very vitals appeared to scorch and to crisp with the subtle heat, and my whole frame was racked with the most exquisite torture.

Twenty times during the afternoon I had sent the remaining slave to the stream which wound along the bottom of the ravine for water to slake my burning thirst.

The sun was, perhaps, an hour above the horizon, when I was suddenly surrounded by a band of some twenty ferocious-looking brigands, who were traversing the mountain-pass to the westward in pursuit of a train of mules loaded with merchandise that had preceded them but the day previous.

I had nothing about me to tempt the robbers' cupidity. As they were rather partial to the revolutionary party, whose uniform I wore, they offered me no violence, and one of them even brought me a gourd of water; for my slave had fled at the approach of the brigands, and I never saw him afterward.

But all my entreaties, prayers and promises of reward were unheeded. I could not prevail on them to remain with me till my friends should arrive. They were intent only upon the capture and plunder of the mules, and so they departed, leaving me there alone, sick and dying, in that wild, desolate mountain pass.

My scanty supply of water was soon exhausted, and I was raving mad with intolerable thirst. In my frenzy I tore the bandages from my half closed wounds, beat my head against the rocky fragments that formed my bed; and, oh, how I prayed for death!

There I lay all that long, horrid night till it was daylight again; and then I sank into a death-like torpor, from which I was aroused by a heavy weight pressing on my chest, and my first glance, as I opened my eyes, fell upon the well-remembered features of the most deadly enemy I had on earth—Col. Martinus Arcola, of the Imperial army of Brazil.

"By the Cross! we are well met, Senor Raymondo," spoke the brutal ruffian, with his booted heel crushing into my throat till my eyes seemed bursting from their sockets, and my black, swollen tongue protruded from my mouth, and the wretch laughed in derision of my terrible agony as he continued:

"We are well met, I say, Senor Raymondo, and I doubt not your beautiful bride, the Lady Inez, of whom you robbed me, will be very grateful when I tell her how faithfully I watched over you in your last moments. Come, my men, this gallant officer must needs be somewhat chilly; gather a good supply of this dry brushwood, and we will try what effect fire will have on the disease that seems to be wasting him."

Fifty bronze-faced ruffians set about obeying their commander's order, and then after five minutes had elapsed, and I was placed, all helpless as I was, on a huge pile of dry branches, I understood it all. The infernal fiend was about to burn me there alive!

I would not ask my life of the demon, for well I knew that it would be unavailing. But, oh God! may I never again suffer such a mental torture as I did while lying there surrounded by those devils in human shape, as I thought of all the heart-agony that my wife must suffer when the revolting details of my dreadful death should become known to her.

Once I turned my head toward the west to catch a glimpse of the setting sun, and the next moment I was insensible. It was not long that I remained thus; for I was aroused again by the quick rattle of pistol shots, the clash of steel, the wild battle-shouts, and dying screams of strong men in their last horrid death-agony.

All around me I beheld a vision of gallant men, led on by a slight girlish figure in the light blue frock, gold embroidered vest, and plumed cap of the Southern Guachas, who, mounted upon a superb horse, black as night, sped here and there, shouting our battle-cry of "Mueron los Imperialistos," in which she was joined by her hundred followers, who hurled themselves upon the doomed ruffians in a whirlwind of gleaming steel.

The last wretch was slain, and the lovely woman knelt beside me; her arms were about my neck, her warm kiss was upon my cheek, as she breathed in a gentle tone the words: "My Husband!"

It was my wife—my own angel Inez. She had ridden on in advance of more than four hundred men, with only a hundred who could keep pace with her, and—I was saved.

A woman will cling to the chosen object of her heart like a possum to a gum tree, and you can't separate her without snapping strings that no art can mend, and leaving a portion of her soul upon the upper leather of your affections. She will sometimes see something to love where others will see nothing to admire; and when her fondness is once fastened on a fellow, it sticks like glue and molasses in a bushy head of hair.

An iron horse on one of our principal railways, having been adorned with the title, "I still live," a wag, noting the inscription, remarked: "That is what the passengers should be labeled at the end of the journey."

BENEVOLENCE GOOD POLICY.

"Well," said Major Henry, an affluent citizen of Auburn, to his amiable lady, one morning after his faultless cup of coffee, and his usual glance at the morning news, "Mary, we will for the present trade with young Williams & Co., in Walnut street. Please send the servants there."

"What! Isaac Simpson & Co., where we have traded so long to our entire satisfaction? What can have occurred to offend you?"

"Nothing, my dear; they are truly honorable men and politely attentive to their customers—"

"And so respectable, Major; such an old, well established firm. Why, all the elite trade there," said Mrs. H., interrupting him.

"There is no reason in the world, Mary, why we should leave them, but that I have an object in bestowing our patronage elsewhere."

"Please explain yourself," said she, "for you are perfectly inexplicable at present."

"Well, my dear, Williams & Co. are worthy young men just established in business, and I suspect that the sweet breezes of popular favor do not blow that way any too strongly. Perhaps we can aid in giving proper direction to the current."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Mrs. H., with slight petulance; "they can take care of themselves as other firms do. Surely, we are under no obligations to exchange old friends for strangers; you are capricious."

"We are not obliged, in the sense you use the term," said he. "Heaven is under no obligations to Earth that call for the bestowal of the daily and unceasing blessings ever vouchsafed. But, Mary, listen to a chapter in my early history that will illustrate the question:

"My parents, you know, were in limited circumstances, and I commenced life dependent upon my own exertions. I accepted a clerkship at first, with a small salary. By conscientious devotion to business, this was gradually increased, until, with frugality, I was enabled to accumulate a sum that I thought would warrant commencing for myself. I opened a store in Pearl street, with a limited stock in trade, but with large hopes for the future. But customers did not throng my counters. Day after day I spent wistfully looking at the crowds that hurried by, yet scarcely deigning a passing curious look within. It was a new arrangement, and few cared to patronize the novelty. All had other places of trade.

"All this continued until trouble rose up before me. Rent and payment of stock yet on my shelves were coming due. Visions of bankruptcy hovered before my eyes daily, and dreams of ruin and disgrace tortured me nightly. All the fruits of my past years of toil and self-denial would be consumed. I became so nervous that the entrance of a customer was painful instead of cheering. I could not meet my acquaintances with habitual cheerfulness, and their friendly inquiries concerning my business were like daggers to my sensibility. I shall never lose the taste of that bitterness of feeling that swelled up from my full breast with forced replies. But the crisis—the pay day came. Stock all on hand, but no cash. With little faith in success, but as drowning men catch at straws, I determined to state my case to a certain wealthy citizen, well known for his eccentric acts of benevolence, and request a loan. I did so.

"'Hmph! I'll see about that; call again,' was his only reply, and he resumed the reading that my entrance interrupted.

"I was already forgotten, thought I, as I departed in no very enviable state of mind.

"The next morning I received a note from a bank, stating that the cashier had been requested to notify me that $2000 had been deposited to my credit there. I was saved temporarily, at least. I well knew my benefactor. How intense my gratitude, how earnest my vow some day to prove it, it is vain to attempt to describe. I drew the amount, met my obligations punctually, and established an unlimited credit, which, by the way, I very sparingly used. Again I rejoiced in hope. But I have yet to tell you of the greatest favor that worthy man conferred upon me.

"A few days after the grant of the timely loan, a carriage drew up at the store, and in the lady that alighted I recognized with joy the amiable wife of my benefactor. She made a large bill, and I augured well from it. I prided myself upon my taste in selecting goods, and had some exquisitely beautiful patterns. Mrs. Chedell, for that was the lady's name, your very good friend, Mary, was a fashionable example, even to the ton in those days, and she took particular pains to associate our name with her purchases. The consequence was, when my next pay-day came, my cash account was in such a favorable state that I met my engagements easily; and, henceforth, the road to my present position was natural and easy. I am indebted to Mr. and Mrs. C., and to Providence, for my fortune, I fully believe. In that day, when good and evil seemed so equally balanced, a favor thrown into the financial scale decided the question. Since that I have sympathized with young aspirants for the favors of trade, and extended, when I could, the helping hand. Now, my dear, am I capricious?"

The expressive countenance of his listener replied eloquently and well.

At that moment Mr. Chedell himself entered the room and was warmly welcomed. But the reception he met could not remove from his countenance marks of trouble plainly perceptible there.

"Major Henry," said he, with an effort, "I did you a favor once. Have you forgotten it?"

Never! my dear sir!" said he, emphatically, and smiling confirmation to his word, while no trace of discontent at the reminder distracted from his sunny expression.

"Now I am in trouble," continued Mr. C. "My son is seriously embarrassed by the state of the money market, and some heavy demands unexpectedly made upon him through the imprudence of a foreign agent. We can not meet those drafts, and accommodation is denied us at the banks. Hence, I came to you."

"I am glad to have this opportunity of proving to you how grateful I am for that old favor," said the Major, proceeding to his desk for the purpose of complying with his request. He hastily attached his signature to a blank check, which he requested Mr. C. to fill with the required amount.

"Come again," said the kind-hearted Major. "Come again; if this be insufficient, command my utmost means."

"How short-sighted," said Mr. C., feelingly, are they, in reference to their true interest, who neglect opportunities of doing good. I have never yet performed a trivial act of kindness, in a judicious way, that did not eventually overwhelm me with returning benefits."

"Then you think all your benevolence good policy? and the disposition to do all the good you can avidance of shrewdness rather than virtue, by you?" said the Major, jokingly.

"Happy-hearted men! The rewards of virtue are many and great. The lowering clouds of care that of late hung so darkly over the spirits of the one, were suddenly dispelled by the sunlight of the other's gratitude.

The world is not all selfishness—the usury of kindness not always ingratitude.

Mrs. Henry was deeply affected by what she had seen and heard, and thenceforth she needed no persuasion to induce her to join her husband in his plans of charity and benevolence.

Nor will any who read aright the moral of this tale be slow to follow in the pleasant life-path to which it is a guide.

The Chicago Tribune says that the sum of $25,000 will be raised in that city to aid in defeating the Prohibitory Liquor Law. Nearly two-thirds of the sum has already been subscribed.

MENEELY'S BELL FOUNDRY, WEST TROY

We are pleased to know that this establishment is turning off, notwithstanding the hard times, about as many bells as ever. During the present week it has supplied church bells for villages and cities in five different States. The improvements made in the patterns employed are such that any desired tone can be given. Not the least important improvement is the "rotating yoke," invented for the proprietors, which is acknowledged to be superior to any other in use. Any person in society requiring anything in their line can obtain full information by sending by mail for a circular, which gives prices, dimensions, instructions for hanging, plates of different descriptions of bells, with their [illegible].—West Troy Advocate.

THE TITLE OF REDEEMER.

There is no name of Messiah more significant, comprehensive or endearing than that of Redeemer. The name of Saviour expresses what he does for sinners. He saves them from guilt and wrath, from sin, from the present evil world, from the powers of dark ness, and all their enemies. He saves them with an everlasting salvation. But the word "Redeemer" intimates likewise the manner in which he saves them. For it is not merely by the word of his power, as he saved his disciples when in jeopardy upon the lake, by saying to the winds and seas, "Peace, be still, and there was a great calm;" but by price, by paying a ransom for them, and pouring out the blood of his heart as an atonement for their sins.

The Hebrew word for Redeemer, Goel, primarily signifies a near kinsman, or the next of kin, he with whom the right of redemption lay—Numbers, xxxv., 16-21; Ruth, iv., 1-3—and who, by virtue of his near relation, was the legal avenger of blood. Thus Messiah took upon him our nature, and by assuming our flesh and blood became nearly related to us, that he might redeem our forfeited inheritance, restore us to liberty, and avenge our cause against Satan, the enemy and murderer of our souls. But thus he made himself also responsible for us, to pay our debts and answer the demands of the justice and law of God on our behalf. He fulfilled his engagement. He suffered and died on this account. But our Redeemer, who was once dead, is now alive, and liveth forevermore, and has the keys of death and Hades—Rev. i. 8. This is he of whom Job [illegible] "I know that he liveth," (was then living) though he was not to stand upon the earth till the latter day. He is the living One, having life in himself; the same yesterday, to-day and forever. Such was his own language to to the Jews: "Before Abraham was I am." Therefore the Redeemer is mighty, and his redemption is sure. He is able to save to the uttermost. His power is unlimited, and his official authority as mediator is founded in a covenant ratified by his own blood, and by the oath of the unchangeable God—Psalm cx., 4.

A DISTRESSING CASE.

We learn from the Toronto (Can.) Christian Guardian that The Church (a Church of England paper) incidentally published as news the death of Bishop Capers. This brings a horrified correspondent down upon the editor, who teaches religion and Churchism to his grandchildren from the paper. Said grandpapa writes: "But, dear sir, I was last week both surprised and pained, aye, humiliated, when little Tom came running into my room, his big eyes larger than ever, with the inquiry, 'Grandpa, who was Bishop Capers?' I referred him to the U. S. Church Almanac, but no such name appeared among the Bishops of the American Church. A reference to the article in your paper soon explained the matter to me, but not to Tom or Ned, or Mary, who now joined in the discussion. I had some difficulty in making them see any distinction (in office) between Bishop Strachan, of Toronto, and Bishop Capers, of Charleston, with his six clerical brethren. They could easily understand that a preacher is not a minister of Christ's Church unless called and sent by Episcopal authority. But when the Church newspaper endorsed the title of Bishop, as applied to Mr. Capers, [mark that Mr.,] their young faith received a shock which whole weeks of regular teaching may be unable to counteract. [Alas! alas!] I told them the article about the late Mr. Capers must evidently have got into your paper by mistake, as I am sure it did; and what I now request of you, sir, is that you will acknowledge as much by publishing this letter in some early number of the Church, and thereby convince the little folks that grandpa is right." The Church of course says it was inserted by mistake, and it will doubtless see to it that none but true bishops die in its columns hereafter, lest Tom, Ned or Mary may suppose that a Methodist bishop, dead, may have been truly a bishop while living. This apostolic succession is getting of a straight jacket.

Editorial Correspondence.

NASHVILLE, April 19, 1855.

Dear P.—I drop you this note in the midst of many counsellors. Friday night, after some mishaps, the details of which I shall not trouble you with, I reached Nashville. On the Georgia railroad, at LaGrange, I fell in company with Dr. Lovick Pierce. He said, in his peculiar way, he was going up there—didn't expect to have a chance to wedge in or do anything except perhaps to say grace a few times. But he has not got off so easily.

At Atlanta we recruited a night, and also recruited our company. Bishops Early and Pierce, Dr. Taylor, and my very clever confrere of the quill, Rev. E. H. Myers, joined us in the morning train, and off we moved with a snort and a whistle, to Chattanooga. The hills have been brought low, and the valleys exalted, and the mountains drilled for the triumphant path of the locomotive king. As we whizzed along a mountain side, Dr. Pierce's eye marked a road, running like a thread away down at the bottom of the valley: "Twenty years ago I traveled along there in a buggy to General Conference, in Cincinnati." It takes a traveler of those days, crawling over weary miles, to appreciate the facilities of these.

Sabbath exercises here were liberally arranged for. In the morning I heard Bishop Kavanaugh, at Andrew Chapel. It was worth my trip. I cannot speak so flatteringly of the sermon I heard there at night. Bishop Pierce was in the pulpit and concluded. He prayed the Lord to bless the text, the sermon and the preacher. Just then a yawning auditor was overheard (not a tenant of the amen corner) to say, in colloquy with his neighbor, "That man praying preached in McKendree Church this afternoon—mighty good sermon. He is a good man, and that one he is praying for needs it."

Bishop Pierce's sermon in commemoration of the late Bishop Capers was two hours short. It is in print; but the voice, and the gestures, and the tears do not go along with the pamphlet. Especially that gesture gracefully waved towards the superintendents as he said, "Venerable fathers, your ranks are broken."

You have herewith a report of the Tenth Missionary Anniversary. The collection amounted to $2,284 75. That is handsomely done, the hard times considered. But give us in New Orleans the same speakers, with Drs. Green, and McFerrin, and Summers to hit the collection, and we can beat it. They can try us, if they like that friendly challenge.

The managers, as you have their names, present a body of men whose characters give assurance to the Church that the interests of the society will be faithfully and wisely administered. I have made the acquaintance of nearly all. I like them. They are worthy successors of the noble brethren at Louisville who, for these years past, have so faithfully taken care of these high interests. They have, as they deserve, our thanks, the thanks of the Church, and their successors our confidence.

The new Board have been in session since Tuesday. Patience and thoroughness characterize their deliberations. Dr. Sehon, the secretary, is present, minute making. Cheerful as ever, diffusing a sunshine about him. He will soon move here. It would have been improper for him to have moved sooner, inasmuch as the transfer of the society was not ordered till April.

The Board has determined that the missionary anniversaries shall do as the preachers, itinerate. The next is to be held in New Orleans, on the first Monday in April, 1856. I cannot hope that New Orleans will entertain the occasion and its actors more generously than Nashville. The Board has also made arrangements for uniformity and exactness in the rendering of Conference Treasurers' reports, that will work advantageously. To-morrow the appropriations for the coming year will be fixed upon. All the Bishops are present, except Bishop Andrew. Bishop Soule is waning fast.

The Publishing House is under way, and while I write I hear the puffing of steam and the strokes of engines. The selection of property for this purpose was eligible. The building has been adapted to present uses, in many departments, as well as if the plan had been original. Strong and roomy, well lighted and ventilated. The compositors' room is large and the best I have anywhere seen. Adams's presses are making books. They can make books here, if they can only get them off. Paper is manufactured at hand, and of good quality. The engine of four-horse power is the same that worked the Advocate. It cannot move all the wheels of book making, as binding, &c. One of sixteen horse power will soon replace it. Stereotyping is going on, and a vault of stone being prepared to lay away any quantity of plates in. That mark of sheep and neat work is seen, well dressed and intelligent women and girls tending the machines. Tuesday, by appointment, the whole establishment was opened to the public, and thousands of visitors were shown through it.

You may well imagine how look our good Agents. Brother Owen, judging from appearances, stands the pulling and hauling better than Dr. Stevenson, whose delicate health distresses me. One man is here, and there, and everywhere. Now I see him handing the printers on both sides of him copy; now poring over proof-sheets, ripping up books and taking what he wants, and casting away the rubbish; clipping papers, writing and erasing, so that it is difficult to tell which end of the stylus he uses oftenest. He is getting up books, pamphlets, tracts and what not; busy as a bee is Dr. Summers. Dr Hamilton is quietly getting hold of the strings of his part of the concern, corresponding with Conference auxiliaries and stirring up things generally. If you want to know every rope in the ship, and where it is fastened, Dr. Green can let you into it. Dr McFerrin is wide awake and all about. I could almost envy him his good things—press, types, printers, proof-readers, and then that suburban home across the wine bridge. But he deserves them all, and his happy estate gives me hopes of what may befall some of his younger brethren. If the picture impressed me, you may judge what it was to walk over the beautiful grounds, drink at the cool stonehouse spring, and enjoy, as I did, the delightful hospitality of his home.

You ask for Houston, to be sure! Before this he will have reported himself. The "Home Circle" will account for his time and employment. Of course you will give it, not a puff, but what is better, a just notice. Houston has a superior library. In a year he will add a complete volume to it. The patrons of the Home Circle may do the same, if they will preserve the numbers.

The Board probably will adjourn to-morrow. According to the request of the General Conference, a donation of $1200 has been made to aid the two Texas Conferences in establishing a German paper at Galveston. Rev. C. C. Gillespie, of the Texas Advocate, ably represented this interest before the Board. Rev. Peter Moelling, a native German, and the stationed preacher for the German Methodists at Galveston, is expected to edit it. He is a man of fine literary attainments, and a popular writer, and will put forth an interesting paper, and, I trust, one highly useful to our missionary movement among the Germans.

I close my communication with an item that prefaces many: "It is warm to-day."

Organization of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

The Tenth Anniversary Meeting of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, was held in McKendree Church, Nashville, on Monday evening, April 16, 1855. Bishop Soule in the chair.

The meeting was opened with reading the Scriptures, singing, and prayer by Rev. L. Pelree, D. D.

The Secretary then read the Annual Report, and addressed the meeting in reference to the present condition of our missionary work, at home and abroad.

Bishop Pierce was then introduced to the meeting, and, in a most forcible, able and eloquent address, advocated and sustained the great missionary enterprise. After which the collection was taken, the subject being introduced and presented, in their usual successful manner, by Drs. McFerrin and Green. The collection amounted to $2,284 75.

The annual election of officers for the society for the ensuing year was now held, and resulted as follows:

The meeting was one of deep interest throughout. The congregation was very large, and their fixed attention unbroken to the close of the meeting. A deep spirit in favor of missions was awakened, and a great impetus given to the cause by the interesting exercises of this occasion. We sincerely hope to see the same followed by similar results whenever the interests of our great missionary enterprise shall be presented.

Science and Revelation.

We copy the following letter from Lieut. Maury, on the "Harmony of Science and Revelation," from the Christian Witness and Church Advocate.

OBSERVATORY, WASHINGTON, Jan. 22, 1855.

My Dear Sir—Your letter revived very pleasant remembrances. Your questions are themes. It would require volumes to contain the answer to them. You ask about the "Harmony of Science and Revelation," and wish to know if I find "distinct traces in the Old Testament of scientific knowledge," and "in the Bible any knowledge of the winds and ocean currents." Yes, knowledge the most correct and valuable.

"Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?"

It is a curious fact that the revelations of science have led astronomers of our own day to the discovery that the sun is not the dead centre of motion, around which comets sweep and planets whirl: but that it, with its splendid retinue of worlds and satellites, is revolving through the realms of space at the rate of millions of miles in a year, and in obedience to some influence situated precisely in the direction of the star Alcyon, one of the Pleiades. We do not know how far off in the immensities of space that centre of revolving cycles and epicycles may be, nor have our oldest observers or nicest instruments been able to tell us how far off in the skies that beautiful cluster of stars is hung, whose influence man can never bind. In this question alone, and the answer to it, is involved both the recognition and exposition of the whole theory of gravitation.

Science taught that the world was round, but potentates pronounced the belief heretical, notwithstanding the Psalmist, while apostrophizing the works of creation in one of his sublime moods of inspiration, when prophets spake as they were moved, had called the world the "round world," and bade it to rejoice.

You recollect when Galileo was in prison, a pump maker came to him with his difficulties, because his pump would not lift water higher than thirty-two feet. The old philosopher thought it was because the atmosphere would not press the water up any higher; but the hand of persecution was upon him, and he was afraid to say the air had weight. Now had he looked to the science of the Bible, he would have discovered that the "perfect" man of Uz, moved by revelation, had proclaimed the fact thousands of years before. "He maketh the weight for the wind." Job is very learned, and his speech abounds in scientific lore. The persecutors of the old astronomer also would have been wiser, and far more just, had they paid more attention to this wonderful book, for there they would have learned that "He stretcheth out the North over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing."

Here is another proof that Job was familiar with the laws of gravitation, for he knew how the world was held in its place; and as for the "empty place" in the sky, Sir John Herschel had been sounding the heavens with his powerful telescope, and gauging the stars, and where do you think he finds the most barren part, the empty places of the sky? In the north; precisely where Job told Bildad, the Shuhite, the empty place was stretched out. It is there where comets most delight to roam, and hide themselves in emptiness.

I pass by the history of creation as it is written on the tablet of the rock and in the book of Revelation, because the question has been discussed so much and so often that you, no doubt, are familiar with the whole subject. In both the order of creation is the same—first, the plants to afford sustenance, and then the animals, the chief point of apparent difference being as to the duration of the period between the "evening and the morning." "A thousand years is as one day," and the Mosaic account affords evidence itself that the term day, as there used, is not that which comprehends our twenty-four hours. It was a day that had its evening and morning before the sun was made.

I will, however, before proceeding further, ask pardon for mentioning a rule of conduct which I have adopted in order to make progress with these physical researches which have occupied so much of my time and many of my thoughts, and that rule is, never to forget who is the Author of the great volume which nature spreads out before us, and always to remember that the same Being is also author of the Book which Revelation holds up to us; and though the two works are entirely different, their records are equally true, and when they bear upon the same point, as now and then they do, it is as impossible that they should contradict each other, as it is that either should contradict itself. If the two cannot be reconciled, the fault is ours, and is because in our blindness and weakness we have not been able to interpret aright either the one or the other, or both.

Solomon, in a single verse, describes the circulation of the atmosphere as actual observation is now showing it to be. That it has its laws, and is obedient to order as the heavenly host in their movement, we infer from the fact announced by him, and which contains the essence of volumes by other men, "All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again."

To investigate the laws which govern the winds and rule the sea, is one of the most profitable and beautiful occupations that a man, an improving, progressive man, can have. Decked with the stars as the sky is, the field of astronomy affords no subjects of contemplation more ennobling, more sublime, or more profitable than those which we may find in the air and the sea.

When we regard them from certain points of view, they present the appearance of wayward things, obedient to no law, but fickle in their movements, and subject only to chance.

Yet when we go as truth-loving, knowledge-seeking explorers, and knock at their secret chambers, and devoutly ask what are the laws which govern them, we are taught, in terms the most impressive, that when the morning stars sang together the waves also lifted up their voice, and the winds, too, joined in the Almighty anthem. And as discovery advances, we find the marks of order in the sea and in the air, that is in tune with the music of the spheres, and the conviction is forced upon us that the laws of all are nothing but perfect harmony.

Yours, Respectfully,

M. F. MAURY, LT. U. S. N.

CASTING A DEVIL OUT OF CHURCH.

We are indebted to our friend J. M. Ellis, of Marietta, Ohio, for the following graphic sketch. We are assured the facts transpired substantially as narrated. "A Methodist clergyman who has been long in this vicinity was not long since preaching to his people on the miraculous power of the Apostles over demoniac spirits of their day. As he was pursuing his theme, the audience were suddenly startled by a voice from some one in the congregation demanding, in a half-querulous, half-authoritative tone, "Why don't preachers do such things now-a-days?" In an instant every eye in the house was turned upon the individual who had the effrontery thus to invade the sacredness of their sanctuary. The speaker paused for a moment, and fixed his penetrating gaze upon the face of the questioner. There was an interval of intense silence, broken at last by the speaker in resuming his subject. He had not proceeded far with his remarks, before he was again interrupted with the same impertinent inquiry. Again he paused for a time, and again resumed his subject. Not content with a silent rebuke, our redoubtable questioner again demanded, "Why don't the preachers do such things now-a-days?" and, curling his lip with a sneer of self-complacency, drew himself up pompously in his seat. Our reverend friend, who by the way, is a young man of great muscular power, calmly left the desk and walked deliberately to the pew where his interrogator sat, and fastening one hand firmly upon the collar of his coat, the other on the waistband of his 'unmentionables,' lifted him square out of the seat, and bore him down the aisle to the entrance. Pausing for a moment there, he turned his eyes upon the audience, and in a clear, full voice, said, 'and they cast out the devil in the form a distiller,' and suiting the action to the word, out went the knight of the mash-tub, a la leap-frog, into the street. The good pastor quietly returned to his desk and completed his discourse. After closing the service, as he was passing out of the church, the outcast distiller, with an officer of the law, escorted our clerical friend to the office of a magistrate, to answer for an assault upon the person of said distiller. After hearing the case the magistrate dismissed the clergyman, and after roundly reprimanding the complainant, fined him for molesting the services of the sanctuary. Since that day we believe he has never for a moment doubted the power of Methodist preachers to cast out devils, at least within the limits of the Ohio Conference."—Ohio Paper.

A SEED WELL PLANTED.

Some twenty-three years ago, in a small rural village of Western New York, one Sabbath morning, as a pious young man was going to church, he observed a group of children at play in the street. He kindly spoke to them, and asked them to accompany him to the Sabbath school. They refused to go. One, however, a bright-eyed little fellow, expressed his willingness to go, if his mother would permit him. The teacher kindly took him by the hand, called and obtained permission of the widowed mother, that her little boy might become a member of his class. Thenceforward he was in constant attendance. By his fixed attention, rapid improvement, and meek and gentle disposition, he won the esteem and affection of all. At the age of twelve, during a revival, he became a convert to the religion of the meek and lowly Jesus, and united with the Church. When he came to the years of manhood, he left his native village and settled in the far West. Here, in his new home, where sacred associations held no kindly influences, he felt the need and saving grace of the gospel of truth. With his characteristic energy and unflagging perseverance, he went to work to aid in building up in that desolate place the Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour. As the result of his unceasing toil, he related, a few months since, to the Sabbath school, on his first visit to his early home, after the lapse of many years, that there had been established in the valley of the West some forty distinct branches in Zion's vineyard, eight hundred souls had been brought to receive the living waters of salvation, and four hundred Sabbath schools had been planted in different parts. And these were the fruits, by the grace of God, of the efforts of that once poor vagrant boy! Wonderful, indeed, are the ways of Providence, and past finding out!

CHEERFUL VIEWS.—Try to take cheerful views of divine things. Look at the bright as well as the dark side. Do not cherish gloomy thoughts. Melancholy is no friend to devotion. It greatly hinders the usefulness of many. It falls upon a contented life like a drop of ink on white paper, which is not the less a stain because it carries no meaning with it. Let your soul rove through the truths of Scripture as the happy herds through the green pastures.

It is supposed the dirt thrown out by the miners in California during the dry season will, when washed, yield $8,000,000 in dust.

"Perplexed, but not in despair,
Cast down, but not destroyed."

Our confrere of the Memphis Advocate comes out of the fire with these words of good hope. This number of the 17th inst. looks unusually fresh and well. It is unscathed; the smell of fire is not upon it. It has received beauty for ashes—it has come forth as gold. Saith Brother Cobb, after presenting the claims of Memphis to a Christian Advocate:

"We have nailed our colors to the mast; and so far, thank God, we have had that consolation from a quiet conscience, and a cheering support from our agents and readers, which is fully repaying us for our efforts.

"We announce to our readers, with grateful feelings, that our prospects are encouraging, and that if collections and subscriptions continue to be sent in as they have been for a month or two past, success will no longer be problematical.

Well, but Brother Cobb, what of the fire? Why just this—that we are not prepared just yet to say what will be the amount of our loss, as a considerable portion may be covered by insurance; but then, in order to pay for the large amount of ink and paper which has been consumed, and to rebt our office with type and material, we have been thrown out of the use of some six or seven hundred dollars, by which we must for the present be seriously embarrassed."

We trust that this excellent journal will "never say die"—that the motto on those colors so boldly nailed to the mast will be, "don't give up the ship."

We have been highly interested in the proceedings of the First Anniversary of the Local Preachers' Association of New York and Brooklyn. We make some excerpts from the Christian Advocate and Journal:

"The first anniversary of this association was held in the Seventh street M. E. Church of this city, on Thursday evening, April 5th. Rev. I. M. Howe took the chair, and the exercises were opened with singing, and prayer by Rev. James M. Freeman, of New Jersey Conference. The report was then read by Rev. Richard Horton, the Secretary, from which it appears that this society originated in the year 1837, in Brooklyn, and had at that time for its sole object the 'winning of souls to Christ,' by laboring conjointly in such places as were opened for the preaching of the Word. In 1838 a constitution and by-laws were adopted, which were signed by fifteen brethren, five of whom are still members of the association. In 1848 a number of brethren from New York united with them, and a mutual benefit feature was added, which has since proved a great blessing to some of the poorer members of the association who have been stricken down by sickness or death. A desire, however, existed to extend still further the sphere of this society's usefulness, by adding a library, a reading room, and classes for suitable instruction. Application was accordingly made to the Legislature of the State for an act of incorporation by which the society might own property and erect a building for the carrying forward of its extensive and commendable purposes. This request was granted on the 17th day of April, 1854, and on this its first anniversary, the institution claims for the first time the attention, sympathy, and assistance of the Methodist public. The present number of preachers in the association is twenty-three, and the plan of appointments for the past year has embraced 358 preaching services, and the personal labors of the members have added to these 700 more, making more than 1,000 preaching services supplied by the association during the year."

Here are some interesting and suggestive passages in the principal address of the occasion, delivered by Rev. J. M. Reid:

"These are the men who are to present to the congregations the sublime truths of Christianity, and you are therefore called upon to be interested in this movement of the local ministry for self-improvement by all the love you have for what is termed 'good preaching,' and its necessary consequences, the salvation and increase in grace of those who hear; the more so, too, as the local ministry is the mighty reservoir from which flow out those itinerant streams which irrigate the whole land. It will be poor policy for Methodists to put aside their local ministry just at the very hour when the immense advantages of a lay ministry are attracting the attention of other denominations—just at the hour, indeed, when, under another name, they are employing the same instrumentality; for what is this network of colporage which overspreads the whole land but the employment of laymen, in connection with the daily business of book selling, to hold meetings and spread the glad tidings of salvation? We cannot dispense with the local ministry; the present movement is in the right direction; let us elevate and dignify the calling, and thereby give it fresh power in our economy.

I would claim, sir, that this class of the ministry, more than any other, should enjoy every possible help to intellectual culture. They are ministers, and have all the needs of other ministers in this respect. The qualifying term, 'local,' rather increases than diminishes the requirement. We of the itinerancy pass from one town and city to another, and our intellectual capital many he used again and again; but the local preachers are, in fact, the settled ministry of our Church, only with a circuit embracing every accessible point. They preach and repreach to the same hearers. Why, sir, ere I was born into the kingdom some of these men of God preached in these very pulpits where they preach now. I would ask the Church, then, to consider whether it is as easy thus to address for successive years the same people, with no other preparation than that snatched from midnight hours or before dawn? It is no easy thing to toil for six days, and on the seventh to preach with freshness and vigor the deep things of God. Moreover, sir, the local minister must preach better than we do to be equally acceptable. I know it, for I for years labored here as a local preacher. They come to a people who are prejudiced, by the very fact that they come from the Nazareth of a mechanic's shop or a counting desk. It is contrary to the professional tastes and feelings of our times, and in coming to the people these beloved brethren meet this difficulty and feel its pressure. No class of our ministers require so much ability to maintain a respectable and influential position in the Church as these brethren."

A correspondent of the Texas Christian Advocate furnishes the following concerning the Methodist Church, North, in Texas:

"Mr. Editor—Permit me to say, through the columns of the Advocate, for the information of those who read it, that the editors of the Northern Methodist papers are laboring under quite a mistake relative to Bishop Simpson holding an annual conference in the town of Bonham, Texas, in November next. It is reported, however, that there will be an annual conference held in the vicinity of Bonham, in a little log cabin about sixteen feet square, that has been used for a country school house, and I suppose that Bishop Simpson will be the presiding officer

That branch of the Church has two missionaries itinerating in this portion of the country, preaching and trying to organize churches, but they make but little progress. They have inculcated the principles of Abolitionism in the minds of a few, whom they have led away by their absolute misrepresentations; and in the bounds of Bonham circuit there are probably about twenty-five of that class. These ministers have never preached in Bonham, have made but one effort to do so, and were defeated in that. They have neither a class nor a member there. The people generally regard them as being Abolitionists of the old stamp, and therefore pay but little regard to them, while the people of Bonham know nothing about the proposed conference.

The Methodists of Pittsburg have a church amongst them with an organ in it. The editor of the Pittsburg Advocate declared himself pleased with the "sublime" tones of the instrument, and for his presumption he gets soundly berated by some of his brethren. In defence of himself he writes himself a conservative:

"We know of no Scripture warrant to exclude instrumental music from the public service of the Church. We know that under the Jewish economy it formed part of the temple service, and by divine appointment. And it is nowhere prohibited by Christ or his Apostles. Its use is therefore lawful; though all things which are lawful, as the Apostle teaches, are not always expedient. And what might be expedient under some circumstances, under others, and generally, might be very inexpedient. This, as we understand it, is precisely the ground occupied by our Church on this subject. She recommends, for example, that in all cases where practicable, our church edifices should be built with free seats in them, and our people would in ordinary cases discourage the introduction of organs or other instruments of music. But while this is her general policy, she admits of exceptions to it. In the true apostolic sense, she would become "all things to all men," that she may gain some of every class. While she has directed her mission specially to the masses, she has not forgotten that though the Saviour said of the rich, "how hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven," he said, also, "what is impossible with men is possible with God"—that the gospel faithfully preached 'is the power of God unto salvation' to both rich and poor. To provide, therefore, for a class of persons who are unwilling to attend her ministry in plain churches, with free seats, she departs from her ordinary plan. She says to such build a church after your own mind, and we will send you the ministry, faithful, spiritual men, to occupy it, who shall show to you and your children the way of salvation. Does she wrong in this? Is she not following the example of Christ, who preached the gospel wherever men were found to hear it?—whether in the wilderness, where multitudes followed him, or in the streets of the crowded city, in the abodes of the poor, the dwellings of the rich, or in Solomon's porch, surrounded by the gorgeous decorations of the temple."

YOUNG MINISTERS SHOULD USE THEIR PEN.—Though I did not usually write my sermons in order either to read or mandate them, according to the Scottish phrase and practice, yet I rarely neglected my pen. As I had opportunity, I was constantly committing thoughts and sentiments to writing. It was one of the advices of Mrs. Hannah Moore, at my first acquaintance with her, to write much. "It matters not, comparatively," said that extraordinary woman, to whom I owed much, "on what a young composer first writes; by the constant use of the pen he will soon form a style; and by nothing else will he attain it." The venerable Dr. John H. Rice made a similar remark. "Young ministers," he said, "ought to write for the press, for religious papers, and see how their thoughts appear in print, as a means of their own improvement."—Jay.

LATER FROM MEXICO.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ORIZABA.

The steamship Orizaba, Capt. Forbes, arrived Wednesday morning, bringing dates from Vera Cruz to the 22d, and from the City of Mexico to the 18th.

The news by this arrival is altogether unimportant. Various parts of the country are still (as they always have been) infested by bands of robbers, who commit the usual excesses; but if we may believe the newspapers the revolution presents no longer a head of any importance; in fact, it appears to have become a matter of very little interest.

We find in El Siglo accounts of several trifling engagements between the Government troops and the Revolutionists. On the 14th of March an encounter took place at the town of Celaya, in the Department of Guanajuato, between the Government forces and about a thousand insurgents, under Florencio Zavala, with a loss of fifty killed, a great number wounded, and two prisoners, who were immediately shot.

A body of revolutionists, it is also said, who were led by Diego Alvarez, suffered a defeat at Cruz Grande, losing most of their arms and munitions of war.

El Siglo has a long account of an attack by the revolutionists upon the town of Tehuantepec, in Oaxaca. The besiegers established themselves upon the hills that overlook the place, took possession of buildings in the outskirts of the town, and occupied the roads with a view of infantry and cavalry. A sharp firing was kept up between the combatants during the entire day, and on the following night the revolutionists commenced constructing embankments, but in consequence of the annoyance experienced from sharp-shooters these works were imperfect. On the following morning the troops made a successful sallie from the town and drove the besiegers from the trenches, but they re-collected their forces without much fighting again took possession of them. It appears that more or less skirmishing occurred throughout the day. During the following night the besiegers abandoned their camp and fled, tearing down and burning off. It is said, the flag of the U. S. Consul. The Government troops pursued them some distance and secured the flag, which was returned to the Consul.

After a full and particular description of this siege of nearly two days and nights, full of battles and skirmishes, the dispatch states that the enemy had seven men killed and a great many wounded, judging from the quantities of blood left upon the pavements of the streets they had occupied. The dispatch further states that the insurgents committed the most horrid excesses upon the unfortunate inhabitants of that part of the town in which they had entrenched themselves.

Santa Anna had returned from his estate in Tamaulipas and his health was rather bad.

Two distinct shocks of earthquake were felt at Puebla and the city of Mexico, and various other points.

On the 22d inst. a grand religious service, in commemorement of the decision upon the Immaculate Conception, was to be held in the cathedral, and His Excellency Highness was expected to participate in the ceremonies.

On the morning of the 10th ult., Don Francisco Marquez, one of the revolutionary chiefs, who had been taken prisoner in a recent engagement, was shot in the city of Mexico.

It is stated that the bandits under the chief Salazar had entirely dispersed, and that he, having received an arm in an action at Cocula, had concealed himself in the mountains. Publicity, with an insignificant force, had been seen about a league from the town of Guadalajara, moving towards the south. The greater portion of Plasson's men had deserted, and the few that remained had gone with him to Cosguatlitla.

HOW TO SPEAK.—I will not speak more than I should speak too much; and I will not speak at all, unless I can speak to the purpose.—Bishop Beveridge.

Marriages.

On 3d April, in Union parish, La., by Rev. M. Crowson, Rev. H. B. PRICE, of Morehouse parish, to Miss C. A. KIDD, of Union parish, La.

Deaths.

"For of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

DIED—On the 23d March, at Contonary College, Jackson, La., CHARLES, son of Chas. and Ellen R. Armitage, born in the parish of Concordia March 2, 1845. So rapid was the work of death that although his father was telegraphed, and made all possible haste, he did not reach Jackson until Charlie was no more. He died away from his home and among strangers.

A few hours before his death, in a doze of sleep, he was understood to speak of home. Then he awoke his Sunday school teacher, who remained all day with him, asked him if he wished to see his father and grandmother. "Yes," said he, I want to see them both; and if I could see my father I would die happy." In two or three hours from this time he breathed his last, and his spirit has joined his sainted mother and his little brother in the realms of bliss, leaving behind a living father, who has another tie in glory, and also a grandmother and grandfather who loved him dearly, and friends—for all who knew him loved him.

That ones loved form now cold and dead,
Each mournful thought employs.
We weep, our earthly comforts fled,
And withered all our joys.

Hope looks beyond the bounds of time,
When what we now deplore
Shall rise in full, immortal prime,
And bloom to fade no more.

Thibodaux, April, 19, 1855. L. A. REED.

DIED—In the triumphs of faith, at his residence in this county, on the 13th April, THOMAS ROBERTS, aged 49 years and 18 days.

He was a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church the greater part of his life. His end was peace. The Lord heal the wounded hearts of his widow and orphans. DAN'L DUNCAN.

Tuscaloosa, Ala., April 19, 1855.

DIED—At his residence, in this parish, on the 12th April, Mr. EDWARD MOORE RICHARDSON, aged 36 years and 7 months.

Thus this good man has passed away from earth; and few, if any, of an extended circle of relatives and friends will see this announcement without the tribute of a tear or a sigh. From childhood to the grave he has left us a beautiful character to contemplate. A widow and three children mourn this bereavement. In a mind so well balanced it is not always easy to select prominent traits of character, but we incline to the opinion that love of justice was his ruling principle. The stern old maxim, "be just, if the heavens fall," was ever prominent in his mind, and with him conviction of right was enough, let consequences take care of themselves. His east of mind was more profound than brilliant, and a subject once passed through his searching crucibles was well tested. A lawyer by profession, he soon relinquished it from motives of health and interest, to engage in his favorite pursuit of agriculture. In the various relations of life such was his bearing as to inspire the confidence and esteem of all, impressed as they were with his sincere and unaffected piety. For years past he knew that life for him could not be long, and this conviction may have given a deeper coloring to his Christian character. With the powers of mind possessed by Mr. Richardson, the foundation of the Christian faith was well examined, and the beautiful structure erected in its inmost recesses. For himself, he knew that religion was no illusory dream or thing to parade before the world; that its holy mandates were not to be obeyed in the outward observance of empty forms, but in the entire abandonment of the heart to God, the concentration of all to his will. His deathbed scene was a fit closing of such a life; he gave his last farewell to those he loved on earth, and died in full hopes of a blissful immortality. R. H. R.

Pattersonville, April 10, 1855.

The Mobile Tribune, of Tuesday, states that the Horticultural Fair appointed for the 1st of May has been postponed to the 8th of that month, in consequence of the unprecedented drouth and the general backwardness of the season.

HORRIBLE AFFAIR.—A Family of Seven Persons Murdered—The Wabash (ind.) Gazette, extra, contains an account of the discovery of the bodies of a family of seven persons, near that place, of the name of French, who had been brutally murdered. It appears the family consisted of French, his wife, and five children. They were very poor, and lived in a cabin, and in September last another family, of the name of Hubbard, went to live with them. During October, a neighbor proceeded to the cabin to see French, and was told by the Hubbards that the family had moved away, and that they had purchased all their corn, garden produce and furniture, valued, in the aggregate, at not over $50. No suspicion of foul play was aroused until recently, when the Hubbards were arrested on suspicion of murdering a man named Boyles. The house was then searched, and a portion of the ground floor dug up, which resulted in the finding of the dead body of an infant, very much decayed. The Gazette then, after referring to the summoning of a coroner's inquest, says:

"In the presence of a large company, they proceeded to examine the place where the infant had been discovered, and, horrible to relate, found seven bodies, consisting of the entire French family! Their skulls were all broken in, and the legs of the old man French and his wife were broken, so that they could be doubled up and forced into the hole, which was three or four feet deep. They were laid in a heap—the father and the mother at the bottom, and the children on top. The babe was about fifteen months old, and the oldest child about fifteen years old. There were three girls and two boys. The children were much decayed, but the parents were still sound, and were easily recognized by those who had known them.

"There is not the least doubt that the Hubbards are guilty of this wholesale and damning murder. It is almost too horrible for belief, but facts are as above stated, and the conclusion is irresistible. The Hubbards are all in jail. There seems to have been no other motive than the obtaining what few worldly goods this poor family possessed, which were not worth over fifty dollars!

ARKANSAS.—The Little Rock Whig of the 19th says:

The river is now nearly at low water mark again. But few boats, and they of light draught, were able to reach this place on the small rise noticed in our remarks of last week. We believe there is but few evils, but some good may be learned from them, and this continued suspension of navigation clearly shows what must be our fate, not with an uncertain river, but one that is certain to disappoint us if we rely upon it as an avenue or channel of trade and commerce. Suffering peculiarly as we have for the last two years, without a parallel on account of land carriage and other annoyances, has done more to awaken a spirit and determination in our citizens generally, than anything else, to provide for a more speedy and certain communication with the Mississippi river than the Arkansas now affords.

The weather is fine. Spring, with all her charms and floral beauty is now presenting its most attractive features.

The health of the city and country generally is good.

Since the above was in type, a report was brought here by an endorsement on the waybill of the western stage, that there was a rise in the Arkansas, at Fort Gibson, of eight feet. We hope it may be true.

The Fayetteville Independent has the following paragraph:

Peach-trees are in full bloom now—April 13th. There will be, unless hail or some other destroyer should come along, more peaches in Washington county than ever before known.

DESTRUCTION OF ANTS.—A correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger, says:

"We give a sure remedy—procure a large sponge, wash it well, press it very dry; by so doing it will leave the small cells open—lay it on the shelf where they are most troublesome sprinkle soft fine white sugar on the sponge (lightly over it) two or three times a day, take a bucket of hot water to where the sponge is, carefully drop the sponge in the scalding water, and you will slay them by the thousands, and soon rid the house of these troublesome insects. When you squeeze the sponge, you will be astonished at the number that had gone in the cells."

The question of removing Judge Loring came up in the Massachusetts House of Representatives on the 14th by assignment. The amendment of Mr. Ellis was first in order, and that was rejected by a vote of 171 to 136. This amendment was a proviso that if Judge Loring should resign his position of U. S. Commissioner within three days of the passage of the address, then said address would not be presented to the Governor. The main question was then taken by yeas and nays, and the address to the Governor, for the removal of Judge Loring, was adopted by a vote of 307 to 111. "This result," says the Boston Traveller, "having generally been regarded as a foregone conclusion, excites no surprise. The course of the Senate is not quite so clear; but it is hardly to be hoped that this ill judged step will be arrested in that body. The measure is wholly a vindictive one—suggested and perseveringly carried through by party and personal feelings. Reason and justice and sound policy have been sacrificed to misguided impulse.

The Nebraska Legislature, which adjourned on the 16th ultimo, enacted a general system of laws chiefly borrowed from Iowa; provided for an efficient organization of counties; passed a good school law providing for free schools for all; passed a stringent prohibitory liquor law; chartered three universities, incorporated a medical society, and provided for taking a new census the ensuing fall, by the Marshal, from which a new apportionment of representatives is to be made by the Governor.

A dispatch of the 16th from Washington says:

Although some of the members of the Cabinet were at first opposed to taking decided steps against Spain, I have the best authority for saying that the Cabinet were unanimous in approval of the instructions to Commodore McCauley, drawn by the President himself, and which were unmistakably strong.

The French Legation here has intimated that should the United States and Spain engage in hostilities, France would promptly sustain Spain.

DESTRUCTIVE ARCHITECTURE.—The chapel erected in Mount Auburn, Massachusetts, a few years ago, at a cost of $25,000, has been levelled to the ground on account of defects in its construction. The history of this structure, if written out, would be instructive and interesting to all builders.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

The steamship Mexico, Capt Lawless arrived on Saturday last, from Galveston, bringing dates to the 19th, and full files of papers from the interior. The Galveston News of that date has the following paragraphs:

We learn that Capt. G. K. Lewis was shot on Saturday last, the 14th inst., at Corpus Christi, by J. F. Yarrington. The particulars of this catastrophe, so far as we have ascertained, were that Mrs. Yarrington had sued her husband for a divorce, in which subject she was aided by Lewis. Lewis went to Yarrington's house to demand some papers having reference to the matter, when Yarrington, who was armed with a double-barrelled gun, shot him down—Lewis reeled and fell against the house. He died soon after without speaking a word.

Yarrington, in default of bail, was ordered to be committed to jail, and was brought to this city this morning, by the sheriff of Nueces county, for safe confinement, there being no secure prison in Corpus Christi.

We learn that at a fandango, one night last week, on the hill, in Corpus Christi, a row occurred between some Mexicans and Americans, (teamsters and others,) in which three persons were killed, the ruling one sergeant belonging to the army. Several others were so seriously wounded that they died subsequently, making in all, according to our information, nine persons killed in Corpus Christi up last week.

The prospects of large crops appear to be very unpromising in all parts of the State. The News says:

Our accounts from the East, from the West and from all parts of the interior, continue as gloomy and discouraging as ever. We can hear of no rain in any quarter. There is generally a bad stand of corn, and that of cotton is still worse. The largest corn we hear of is only about eight inches high, while much of it is just making its sickly appearance above ground. The people are everywhere greatly disheartened. What will be the consequence of a much longer continuance of this unprecedented drought, it is really painful to contemplate.

From the Central Texian, Grimes county:

Together with the late frosts, the almost uninterrupted drought of more than three months has thrown a gloom over the whole country. All hope for a good crop must soon vanish, unless we have a favorable change of weather. The ground is not sufficiently moist for any seeds to come up, and the growing season is passing away.

From the Nacogdoches Chronicle:

Many of our planters are replanting their corn. Not more than one-fourth of that put in the ground a few weeks since has made a stand. Considerable damage was also done by the frost.

From the Republican, Marshall, Harrison county:

From the 15th of March to the close of the month, we had some of the most severe weather of the season. Many of the planters have had to plant their corn over again, and altogether it is one of the most backward springs we have witnessed. Spring has dawned upon us at last, and in a few days we will be in the region of green leaves and flowers.

From the Leon Pioneer:

The weather still continues dry and cool. We have never seen such weather before in Texas, or anywhere else. Many of the forest trees look as dead and bare of foliage as though it were midwinter instead of the middle of April—the season of leaves and flowers and all the gay green paraphernalia of the queen of spring. The prospect has grown is indeed gloomy, though we do not yet despair. There is no such thing as garden or vegetables in this section as yet. If it does not rain soon the country will be ruined. If the people do not starve, financial wreck and ruin must ensue.

From the Bastrop Advertiser:

The corn crop, we understand, throughout this section of country is looking well, notwithstanding the dry weather during the past two months. The crops that were supposed killed by the recent frost, have pretty much all come out, and are doing better than was anticipated by the planting community. The grass-hoppers, so far, have not done any injury here, and not likely to be as troublesome as in other sections. We learn the country in the neighborhood of Gonzales and San Antonio have suffered materially from these pests, as myriads are collected together, of a gigantic size, doing amount to destroy all crops generally.

The San Antonio Herald gives the following favorable account of the prospects of that town:

But to what quarter of the city we will. We are greeted with the pleasing indications of the prosperity of our citizens. Everywhere are to be seen new buildings or preparations for erecting them. These evidences of industry and thrift, are calculated to lead the casual observer to conclude that the hard times and the scarcity of money, of which we hear so much, only exist in imagination. We venture the assertion, that no city, town or village, in this or any other State, has improved since Fairs, in every particular, than has San Antonio, during the last five years. And what is still more gratifying, this improvement is of a good, substantial and lasting character. The surrounding country is not behind in this spirit of improvement. New farms are being opened in every direction, old ones greatly enlarged and improved, a variety of fruit trees and new pruitners have been improved by foreign importations, mills and residences are erected in fine, everything calculated to advance the interest and promote the prosperity of the country, is in the high "tide of successful experiment." All that is wanting to secure and permanently establish our prosperity, is an improved and more speedy mode of getting the product of the country to market.

The Herald says that Alamo City, which is separated by the river from San Antonio proper, is springing up with unprecedented rapidity.

A sale of city lands at auction a few days ago. One hundred and twenty-four lots were sold, and there was no spirited competition. The Ledger says:

The amount realized by the sale was $20,886. In almost every instance the lots were sold for greatly more than the appraised valuation, and in some instances many times as much. This result proves two things—one is that our citizens are not as much pressed in a pecuniary sense as those of many places in the older states; and the other is, the universal belief of our money holders that this is to be a great place.

IRON ORE.—The Nacogdoches Chronicle, referring to the large quantities of iron ore in the vicinity of Linn Flat and Mount Enterprise, in Rusk county, says of an iron mountain over the latter place:

No estimate can be formed of the number of tons of iron which could be made from the ore found in the mountain. The supply seems inexhaustible, and if a railroad which our State has chartered were to be built into real means of conveyance, the rails here could be made and yet enough remain to build that "not work of railroads" so enthusiastically spoken of by our railroad advocates.

The Central Texian says the town of Anderson, Grimes county, is improving, and many new houses are going up. A project is on foot to erect a Methodist church in Anderson, for which purpose a considerable amount of money has been subscribed.

The Austin State Times, of the 14th, has the following paragraphs:

Gen. A. Sidney Johnston has returned, from a tour to the posts at Belknap, Chadbourn, etc. He has accepted the proffered Colonelcy, and will enter upon the duties when practicable. Its leaves for Washington City in about two weeks. Mr. Wilke has recently returned from the Upper Illanco. At the time he left—some eight days since—all was quiet in that quarter. Near Fredericksburg the Indians are committing depredations. Persons are afraid to travel without guards. Two Indians were killed on the Upper Guadalupe about two weeks past. Two Germans were hunting and discovered the Indians, who were trying to conceal themselves. They concluded the red rascals were after no good; tried to stop them, and failed, and shot them. The Indians were armed with rifles.

Lieut. Givens, U. S. A., has been spending a few days in Austin. He is of the opinion the Camanches will make war upon the frontier. The Indians who committed the depredations near Fort Shadbourne some time since were supposed to belong to the bands of Sasaco and Pahaya-vean. If so, they may have determined upon hostilities.

The Literary Association has resolved to celebrate the anniversary of the victory at San Jacinto by the delivery of orations by Wm. T. Thalmorn and Robt. M. Elgin, Esqrs., at the Presbyterian Church.

The saw mill of Mr. Alfred Smith, situated in the Bastrop pinery, was consumed by fire last Sunday, in addition to the mill 100,000 feet of lumber were burnt.

There are grasshoppers in the vicinity of this place, though not in such numbers as to create alarm.

The San Antonio Ledger-Herald notices the following additional Indian depredations, near that city:

On Thursday week last, thirteen head of valuable horses were driven off from the rancho of Mr. Millstead, about fifteen miles north-west of that place. Messrs Millstead, A. J. Leslie, Edward Oeflagher and others started in pursuit. The last news is that they were on the trail, and expressed a determination to follow till they found them.

A few days before two cows were killed by these marauders on the rancho of Mr. Hernandez, on the Geronimo creek.

In addition to the above, depredations are being committed on the Guado, Sabinal, and other streams, and several conflicts have taken place between the citizens and the Indians.

HOW WOMEN WILL DECEIVE.—Our landlords are getting mighty particular about their tenants, as well as their rents. If a body has half-a-dozen children, and of course more need of a house than if he had none at all, he is very coolly told that he can not have the premises "Have you children, madam?" enquired one of these sharpers, of a lady in coldest black who was looking at one of the houses just finished and in perfect order.

"Yes," said the gentle mother, "I have seven, Sir, but they are all on the church yard." A sigh and the dew of a tear gave impressiveness to the painful remark, and without further parley the bargain was closed. Her little flock were waiting for her in the church yard around the corner, and were delighted to hear that she had found a snug house so speedily. The landlord says he shall never trust a woman in black after this.

LATER FROM EUROPE.—Arrival of the Steamship Nashville—The Associated Press of this city received the following dispatch:

NEW YORK, April 23—The steamship Nashville, which was chartered by the Collins Company to take the place of the Pacific on her last voyage, arrived at this port at noon yesterday—Sunday.

The Nashville left Liverpool on the 7th inst., and consequently brings advices one week later than those by the Arabia, the last arrival at Halifax and Boston. The political intelligence brought by the Nashville is of but little importance there being no change of moment in the position of affairs. The Vienna Conference had adjourned over the holidays. The impression that the war must be continued, gains strength, however, throughout Europe.

SHIPWRECK AND GREAT LOSS OF LIFE.—Letters recently received at Boston from Sydney, state that a vessel, name unknown, has been wrecked on Hampton Shoals and five hundred Chinese and a portion of the crew lost. The captain and eight men only were saved. These made for Cape Ronais in a boat, but on landing were attacked by the natives and five of them were killed, leaving but three survivors out of five hundred and fifty.

A boiler of a cotton mill at Germantown, Pa., exploded on the morning of the 17th, at an early hour shattering the mill and destroying the dry and dye houses adjoining the boiler-house 8 dead, the engineer, was killed. Fortunately, the event took place before the hands had assembled for work, or there might have been a dreadful loss of life.

MISSISSIPPI.—A storm, says the Eastern Clarion, rarely paralleled in violence recently passed over portions of the counties of Newton, Neshoba etc., during the appalling prevalence of which houses were hurled down to the ground by the strong breath of the tempest, trees in multitudes torn up by the roots, gin houses destroyed and fences prostrated in every direction. Fortunately, amid this terrific elemental war, there has been no actual loss of life, although many have been crippled and otherwise mutilated.

Vicksburg and Shreveport Railroad—All who are interested in the prosperity of this city and of the portion of Louisiana through which this road runs, will be pleased to learn that a contract has been entered into with Col Pamelin, who represents a company in Georgia, which will insure its completion at the earliest possible period. Operations will be at once commenced, and it is thought that within five years at furthest the road will be completed. Col. Coleman has resigned his position as President of the road, and accepted that of collector and agent. Did this change of position lessen the interest which Col. Coleman has heretofore taken in this important enterprise or were the change calculated to deprive it of his valuable and efficient services and exertions. It would be generally regretted; we learn, however, that such is not the case—but on the contrary, he will thus be able to render more efficient aid than heretofore.

The Kosciusko Chronicle of the 14th has the following paragraphs:

The proceedings of a meeting of the Directors of the Pantuls Kosciusco, Aberdeen and Tuscumbia Railroad Company, in Algerdeen, on the 5th and 6th instant, will be found in another column. Among the resolutions passed we notice one to adhere to the route surveyed by the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad Company from Canton, via Kosciusko, to Aberdeen; but, unless the citizens of Attala are willing to tax themselves to aid in its construction, the road will undoubtedly be carried through Choctaw county, and made to intersect the Central road at or near Carrollton. One of the Directors of New Orleans has written a letter to a citizen of this county to that effect.

We learn that a son of Mr. J. F. Walker, residing some four miles from this place, aged about six or seven years, died of hydrophobia on last Tuesday night. It appears that the child was bitten by a rabid dog some time last fall.

The Holly Springs Democrat of the 17th says:

A private correspondent writes us from New Orleans that, unless the Great Central Railroad is completed, "our country is ruined, and our city is ruined."

We can assure our friends below, that the railroad is in a course of rapid completion. We are informed by those who now ride in our omnibus, that the cars will be surely running from Lagrange to this place by the 1st of July.

MORE ENGLISH MENACES.—The London Examiner of a late date, indulges a pecuniary English propensity as follows:

But are present circumstances such as to exclude grave apprehension? A band of American filibusters, already upon the seas when the plot was discovered, will have reached their destination, and have landed, before they were warned of the failure of that portion of the enterprise which depended on the Cubans. Anyone landed, it is stated that unfaithful General Concha will lie down upon them and will show them the same scant mercy which was shown to Lopez. The American tiny-tourney will then be provided with a grievance; and if General Pierce should deem the governments and fleets of France and England too deeply engaged in the Black and Baltic seas to think of occupying Cuba, it is quite within reach of possibility that the reply of the Federal Government may be as stern, and the step of making common cause with the discontented colonists by sending a force for re-landing upon General Concha, and perhaps not reducing the island may become sufficiently popular to force itself upon Mr Pierce's not very reluctant cabinet.

The contingency of the Western Allies looking quietly on would not, however, be too hastily assumed. France and England have on a previous occasion spoken frankly at Washington as to what they regarded as slights wantonly invaded; and at that time the Emperor Napoleon observed that the alliance between France and England extended Westward as well as Eastward. And though it would be unfortunate indeed if, in the field that we have so recently conquered, misconception and protest should arise from pulsation, we are to be called upon to perform our part in both hemispheres at once, let not the American Government and the people suffer that its act of aggression would be safe. Meantime the Spanish Cortes, instead of confining their cares to the foundation of the planters who have conspired against them, might do better, we think, so to deal out justice to all subjects of the Spanish crown in Cuba, that it should no longer have to depend for allegiance and defence upon an only one class, and that the least numerous and most selfish.

SINKING OF A BRITISH VESSEL BY A WHALE.—(Probably a Russian Whale)—The London Shipping Gazette of the 20th March publishes the following report of Captain Jones, of the British schooner Waterloo, of Port Glasgow, which was sunk in the North Sea, by a whale:—

The Waterloo sailed from Lynn for Shields (with barley) on the 19th inst., At 6 o'clock the 21st (yesterday) bearing W by N., distant about 50 miles, wind E., strong gale, and high seas, vessel under double-reefed courses, upon a wind, on the port tack, perceived a large whale to windward, coming down for the vessel, partly out of the water, and swimming at a very rapid rate; and, when within fifty yards from the ship's side, dipped and struck the vessel with its head, with a tremendous blow, when the vessel was perceived to heel and crack and after striking the vessel the whale plunged in the deep head-foremost, and rose his tail on high, nearly touching the forevard, and then disappeared.

The pumps were fixed and it worked but by half-past 12, found she had five feet water in the well, and settling down fast, when the long boat was cleared and in a few minutes, and nearly filled off the decks, when all hands (six in number) jumped into her, without food or water, and the master, mate and two men, without jackets, and only one oar, and a piece of another in the boat, with the sea running very high. In about twenty minutes after abandoning the vessel she capsized, and floated for about the same space of time on her side, and then disappeared, head foremost, at about half-past 1 P. M.

At the time she capsized there was a French fishing boat about four miles to windward, and on perceiving her capsize, immediately bore up for the sinking vessel. The boat proved to be No. 22, Capt. Joseph Leclerq, of Calais, which took all the crew on board at about 2 P. M., when they were most kindly treated, and landed at Calais, at midnight, where they were provided for and furnished with jackets by —— Bonham, Esq., H. B. M. Consul, and sent to London.

MOBILE.—We learn from the Mobile Advertiser of Saturday that Mr. Charles McKay and Archie McVicker, mates on the river, were attacked on the previous evening at the Globe House by a number of Irish deck-hands—McVicker defended himself with a revolver, but McKay was so badly stabbed that it was thought he would not recover. One of the assailants had been arrested, and there was a rumor that another had been shot in the upper part of the city.

The Register has the following paragraph:

The arrivals of cotton since the 14th instant, inclusive, amount to 28 016 bales, being the largest receipts for any one week since the 1st September. The season is now far advanced, and summer (in temperature at least) upon us; therefore, we can scarcely hope that the same quantity will arrive within any one week during the remainder of the season. The entire receipts since the 1st of September are 302 358 bales against 464 289 bales for the corresponding period last year, showing a falling off of 161 931 bales

Lieut. Givens, U. S. A., has been spending a few days in Austin. He is of the opinion the Camanches will make war upon the frontier. The Indians who committed the depredations near Fort Shadbourne some time since were supposed to belong to the bands of Sasaco and Pahaya-vean. If so, they may have determined upon hostilities.

THE CAMELS ARE COMING.—It will be recollected that by a resolution of Congress a certain amount was appropriated to enable the Secretary of War to try the experiment of introducing camels on this continent, as beasts of burden and for military purposes. As the Navy Department has been occasion to send stores to our squadron in the Mediterranean, the steamship Supply, now at the New York yard, has been selected for the purpose, and on her return voyage will bring the camels. This vessel will be commanded by Lieut. David D. Porter, of the navy, and will take out Major Wayne, as officer of the Quartermaster's Department of the army, to purchase the camels, and on her homeward voyage will bring them to the United States. The vessel will be prepared with all despatch for sea. There is no doubt that the experiment of introducing camels as beasts of burden, and for military purposes, in the Southwestern part of the country, will prove entirely successful. Their great endurance, their ability to carry large burdens, and the length of time that they are enabled to exist without water, will render them a valuable adjunct to the army in the section of country for which they are intended. [Washington Union.

OUR PRESENT CONDITION FOR WAR.—As it is quite clear that a single move of spirit might at this moment plunge us into hostilities with Spain, it is quite proper that we should examine the condition of the Navy. There can be no question but the Navy Department of the United States is in the same condition as the British Army Department; in other words, that it is beyond description deplorable. The army is better. In fact, it is well organized; was put on a sound footing after the war of 1812 by John C Calhoun while Secretary of War, and has remained in a decent state of efficiency ever since. Whence the successful campaigns in Mexico. If war were to break out it would be found serviceable. Not, as assuredly the Navy Department would be found useless. The ships might do their duty; but the organization at headquarters would be found scrubaord and so inefficient that the gravest disasters would be inevitable. There would be found to exist the same helpless imbecility in superannuated chiefs, the same absurd division of authority, the same confusion in routine which, as it appears, ruined the British army before Sebastopol. Let Mr. Dobbin look to it.—[N. Y. Herald.

EXPEDITION TO THE PLAINS.—Active preparations are making for this expedition, and the troops are put on route as rapidly as possible. Two companies left about the middle of the week, and a much larger force will leave to-day or Monday next. The whole army will be ready to march from Fort Leavenworth before the grass is sufficiently high for forage for the animals attached to the expedition. Something of the extent of the expenditure may be inferred from the fact, that 5,000 barrels of flour, at $12 per bbl., make one of the items of the account of purchases. It is to be put up in sacks, [St. Louis Republican, 14th.

The Washington (Ark.) Telegraph, of the 11th inst., says:

Since our last we have had heavy rains, and learn they were still heavier west of us. Red river up to Monday morning, had risen eleven feet and was still rising. The rise, so far, is altogether out of Little river. We have not heard from the Kiamitia, but as that stream and Little river head near together, we may reasonably expect an additional rise from it. The Sulphur Fork is also reported high, so that we have now some prospect of the speedy opening of navigation in Red river. The Ouachita, at Camden, on Saturday morning, had risen 12 or 15 feet and was rising rapidly. Weather warm and cloudy.

THE UNITED STATES STEAMER WATERWITCH. The Navy Department has received advices from the steamer Waterwitch, Lieut. Comdg. Thomas J. Page, which vessel, on the 6th of February, was at the mouth of the Paraguay river. All were well on her. The Lieut Commanding, in his dispatches, confirms all the facts subjoined in the second sometime since published, of the firing into his ship by Paraguayan forces by which one of his men was wounded and has since died from his wounds. The Late Arrests in Cuba.

OFFICERS OF THE GOVERNMENT AND SECRETARY OF STATE.—The committee appointed in New York to visit Washington and lay before the President all the facts in relation to the arrest of Dr. Peck, in Cuba, returned home on Tuesday evening, and the result of their mission was a meeting of the friends of that gentleman. Mr Ferris, chairman of the committee, reported orally as follows:

The President, with much emphasis, said he was favorably impressed with the tone of our resolutions. While they were firm and decided, they were free from all offensiveness. In reply to our demands, he said we might go home and tell the friends of Dr Peck his case should be attended to at once. He said he would dispatch a special agent at once to Cuba, as we suggested. Said he, "I will immediately, perhaps to-morrow morning, dispatch an agent to Cuba with the instructions that the case requires." While I feel heretofore determined to put down all filibusterism upon our soil, I had also determined there was a point beyond which forbearance should cease to be a virtue."

President Pierce said he did not know what had come over the Island of Cuba, for it appeared to him as if the Spanish authorities were striving to destroy mutual friendship; for we might be assailed and insulted before we would come to the rescue of our citizens and our commerce. The President left us under the impression that the time had now come when we could no longer forbear, and told our arms and cry peace, peace, when there was no peace. (Applause, long and loud.) That the time had at last come when we should say to Spain, thus far and thus no farther. (Applause.) The President in the remarks alluded to the outrages of Cuba, and said they allowed to come up at the same time. He alluded to the case of Thompson, and said he was a man of irreproachable character, and was not at all mixed up with any buccaneering expedition. The Cuban authorities had brought no charge against him except that he had left upon his offering while the crew of arms of his country. The President, in reciting these instances, said we almost deemed the Spanish government mad to heap upon our flag every insult possible.

The committee also visited Secretary Marcy, the result of which Mr. Ferris tune details:

Mr. Marcy told us he was then engaged in writing a letter and making a demand upon the Spanish Minister in Washington in regard to Dr. Peck. Upon his table Mr. Marcy had the correspondence between on Consul at Havana, Mr. Robertson, and Gen. Concha, in regard to Dr. Peck, which he read over to us. As near as I can recollect, the letter to Concha stated the exact cause of Dr. Peck, in regard to his health, his character, and his object in visiting Cuba, precisely as we had it before the President, and demanded to know of the Captain General of Cuba why and upon what charges Dr. Peck was imprisoned. The reply of Concha, after a grand flourish in the Spanish style about Cuba and Spain, etc., said that the government of Spain did not think it incumbent upon her to tell any American citizen why he was imprisoned in a Spanish dungeon. They were upon the same footing with Spanish subjects when they came within the Spanish dominions; and, in reply to the demand of Mr. Robertson in regard to Dr. Peck, the Captain General said he did not feel bound to give any other answer than this: he said that the Spanish government considered the Islands of Cuba was in a state of siege. You may well imagine, said Mr. Ferris, the indignation of our government when it received the advice from General Concha as his reasons for the imprisonment of our friend. Secretary Marcy gave us very encouragement.

The intelligence that Dr. Peck had been released on bail had not reached Washington when these interviews took place.

It is said the arrest was probably made through a mistake, as Dr. Peck's name is nearly similar to that of a filibuster, who was connected with the Lopez party. Such mistakes are not at all agreeable to American citizens.

FURTHER BY THE AFRICA.

THE WAR IN THE CRIMEA.

HALIFAX, April 25.—There is but little additional intelligence by the Africa. We annex such as is of importance.

The Paris Moniteur contains a remarkable official document explanatory of the conduct of the Allies, and exonerating Napoleon from being the planner of the Crimean campaign. The document caused much excitement, and is considered an apology for the raising of the siege of Sebastopol at an early day.

The reported battle at Eupatoria, in which five thousand Russians were said to have been slain, and Omar Pacha killed, proves to have been nothing but a rumor.

Affairs were quiet in Spain.

The mails by the Africa will be due at New York on Thursday night, and probably leave on Friday morning for the South.

Sailing of the America.

BOSTON, April 25.—The steamship America, for Halifax and Liverpool, sailed to-day with 150 passengers and $850,000 in specie.

Election in Kansas.

ST. LOUIS, April 23.—The people of Kansas have issued a proclamation declaring the present Governor incompetent for the office, and ordering the election of a successor.

New York Market.

NEW YORK, April 25.—Middling Uplands Cotton 51-16 to 5½d. Flour also is a trifle lower. The sales to day were only 1 000 bbls at $10 25 to $10 62½ for Ohio. Sales of new Mess Pork at $17 50 per barrel. Lard is unchanged.

WAR PROSPECTS.—The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, who writes over the signature of "Ion," says in two recent letters:

Some rumors of a definite and positive character have lately prevailed here in regard to conferences or correspondence between our Government and the British and French ministers here, whereby additional evidence was afforded of the supposition that England and France have combined for interference in our affairs in this hemisphere.

It is now, in further proof of the same supposition, stated that the French Minister has notified our Government that, in the case of war between the United States and Spain, in any attempt by the United States to seize Cuba, the Government of France will take part in defence of the rights of Spain. I see no reason to doubt the absolute truth of this statement. It confirms with the intimations and declarations which were thrown out in the debate towards the close of the late session, by Observer Cass and Mr. Mason. It is also well known that our foreign representatives no doubt that both France and England will interpose to protect Cuba from our grasp. Mr. Marcy's correspondence, already published, shows this. The fact was also known to the Administration that preceded the present one.

In the face of this information or warning from the French Government, some steps, supposed to be of a hostile tendency, have been taken by our Government in regard to Cuba. The Administration proceeds with their eyes open to all the consequences of an attempt, at this time, to provoke a war here. Cuba. Therefore it is inconceivable that the President has been persuaded to approve of such instructions to Com. McCau

BOHEMIA IN PARIS.

——, then, we may leave him, to introduce to the reader that charming yet repulsive, that gay yet frightful world, called Bohemia. It is a country which is bordered to the north and to the south, to the east and to the west, by necessity, and is situated under all the latitudes of hope. A man may be both a poet, a painter, a sculptor, a journalist, or a philosopher, but he becomes a Bohemian. It is the transition land which leads to the Institute or to a Hospital, according to circumstances.

Rodolphe in this delightful region never breakfasted and very seldom dined. He lived a little everywhere, with such-and-such-a-one, but very rarely at home. The bourgeois is held by him in horror; as to the proprietor, he is utterly ignorant. Indefatigable and inexorable creditors are ever in pursuit of the Bohemian, but blood knows as well as he how to dazzle their ferret-eyes with oceans of inheritances, avalanches of bank notes, and cataracts of California gold.

A Bohemian is always a member of a club; but his club is composed of some five or six of his own class, and they meet at a remote and unknown café. Yet, when young ladies hear them speaking youth say: "Are you going to the club?" they look with admiration at gallant youth, to rich fifty louis at least at their club.

A Bohemian always numbers among his intimate friends the Countess of Manfrigneuse, the Marchioness de Listomere, and other imaginary titled personages. In summer he is always chatting at Vichy-le-Gerosse, Bougival-sur-Mer, Asnières de Bigorre, or Montmartre de Lochon, just as some cockneys go to the seaside at Ramsgate, the Highlands of Highgate, and the Alps of Primrose.

One Bohemian will tell you he has wounded Rastignac in a duel with swords; another that he has you a hundred louis from Lapalisfrine; names from the last novel by de Balzac. The Bohemian deals in it that of his equal, and with that he is liberal enough. Vaudevilles collect his witticisms, which the public will persist in attributing to Prince Talleyrand.

One evening a notary's clerk presented himself suddenly in the midst of seven Bohemians, and announced that one of them had inherited the sum of 50,000 francs. The news was received with a hurrah, which still vibrates in the ancient domicil. The clerk has been dear ever since.

A council was immediately called to discuss how this mythological sum might be expended. One proposed to give a feast to the French people, after the fashion of the great patricians of Rome. This proposal fell to the ground, however, from the insufficiency of the plate belonging to the club. Another suggested the purchase of a principality in Arcadia, and the suggestion was just about to be seriously discussed, when a voice exclaimed: "A trip to Italy!"

"Ah!" shouted out the whole seven, like the companions of Æneas.

Eight days afterward, the seven saluted with their songs and their sonnets the country of Petrarch and son of the lazzaroni. For three months such a fast life was led that, one fine day, not a sou remained of the 50,000 francs which were dumped at first to be inexhaustible. The Bohemians were obliged to separate; seven hungry mouths could not travel together without danger of bringing a famine upon the population. A solemn rendezvous was appointed for, that day six week at the club, where each was to relate his adventures.

Of these seven Odyssæ of youth and thoughtlessness, the story of one only is told, because he is no longer in existence. This hero had remained in a hotel in Naples, living one day on a great coat, the next on a pair of pants. Ideas came to him.

One morning the landlord, who saw that the whole gentlemen must, at this rate, very soon vanish, appeared before his guest, and said to him: "Here are a hundred francs, go back to France; you can remit me the money when you get to Paris."

The young Bohemian, who was a painter, would not accept the money so liberally offered to him till he had legitimately earned it. The landlord had a wife and two daughters; the Bohemian immortalized the whole family on canvas, and included a scullion into the bargain. This accomplished, he took his way to the steamboat, accompanied by his landlord, now loth to lose him. Happy youth! the charm that it spreads around is so great that it melts the hearts of Neapolitan landlords.

On the packet our Bohemian met a handsome young Venetian, to whom he did not dare to speak as he appeared in search of a lady, such a noble countenance! Nevertheless, he picked up courage gradually, and introduced himself to the proud beauty as a young gentleman traveling for his health, who had unfortunately left his purse in the crater of Vesuvius.

The trait took, and the passage to Marseilles was delightful. But bad luck would have it, the horrible Custom-house officers began to examine the luggage. Our Bohemian friend tried to steal off, but he was kept back, his keys were forced from him, and his box opened. It contained three paving stones!

General perforation of the passengers!

The trunk of the beautiful traveler was next opened. Oh, happiness! it contained nothing but straw! The great lady is herself nothing but a Bohemian! delicious mistake! exquisite discovery!

They started together for Paris, and lived there happily, for an eternity of fifteen days.

The Bohemian is not always a being deprived of all means or resources; there are individuals who continue to be Bohemians when they have an income, and even a social position. Balzac, for example, was Bohemian by nature. No one paid his debts better than he when he was in funds, but at the same time few persons incurred such strange debts. A friend met him at Ville d'Avray, and invited him to breakfast at the restaurant de la Ville.

"I am on loggerheads with the establishment," answered Balzac.

"Why so?"

"Because I am in debt to it for eight hundred francs of cotelettes."

At the time when Balzac lived in the Rue de Cluchet, some twenty years ago, two young men called upon him in the evening. The author of La Comedie Humaine had sometimes the caprice of a woman of thirty. He had had his furniture lined with white satin, and drapery to match, an immense luxury in the Pompadour style suspended from the ceiling. The great man called the attention of his visitors to the tasteful but extravagant display, requesting them at the same time not to sit too roughly on the chairs and sofas!

"The dance will pay for this white satin!" muttered De Balzac, half aloud.

"A superb satin, truly," observed the visitors.

"Who will pay for it? who will pay for it?" persisted the romancer.

"But," interrupted one of the friends, "it is difficult for us to judge of the splendor of your saloon, if you show it up by the light of a single candle. Let us light the lustre, and see the effect which your satin has under a brilliant light."

"Adopted," said Balzac.

And the forty candles were lighted, Balzac still murmuring between his teeth: "who the deuce will pay for my satin!"

At this moment some one knocked at the door. "Monsieur K——, the publisher," says the servant, "wishes to speak to Monsieur."

"A publisher!" exclaimed Balzac, "and forty candles burning away! my satin is paid for. Let the paymaster come in. As to you," he said, turning toward the young men, "you may lie upon the sofas, and don't even consider where you put your boots."

The publisher was introduced, almost blinded by the light. Balzac was walking up and down with a careless air, like a mussulman accustomed to [illegible] in the midst of a Babylonian luxury. [illegible] the publisher what he wanted.

"A sonnet from your pen," replied the [illegible].

"[illegible]," exclaimed Balzac, "I am [illegible] weary, but—," and he ordered the publisher to call again in [illegible] to settle the matter.

"At least a pound of candles to my [illegible]," said Balzac, the moment the [illegible] had turned his back. "That fellow must think that I burn forty candles every [illegible]. Now, you Vaux, you can set in decided [illegible] of saying a person who burns forty [illegible] is an evening as one would pay A writer [illegible] by lamplight. Put out the lustre [illegible] paid for."

In certain moments of deep despondency, Balzac would talk about turning grocer. "This miserable age," he would say, "has a turn for grocery, why should I not be a grocer? Mirbeau was once a clothier. A handsome shop in the boulevard, an inscription in gold letters: Balzac et Cie., Epiceries en gros et en détail. At the bottom of the shop, disguised as lady of the counter, Madame Sand, with a white rose in her hair. Near the door, Theophile Gauthier, in the costume of a neophyte grinding coffee in a patent mill. Gerard de Nerval weighing out brown sugar; and I, myself, Balzac, in a bourgeron and foil cap, overlooking the establishment with the eye of a master. Surely here are a thousand guaranteees of success, or I know nothing about it."

This grand idea fell to the ground, however, like a castle of cards. Balzac could not get his friends to join him. "To be a grocer's boy," he would growl, "a man must have his hair dressed à la Titus, and that toad of a Theophile Gauthier has the weakness to stick to his hair!"

One fine morning a young literary man was passing along the Rue Richelieu, when he met Balzac walking arm and arm with another person. After saluting him, he stopped to speak a moment with the great man. "Prince," said the author of La Comedie Humaine, turning toward the person who was with him, "Allow me to introduce you to M. ——, Secretary of Embassy."

The person most astonished at this title was our young man, but he went away without saying a word. Some days afterward, meeting Balzac, he inquired: "Why did you make me a Secretary of Embassy the other day?"

"Parbleu! perfectly."

"Well," said the romancer, "I was unlucky that day; but I will be more careful with my acquaintances another time."

Alexander Dumas is one of the most illustrious member of the literary Bohemia. Every one knows with what facility the great romancer earns his money, and with rapidity he spends it. All he has belongs to his friends, and he has fifty thousand friends.

At Monte Christo he kept open table; whoever arrived at breakfast or at dinner time found a place ready for him. One day Alphonse Karr, seeing an unknown face, inquired of the Amphytrion his name.

"I don't know him; he must be a friend of my son."

Karr shortly afterward asked the same question of M. Dumas' son.

"I do not know who he is," replied the latter, "he must be one of my father's friends."

One fine morning a bootmaker arrived at Monte Christo to ask payment of a bill which had been run up to three hundred francs.

"I have no money to-day," said M. Dumas.

"No money!" replied the bourgeois, "that is soon said; but I lose my time running to and fro."

"True," said M. Dumas, "here are ten francs to indemnify you for your expenses; and let it be understood that these ten francs do not count in the hundred crowns that I owe you."

The creditor withdrew, satisfied for the time being; but made his appearance again in three days. M. Dumas gave him ten francs more to quiet him. By the time three months had elapsed, M. Alexandre Dumas had paid, in sums of ten francs, his three hundred francs to the bootmaker, but he still owed him the hundred crowns.

Collinet, maître d'hotel to the pavilion of Henry IV, relates the following anecdote to whoever will listen to it:

"You must know, sir, that last summer, no one could obtain ice at St. Germain; every one was obliged to drink warm water. I alone had a good stock of ice; but I kept it for the use of my establishment. I only parted with it to one person, my neighbor of Monte Christo, M. Alexandre Dumas. One day a servant I had never seen before came and asked for twenty pounds of ice. 'Whom do you come from?' said I. 'From M. Alexandre Dumas.' I was going to give him the ice, when the stupid fellow presented me with ten francs. 'What!' I said, 'do you bring me money, and say you come from M. Alexandre Dumas?'

"The servant, astonished at the suddenness of the question, hesitated, and ended by acknowledging that he came from a thirsty citizen, who was determined to get some ice, no matter at what price, even at the expense of an impusture. I sent him away, bidding him tell his master that when a person was so audacious as to assume name of a great man, he ought also to be better acquainted with his habits."

One of the most distinguished Bohemians was C——, who fell in the battle-field of misery. Living in a garret of the Rue de Provence, he still appeared on the bitumen of the boulevards in a reprochless costume. The lustre of his boots was so perfect, that one could see one's self reflected in them as in M. de Lamartine's lake. C—— had at his residence a complete costume of a groom. When offering an attention to one of the fair sex, he used to say: "Permit me to send you a bouquet by my black servant."

He then repaired to his garret, took out his blacking bottle, polished his face and hands, put on his livery, and knocked at the lady's door: "Here," he said, "are some flowers sent by my master to Madame." He had spent the last five francs in the purchase. Madame was so delighted with the present that she presented a louis to the bearer. C—— was thus reduced to the necessity of earning fifteen francs by his civility.

Within the last few years there have been established near the barrieres, upon the heights of the Rue de Martyn and Rue Rochechuart, great estaminets, compared with which the cafés of the olden times are as the diligence is to the railroad carriage. In these establishments, where the northern Bacchus pours out floods of champagne, twelve or fifteen hundred consumers may be seen together at a certain hour of the day. Every one smokes—men and women. The young Bohemians of painting and sculture frequent these noisy tabernacles with their epouses. They are known by their long, unbombed hair, and their pallid rouè looks. The ladies have the jargon of the study at their tongues' ends, and indulge in artistic puns and repartees. The race of filles modeles is generally of Jewish origin. They are importunate and greedy; and when there is no rosbif, they put up with charcuterie.

There are also political Bohemians. Like their allies, painters and artists, they never dine; they dance attendance at a great man's supper, and fill themselves with sandwiches. Ask such a man what he thinks of Odilon Barrot: "He wants pates de foie gras," will be the answer. Ask the political Bohemian to settle an account. "In six months M. Thiers will be Minister, and then I will pay you," is his ready reply.

A young painter without the capital necessary to pay for his canvas is a Bohemian. The poet obliged to barter an epitaph for an apothecary for ten francs is a Bohemian. An author who pesters successively ten different editors to get an article inserted which nobody will read is decidedly a Bohemian. A doctor without patients; a barrister without briefs; a solicitor without practice; an actor without a rôle—are all Bohemians.

It has been supposed that all poets, all artists, all literary men, must inevitably begin the world by the more or less prolonged residence in the hotels of Bohemia, renowned for empty fireplaces, unfurnished beds and fabulous dinners. Beranger has done much to induce the public to believe that a cold, damp garret, with Lisette's best dress hung up at the widow as a curtain, is essential to poetic inspiration. But Beranger himself never tried it. So it is, also, with most of the great men of the day. Lamartine had, and still has a patrimonial fortune. Victor Hugo only left his mother's house to be married. Alfred de Vigny was a captain of infantry before he became a literary man. Alfred de Musset has an independence. Eugene Delacroix inherited a goodly property. Jules Janin gave lessons in Latin and Greek before he made a fortune by his pen. Scribe, the man of all others who least wanted extraneous aid, began writing vaudevilles with an income of six thousand francs. Chateaubriand, who delights in dwelling upon the poverty of his young days, when he could always command a hundred louis when he wanted a hundred francs.

It is not that independence is essential to the cultivation of literature, but he is much to be pitied who ventures upon so thorny a path with no other stick to guide him than his courage. He will almost inevitably halt exhausted half way. Hence the Bohemian is always young. A Bohemian with gray hair would run the chance of being mistaken for one of the ewell mob. How many fashionable young men who have not a farthing of income, but whose waistcoats are tip-top, who frequent the best restaurants, patronize the most expensive tailors, and even cast the best fortunes in the shade by the luxury of their equipage and their appointments, disappear like falling stars!

Any individual who walks by himself, who dines at the most expensive restaurants, who has always a dozen louis in his waistcoat pocket, yet, who has no fortune and no profession, is now-a-days inevitably set down by the public as a Bohemian.

Any one frequenting society, having dogs' heads in his waistcoats, hallol girls on his chemise, boars on his buttons, or bottle-stoppers on his neckcloth, and calling himself Major Shilling, or Col. Palmer, is set down as a Bohemian.

Any one decorated with fabulous orders of the Elephant, the Facon, the Fox, or the Golden Spur, is set down as a Bohemian.

All the "Arthurs" of Paris, or those known to the fair sex as such, are Bohemians.

Bohemia is, finally, the first step to immmortality, or the ante-chamber to a hospital.

SINGING SOLDIERS.—We visited the encampment of some Moldavian soldiers, and some Russians from Bucharest. We heard excellent music from the Moldavian band, opera overtures and airs, and in the Russian camp heard something peculiar to the army performed by a large group of musical soldiers, arranged in a circle around one who acted as their leader, and to whose solos they formed a strong and harmonious chorus, drums being the only orchestral accompaniment, which gave the whole a decidedly military character. The singing soldiers of a regiment on the march are placed in advance. I saw and heard several similar bands, whose music was very inspiring. I am told, when on the march, they animate each other by singing their national anthems. After singing we had dancing, accompanied by the violin, tambourine and two drums. Both music and dancing had our prevailing Ethiopian characteristics. [Correspondence Providence Journal.

GREAT FISHING—A New Kind of Bait.—The Burlington Free Press relates a new and unique mode of fishing which has been successfully tried in a trout stream of northern Vermont, and which we take pleasure in recommending to the attention of all long-nosed disciples of the famous Walton. The discovery was made a few days since by a wood chopper in Hyde Park. Being thirsty with labor, he chopped a hole in the ice of a mountain stream, and laid himself down to drink. While imbibing the refreshing fluid, his nose was suddenly and unexpectedly seized by a hungry leviathan of the brook, who buried his teeth deeply in the rosy protuberance, which he evidently thought was a savory morsel. The astonished wood-cutter, whose alarm endowed him with superhuman strength, threw up his head with a jerk, and pulled out upon the ice a splendid trout, which weighed two and a half pounds! The editor of the Free Press has talked with a man who saw the lacerated and swollen nose, and vouches for the authenticity of the story.

WANTED—An Angel for Heaven.—And so Death closed those little eyes—shrouded their bright glances. Oh! that the sun would not come streaming in on that shrouded form, as it there were no grief in the world.

How sweetly he sleeps, that little coveted angel! How lightly curl the glossy ringlets on his white forehead! You could weep your very soul away to think those cherub lips will never, never unclose. Calmly you clasp and unclasp that passive, darling hand that has wandered so often over your cheek. Calmly your anguished glance strives to rend the dim story of love in those faded orbs. The voice, sweet as winds blowing through wrenthed shells, slumbers for ever. And still the busy world knocks at your door, and will let you have no peace. It shouts in your ear; its chariote rumble by; it smiles broadly in your care-worn face; it mocks you at the coffin, at the grave, and its heavy footsteps tramp up and down in the empty rooms from whence you have borne your dead. But it comes never in the hush of night, so wipe away your tears!

Wanted—an angel for Heaven! Can you look up? Can you bear the splendor of that sight? Ten thousand celestial beings, and your own radiant child in their midst.

Wanted—angels for Heaven! Cling not too closely to your beautiful treasures, children of Earth!

A MONEL FRIGATE.—The New York Dutchman is responsible for the following:

Dave Conetablo says there is one advantage about old fashioned frigates. They drag so much dead water behind, that if a man falls overboard on Monday, you need not stop till Friday to pick him up again. He never gets beyond a few yards from the stern-post. In confirmation of this opinion, he refers to a well known anecdote connected with Capt. Pompous, of the frigate "Wash-Tub." One evening while running up the Mediterranean under a one-horse breeze, Pompous came on deck just before sundown, and entered into the following conversation with Mr. Smile, the first lieutenant:

"I heard a little noise on deck just now, Mr. Smile, what was the cause of it?"

"A man fell from the fore-yard."

Without saying another word, Capt. Pompous entered the cabin, and was not seen again until the next day morning after breakfast, when he once more refreshed the deck with his presence, and again entered into conversation with the first lieutenant.

"I think you told me, Mr. Smile, that a man fell overboard from the fore-yard last evening."

"I did, sir."

"Have you picked him up yet?"

"No, sir."

"Well, you had better do it some time during the morning, or the poor devil will begin to starve."

The lieutenant obeyed orders, lowered a boat about noon, and found the gentleman who disappeared from the fore-yard but 18 inches farther astern than he was 14 hours before. He lying on his back fast asleep.

LOUISIANA ITEMS.—The Shreveport Gazette says:

Balls "the Bee Hunter and Pilot of the Lake," came down on Wednesday last, whose appearance is a sure indication that a rise is not far behind him. He informs us that sixty miles above this point the river rose six feet and seven inches, from Saturday at 12 o'clock to Tuesday morning. He also informs us that Sulphur is at the top of, or running over the banks, we forget which, and that the river is bound to go up "like a shot."

In the Farmerville Enquirer we find the following paragraph:

The Bayous D'Arbone is rising, and we would advise planters to ship their cotton by the keel boats as it seems that steamboats have deserted us. There are now lying at the Farmerville Warehouse four fifteen hundred to two thousand bales of cotton awaiting transportation, besides more than the like number at the other different landings on the bayou.

The Piaquemine Sentinel complains of hard times and low water in Bayou Grosse Tete but expresses the belief that by the time another crop is made the railroad now in progress of construction between the Bayou and the Mississippi will afford a better means of transportation.

The Franklin Planter of the 19th says:

Poor as the young cane of St Mary looks, it is infinitely superior to any we have seen between this parish and New Orleans. In many places it would be difficult to tell that cane had been planted, were it not that here and there green patches show that the plant is endeavoring to raise its head above ground. As to rattoons, no one calculates upon them this year.

The Concordia Intelligencer of the 20th has the following:

We are informed that a town is about being laid out at Cross Bayou, at the solicitation of many persons who wish to locate there. The proprietor of the land has employed a competent surveyor to lay it out and furnish a plan, so that purchasers of lots can be suited in price according to location. This place is built way between Vidalia and Trinity, and a fine stand for a good hotel.

Besides this, Wild Cow Bayou, near Tensley's Post office, has a claim for a new city; also, Hynes Ridge, Fletcher's, at the mouth of Cocodrie, De Lilloe's, at the mouth of Black River, Monterey, and several other prominent localities.

The steam frigate Merrimac, in the course of construction at the Boston navy-yard, will be ready for launching it is believed, in July. She is thus described by the Boston Advertiser:

"Her frame is substantially built of live oak, a material superior to any other known in ship-building, and which we alone of all maritime nations possess, and her fastenings are enormous. Her capacity is equal to that of the largest three-decksers in other services—equal or superior to that of the 'Duke of Wellington,' the flagship of Admiral Napier. She was built by Mr Delano, from a draft accepted by the Bureau of Construction, offered as we believe by Mr Peck, late naval constructor at this station. She will carry fifty guns of large caliber when ready for sea. We advise all who are curious in such matters to inspect this noble ship while she is still on the stocks."

Adventure with a Serpent on the River Amazon.

At an early dawn our travelers, who had passed the night in the cabin of the balza (boat) prepared to move on their journey. Guapo untied the cable and drew the end on board. The balza began to move, slowly at first, for the current under the bushes was very slight. All at once the attention of the voyagers was called to the strange conduct of the pet monkey. That little creature was running to and fro, first upon the roof of the taldo, then down again, all the while uttering the most piercing shrieks, as it something was biting off its tail. It was observed to look upward to the branch of the zamang, as if the object it dreaded was in that quarter. The eyes of all were suddenly bent in the same direction. What was their horror on beholding, stretched along the branch, the hideous body of an enormous serpent! Only a part of it could be seen; the hinder half and the tail were hidden among the bromelias and vines that in huge masses clustered around the trunk of the zamang, and the head was among the leaflets of the mimosa; but what they saw was enough to convince them that it was a snake of the largest size—the great "water boa"—the terrible anaconda!

The part of the body in sight was full as thick as a man's thigh, and covered with black spots or botchee, upon a ground of dingy yellow. It was seen to glisten as the animal moved; for the latter was in motion, crawling along the branch outward! The next moment its head appeared from the pendulous leaves, and its long, forking tongue, protruding several inches from its mouth, seemed to feel the air in front of it. His tongue kept playing backward and forward, and its viscid covering glittered under the sunbeam, adding to the hideous appearance of the snake.

To escape from passing within its reach would be impossible. The balza was gliding directly under it. It could launch itself aboard at will; it could seize upon any one of the party without coming from the branch; it could coil its body around them with the contracting power of its muscles. It could do all this; for it had crushed before now the tapir, the roebuck, and even the jaguar himself. All on board the boat knew its dangerous power too well; and of course terror was visible in every countenance.

Don Pablo seized the axe, and Guapo laid hold of his machete (large bowie knife). Donna Isidor, Leon and little Leona were standing (fortunately they were) by the door of the tallo; and, in obedience to the orles and hurried gestures of Don Pablo and the Indian, they rushed in and flung themselves down. They had scarcely disappeared inside, when the forward part of the balza, upon which stood Don Pablo and Guapo, came close to the branch, and the head of the serpent on a level with their own. Both aimed their blows almost at the same instant; but their footing was unsteady, and the boa drew back at the moment, and both missed their aim. The next moment the current had carried them out of reach, and they had no opportunity to strike a second blow.

The moment they had passed, the hideous head again dropped down, and hung directly over, as if waiting. It was a moment of intense anxiety to Don Pablo. His wife and children! Would it select one for its victim and leave the others, or——

He had but little time for reflection. Already the head of the snake was within three feet of the taldo door. Its eyes were glaring; it was about to dart down. "Oh God! have mercy!" exclaimed Don Pablo, falling on his knees. "Oh God!"

At that moment a loud scream was heard. It came from the taldo, and at the same instant the monkey was seen leaping out from the door. Along with the rest it had taken shelter within; but just as the head of the snake came in sight, a fresh panic seemed to seize upon it, and, as if under the influence of fascination, it leaped screaming in the direction of the terrible object. It was met half-way. The wide jaws closed upon it, its shrieks were stifled, and the next moment its silken body, along with the head of the aneconda, disappeared among the leaves of the mimosa. Another moment passed, the balza swept clear of the branch, and floated triumphantly into the open water.

Don Pablo sprang to his feet, ran into the taldo, and, after embracing his wife and children, knelt down and offered thanks to God for their most miraculous deliverance.

Later from Texas.

By the arrival Tuesday afternoon of the steamship Louisiana, Capt. Talbot, we have Galveston papers to the 21st. The News of that date has the following paragraphs:

Maj. Bowman, of the United States Corps of Engineers arrived here by the New Orleans steamer last night, and will proceed immediately to select the site for the new custom-house. We understand he will return again to New Orleans by the steamer to-morrow.

We find that our information as published in our last, in regard to the number of persons killed in Corpus Christi was incorrect.

The Nueces Valley says that a soldier named McNeil, and a Mexican named Ortega, who were wounded in the affray at the fandango on the night of the 7th inst., have since died. We are informed by the sheriff of Nueces county, that another of the wounded, not reported in the Valley, had died also; and it was rumored that a fourth had died, but of this he had no reliable information. Some twelve or fifteen shots were fired, and four persons were wounded. The origin of the affray is unknown.

On Friday night, the 13th inst., a man named Foster was killed by a Mexican. They had quarrelled and had a fist fight some days prious. Foster fired a pistol at the Mexican, who immediately rushed on Foster and killed him with a knife. The Mexican fled, but there were intimations thrown out that he had been captured by Foster's friends and killed.

On Saturday last the body of a man named Davis, was picked up on the beach at Corpus Christi, with such marks of violence upon it, as to leave little doubt that he had been killed. This, including Captain Lewis, makes six cases of killing to about one week, at Corpus Christi.

The Columbia Democrat says business is improving in Columbia, and wagons are coming in freely with produce.

The Know-Nothings, it is said, were organizing in Columbia.

We learn from the Advertiser that a saw mill, about six miles from Bastrop, together with about, $2500 worth of lumber, was destroyed by fire, on the 8th inst.

The Matagorda Chronicle of the Times, states that Mr James, overseer for Dr. J. W. Brown, on Old Caney, was killed on the 5th inst, by the accidental discharge of a gun.

A public meeting has been held in Brenham, for the purpose of rendering assistance in removing obstructions in the navigation of the Brazos river. The Enquirer says books of subscription were opened and several gentlemen promptly came forward and made liberal donations to so laudable an enterprise.

The Goliad True American says:

William R. Moore shot a man by the name of Ward, on the 9th inst., some two or twelve miles west of this place, on the San Antonio river. Moore, as we are informed, concealed himself in his cabin, and as Mr. Ward rode by on his horse, shot him. The cause of this sad occurrence we know nothing about. Moore made his escape, but the Sheriff is in pursuit of, and will no doubt overtake him before going very far.

The Brazoria Planters' Banner says:

From all parts of the country reports come to us of the excessive dry and cool spring. Here there has been no rain of consequence for two months or more, and there is but little prospect of a shower soon. The spring has also been much colder than usual. As a result of this, vegetation is very backward. It is not so far advanced as it usually is by the middle of March, and the prospect now for a good crop is very poor. Our supply of cistern water is getting very low. Unless we have rain soon, we fear that the present year will be a very unfortunate one, and one long to be remembered by our planting community.

Mississippi.—The Jackson Mississippian says of the Canton, Kosciusko, Aberdeen and Tuscumbia Railroad Company:

We observe that the President and Directors of this road have held a meeting, and determined on carrying out the original design of the Company. It will be remembered that in the late decision of the High Court against the validity of the transfer of the stock from this road to the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Road, it was held that the old Company was still in existence and capable of enforcing collection. This move will therefore head those who were disposed to avail themselves of the decision to avoid paying their subscriptions. The Directors decided to bring suit in the name of the Canton, Kosciusko, Aberdeen and Tuscumbia Railroad Company against all delinquent subscribers without delay, and resolved to adhere to the route surveyed by the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad Company from Canton via Kosciusko to Aberdeen. The Directors, as their names appear in the published proceedings of their meeting on the 5th, are Stephen Cocke, President; B M Bradford, James D. Tatum, S. H. Buckingham, Locke E. Houston, G. W Harlow, H. B. Comfort, S Burbank, R S Gladney, Sterling N. Palne.

We learn from the Memphis Whig that the track laying on the Mississippi Central Railroad is progressing finely, from the junction of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad towards Holly Springs. It is expected that the cars will be running into that place by the first of August next.

The Jackson Mercury says:

We learn that to some portions of the eastern counties it is almost impossible to obtain corn at any price, in consequence of the drouth last season. But a larger quantity of this American staff of life will be planted this year in Mississippi than ever before.

FORTIFICATIONS OF THE CLYDE.—Late English papers state that the Clyde fortifications are all ordered to be put in an efficient state of defence. The old fort, about two miles from Greenock is to be placed in serviceable condition, and made ready to receive a battery of guns on the Lancaster principle.

DANIEL WEBSTER'S ANCESTORS.—A year or two ago there was some controversy in the newspapers concerning the ancestry of the late Daniel Webster. The question is now settled. Recent researches in England—the results of which appear in the April number of the New England Historical and Genealogical Register—prove that he was descended from Thomas Webster, of Ormsby, in Norfolk, England, who died at that place in 1654. Ormsby is a small town of less than one thousand inhabitants, situated not far from Norwich, and about one hundred and twenty-five miles northeast of London and near the coast of the North sea.

Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would, however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, for them, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, as a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church, at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Wafer Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and make well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and not liable to get out their durability, in short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be. A. H. MCLEAN, Rutherford county, Tenn.

Having commenced a COMMISSION BUSINESS in this city, to be conducted under the above style, we take the liberty of offering you our services, and respectfully soliciting your patronage.

We receive all consignments and remittances addressed to the house of A. J. WRIGHT & Co. during their temporary suspension. It is expected that the liabilities of that house will be met soon, of which with subsequent arrangements, due notice will be given.

Our charges will be such as are customary with other respectable houses.

We give you the assurance that all funds, or proceeds of produce entrusted to us, shall be held strictly sacred to the object for which they are sent. As the contrary practice has been productive of great injury both to planters and merchants, there will be no deviation from this rule.

FELLOWSHIP WITH THE DEAD.

HEBREWS, XII, 1.

(Translated from the German of Threemin.)

There is fellowship between us and the happy dead. They indeed walk in the light and we in the twilight; they by sight, we by faith; they without temptation from within or from without, we with many erring, stumbling steps; they in cloudless joy, we in ever unsatisfied longings, often in profound sorrow. Imagine, if you please, that their dwelling place is separated from ours by the measureless paths of suns and systems, and still I say that we stand in connection with them. For one and the same Lord rules over them and over us. "For to this end Christ both died and rose and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living"—that is, the inhabitants of heaven and earth. In that same Lord who governs us and them, whom we equally love and adore, from whom we both receive every good gift, we feel ourselves united also with them. His kingdom is immeasurably great; to them are assigned the higher, to us the lower; to them the ever serene and cloudless, to us the dark and stormy regions of his kingdom. But with that mighty hand which he stretches out through immensity, he holds and binds together the remotest parts. To his omnipresence the distances of space disappear, and as he is "with us always, even unto the end of the world," so those who inhabit the farthest bounds of creation are near us in him.

In this kingdom, moreover, love reigns, and this is everywhere the true bond of fellowship. We loved the dear departed—the father, the companion, the brother, the child. They loved us in return; and this mutual love was a cheering light, a genial warmth to us in this dark and gloomy earthvale. We have seen how in them even approaching death had no power over this love; how, even when touched by its cold hand, they still turned their eyes towards us in tender affection, and blessed us; and when we stood around their dying-bed in deepest anguish, and looked down into their graves with riven hearts, when neither by day nor by night the heart's sigh was silent, was not this, too, love? And can we for a moment believe that love is weaker in them than in us? that they who behold God, who is love itself, who drink directly from the fountain whose water floweth to us in little rivulets, that they feel less affection for us than we for them? Surely the love which flows down from heaven to earth is mightier than that which rises from earth to heaven. Their love for us is stronger than ours for them. If they excelled us in this virtue here below, how much more do they there above? There, where in the beams of the eternal sun, fanned by the airs of heaven, all that is good has a more rapid and thrifty growth, their love has also increased, has become more like that infinite, ineffable love which filled the heart of our Heavenly Father and Divine Redeemer towards us.

But do they not find objects there more worthy of their love than we are? And when they see God, the supremely good—when they lie at the feet of the Redeemer in raptures of gratitude—when they become acquainted with the hosts of his elect, each one of whom, in his own manner, reflects the perfection of his Lord—when they find there the earlier departed, who were mourned by them when they still lived on earth, will they not then forget us? No, they forget us not! For in true love there is a wonderful fullness of power, and it is not weakened by the number of objects which it takes to its embrace. Do husbands and wives love each other less as the family circle increases, or is the younger child less beloved by the father and mother because they also love the elder ones? So our dear departed friends remain attached to us with undiminished love, although they have found far worthier objects of their love. Great tenderness towards us poor, wretched inhabitants of the dust is not without example in heaven. Amid all the joy which our Lord had in the hosts of his holy angels, he looked down with love upon us, and did for us what he has done for no angel—died to redeem us. It is, then, an old custom in heaven to love us; a custom which our beloved dead will surely follow.

But do the dear departed know how it fares with us? We know as much respecting them, thanks to Him who has rent asunder the veil of the invisible sanctuary, as we could desire or understand. It is a glorious history that begins at death! Amidst the terrors of death their souls heard the voice of the Lord; and while we were wailing around their bodies, stiffening in the chills of death, their spirits passed into the mansions above. They appeared in the presence of God, not without sin, but with firm faith, and with great love to him. He said to them, "Thy faith hath saved thee; thou hast loved much, much shall be forgiven thee; enter into the joy of thy Lord." And they have entered in. There the Lord himself has wiped away from their glorified eyes the tears which they may have shed over their earthly sufferings or over us; and they have been filled with joy which no pain, no temptation, no sin can any more trouble, and with a rapture which no language, not even theirs, can express. They behold the Lord; they praise and magnify him; they are one with him by love, and with the countless multitudes who love him. This we know, and this is enough; for they are not subject to those changes by which our life is often rendered so poor in joys and so rich in accidents. Now these vicissitudes, these changing scenes of our life, do they know them? Do their eyes follow us, as we tread our lonely path? Do they see us, when we linger about their graves? When fears agitate us, or when calmness returns, do they know it? When we pray that we may reach the place where they are, do they know anything of this?

Yes, they know it! If their state is one of higher perfection, generally, than ours—if their knowledge of truth is clearer, if their spirit is holier, why should not their vision be sharper, and be able to pierce from heaven to earth? As the Scriptures assure us that they behold the face of God, there is certainly no absurdity in affirming that they see us. For a higher knowledge of God, who is omniscient, must lead to a knowledge of that which is ever present to his mind. God may indeed withhold from their view much which even upon their higher standpoint would either surpass their comprehension or disturb their happiness. But whatever relates to the advancement of his kindom on earth, that kingdom for which they themselves have labored, this we may believe he does not withhold from their eyes; for this they can comprehend, at this they must rejoice. "There is joy in heaven among the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." The angels there see when a soul passes from darkness to light; they know this great eventful moment; and must not our friends in heaven, who are so like the angels, know all those events which are connected with our salvation, which they so earnestly desire? And although these should also include pains and sorrows, yet their felicity is not marred thereby, for they see connected with the suffering the inestimably precious fruit which it will bear and the happy issue which it will have.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

EPISCOPALIAN TESTIMONY.

In an article headed "Tracts for the Times," Dr. A. uses the following language, which it would be well for Episcopalians in this country to heed:

"Looking upon the chaos around us, one power alone can reduce it into order and fill it with light and life. And does he really apprehend the perfections and high calling of Christ's Church, does he indeed fathom the depths of man's wants, or has he learned to rise to the fullness of the stature of their divine remedy, who comes forward to preach to us the necessity of Apostolic Succession? Grant even that it was of divine appointment, still as it is demonstrably and palpably unconnected with holiness, as it would be a mere positive and ceremonial ordinance, it cannot be the point of most importance to insist on; even if it be a sin to neglect this, there are so many far weightier matters equally neglected, that it would be assuredly no Christian prophesying which were to strive to direct our chief attention to this. But the wholly unmoral character of this doctrine, which, if it were indeed of God, would make it a single mysterious exception to all the other doctrines of the Gospel, is, God be thanked, not more certain than its total want of external evidence; the Scripture disclaims it, and Christ himself condemns it."

In a chapter on "Christian politics" he uses this language, "Because the Church of England is so dependant on the State (more by the feeling of its members than by its legal constitution,) that instead of striving to grow up into a true branch of Christ's glorious Church, perfect even after the infinite perfection of its head, its notions of excellence have been lowered by the actual constitution in Church and State, by idle language about the doctrine of the Reformers and the excellence of the British constitution. As if the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, scarcely waking as they were from the accumulated moral ignorance and insensibility of thirty generations, could satisfy our aspirations after Christian excellence; as if the consummate work of the spirit of God were to be found in the dregs of the papal and feudal institutions!"

Again: "It would here seem impossible to suppose, had not experience proved it, that any could have drawn an argument for the divine right of Episcopacy from our Lord's last charge to his disciples, as recorded by St. Matthew: 'And Jesus came and spake to them, saying all power is given unto me,' &c., &c.

One would have thought that a charge so solemn and a promise so comforting might have escaped the profanation of sectarian folly."

This is followed by a quotation from an author whom Dr. A. is reviewing, and from that quotation it appears that the work reviewed was that from which Bishop Green compiled his sermon on Apostolic Succession. In this I may be mistaken, as it is several years since I read his sermon, but when I read this page in Dr. Arnold's book I was forcibly reminded of the leading point in the Bishop's sermon. However, I think that if he had read the severe reproof administered by his elder brothers to those of England, who thus perverted the solemn charge of our Lord to his disciples, he would at least have chosen some other text to head his printed sermon; and this solemn charge would for once "have escaped the profanation of sectarian folly."

In the following quotation he presents us with a correct representation of the ground occupied by those "who keep to the conclusions of the Roman Catholics after they have denied their premises:"

"The ground then assumed by these Protestants, who wish to keep the conclusions of the Roman Catholics after they have denied their premises, seems to be this, so far as it is possible to understand it—that the clergy derive their power by succession from the Apostles, and that they having the exclusive right of administering the sacraments, and the sacraments being essential to Christianity, so a clergy, as it is called, of pure apostolic descent, can never be dispensed with in the Christian Church, and that where there is no such clergy, then there is no part of Christ's Church."

It is well known that this is a perfectly correct exposition of the creed of American Episcopalians; I say of American Episcopalians generally, because, although we frequently hear of the terms "High Church" and "Low Church," it is not an easy matter to find an Episcopal minister, in the South, at least, who does not heartily subscribe to the Puseyite platform, as above stated by Dr. Arnold. Indeed, it is the great basis upon which the most of their proselyting appeals are grounded, and they justify their proselyting efforts upon this very ground, "that the sacraments are essential to the Christian Church, and none can be authorized to administer them except those who are regularly descended from the Apostles;" and as Methodists have not that succession, they cannot be members of Christ's Church; therefore, say they, "we are only performing our duty when we try to persuade them to join "The Church." Therefore, as the Puseyite platform is that upon which Episcopalians in this country generally stand, it is nonsense for them to talk about "High Church" and "Low Church." I am persuaded that many who use these terms know not what they mean. A Low Churchman is one who, with Mr. Wesley and Dr. Arnold "rejects the fable of Apostolic Succession," and does not, therefore, consider it at all essential to the prosperity of the Christian Church. But where can we find such an Episcopal minister in the South? I have yet to find the first one.

What, then, do Episcopalians mean when they use the terms High Church and Low Church? If they mean anything, it is this: That some of their people are more, others less Roman Catholics in spirit. This is the real difference that exists among them; they are all more or less imbued with the mistaken notion of their being a priesthood in the Church of Christ." This notion is essentially Romish, and is justly condemned by every other Protestant Church.

In this connection Dr. A. propounds a number of questions, which it would not be easy for a High Churchman to answer. I can only give one or two brief quotations:

"When it is said that the clergy 'derive their authority from their apostolic descent,' I should like to know what is meant by the words. Is it meant that this apostolic descent conveys to them any real, intrinsic gift, moral or intellectual, so that they may claim the power of priests, because they possess a real superiority over other men, or a higher degree of knowledge? Or is it meant that they are not a priesthood, but an oligarchy, and that the Apostles fixed invariably the form of Government of the Church throughout all ages, without giving it, withal, any portion of that real virtue which can alone render forms other than essentially indifferent and changeable."

"When 'the authority of the clergy' is spoken of, is it meant that this authority is absolute, or where is the power of limiting it? * * * But if the authority of the bishops and clergy be limited, where are we to find its limits? Are they fixed or variable? And who had the power of enforcing them?

"One writer, who, it seems, is very anxious to circulate his instructions as widely as possible, talks of our present bishops being 'the heirs and representatives of the Apostles,' and of having 'the gifts of ruling and ordaining, of binding and loosing.' It is the most painful circumstance attending such foolish writing about the most sacred subjects that, whilst putting it down as it deserves, we may be exposed to the charge of irreverence towards the high and holy things themselves which it has dared to profane. 'Heirs and representatives' to what, and in what? Does it mean heirs of their power; so that the bishops may and can do all that the Apostles did? Or if it means 'heirs of a portion of their power,' will the writer tell us of what and of how large a portion, and by what authority it is defined?

"Let not this fantastical and superstitious notion be confounded with the reasonable and reverent ordinance of the Church of England, that the sacraments should be generally administered by none but her appointed ministers. As a matter of order, propriety and solemnity, nothing can be determined more wisely; but the whole question at issue is whether these ministers have any authority or any inherent qualification for the administration of the sacraments independently of their appointment? Or, in other words, whether the nonjuring clergy, after their deprivation, had any spiritual qualification to act as ministers; whether they did not become laymen by divine law, as well as the law of the land, until some particular church or congregation of Christians should have again called them to the ministry. And on the other hand, supposing the story of the Nag's Head consecration of Archbishop Parker to have been true, whether he would not have been as truly an archbishop by divine right, and as genuine a successor of the Apostles, so far as any Christian minister can now be so, by virtue of his appointment from the supreme government of this Church of England?"

This article is already larger than I intended it should be, and I shall therefore only add two or three brief remarks in conclusion.

The reader need not be reminded that when Dr. A. administered the stinging rebuke above quoted to the High Churchmen of his day, who boasted of being the 'heirs and representatives of the Apostles,' that he used language as peculiarly appropriate to the Episcopalians of our day as though he had written with special reference to them. American Episcopalians would do well to remember that a bright light in the Church, from which they derive their much boasted succession, has characterized their boastings as "foolish writing about the most sacred subjects."

Again, that he has asked, "supposing the story of the Nag's Head consecration of Archbishop Parker to have been true, whether he would not have been as truly an archbishop by divine right, and as genuine a successor of the Apostles, so far as any Christian minister can now be so, by virtue of his appointment by the supreme government of this Church of England?" Verily, Dr. Arnold must have had a low opinion of your boasted "Apostolic Succession."

Again, the last paragraph which I have quoted from Dr. A. shows that if his views of Apostolic Succession had prevailed in the Convention of the Diocese of New York, that they would have found no difficulty in making a final disposition of Bishop Onderdonk, after his guilt was established by the decision of his brethren, and the Episcopal Church of America would have been saved from the shame and humiliation which she has felt in the consciousness that one of her chief bishops was retained in his high position, at least so far as the emoluments of his office are concerned, after he had justly forfeited the confidence of his brethren.

Finally, if the publication of these extracts from the writings of an eminent and excellent minister of the Church of England accomplish no other good, I trust that they may serve to remind our Episcopal brethren that if our ministers and people sometimes seem to speak strongly, even harshly, of their claims to "Apostolic Succession," that their language is mild indeed when compared with the language of some of her own ministers. And may I not hope, too, that in the future they will manifest a more tolerant spirit toward those who differ with them, and who in a quiet and Christian way seek to obey the apostolic exhortation, "Earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints." The Episcopal Church should be careful lest the intolerant spirit of her members should remind the Christian public of this Christian land that although her power to persecute those who differ from her has long since passed away, yet the spirit of intolerance still survives amongst them. Let them learn to imitate the example of their brethren of the more numerous and influential churches of this country, who, while they claim for themselves the most perfect religious freedom, are equally ready to see others enjoy it as fully and as perfectly. Let them cease from their fruitless efforts to establish the "Church of the Fathers," so called; and let them not suppose "that the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, scarcely awaking as they were from the accumulated moral ignorance and insensibility of thirty generations, could offer anything to satisfy our aspirations after Christian excellence; as if the consummated work of the Spirit of God were to be found in the dregs of the papal and feudal institutions." Let them diligently labor to build up, "not the Church of St. Ignatius and St. Cyprian, but of St. John and of St. Paul, and strive to grow up [I quote from Dr. A.] into a true branch of Christ's glorious Church, perfect, even after the infinite perfection of its Head;" and then none will more sincerely rejoice in her prosperity than your humble correspondent. N.

ALABAMA, March 28, 1855.

Bradford's History—Interesting Manuscript Discovery.

It is well known to American historical inquirers that William Bradford, the second Governor of Plymouth, wrote a history of the Pilgrim and that Colony, from 1602 to 1647 which contained 270 folio pages; and this, which was never published, was used freely by Morton, in making his Memorial, by Hutchinson in writing his History, and by Prince in preparing his Annals. Thus Prince, 1734, cites: "Governor Bradford's History of Plymouth people and Colony, from 1602 to the end of 1646, in 270 pages, with some account of the end of the increase of those who came over with him, from 1620 to 1650, and all in his own hand-writing." Gov Hutchinson, in his second volume, published first in 1767, is one of the last, if not the last, who has referred to the manuscript.

From this time nothing, until lately, was heard of this manuscript. While in the possession of Prince, who died in 1758, it was deposited in the New England Library, in the tower of the Old South Church, where he kept his choice historical treasures. Among them was Gov Bradford's letter-book. This was carried to Nova Scotia, and the earlier, or more valuable, part was destroyed, but the remainder was rescued about fifty years ago from a grocer's shop in Halifax, and published by the Massachusetts Historical Society. It has been supposed that Bradford's manuscript history shared the fate of other documents that were destroyed when the church was used for a riding-school in the days of the seige of Boston. It has long been given up as lost.

The late Dr. Young found in the manuscript records of the first church of Plymouth a narrative, which, by making comparisons of it with the large extracts from the original Bradford manuscript, cited in Hutchinson and Prince, he ascertained to be the history of Gov. Bradford. This Plymouth manuscript had been considered by Hazard to have been written by Nathaniel Morton, and was printed by him, as such, in his well known collections. This MS. document, thus ascertained by Dr. Young to be a portion of the identical history of Bradford, will be found in that valuable work, the Chronicles of the Pilgrims. It comes down no further, however, than the year 1620.

Thus matters stood until a few weeks ago, as to this long lost manuscript, an authority of course that takes precedence of all other authorities relative to Plymouth Colony. At the last annual meeting of Historical Society, Mr. Charles Deane detailed circumstances that leave no doubt of the existence of this document. A little volume was printed in London a few years ago entitled "A History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, by Samuel, Bishop of Oxford; Second Edition, 1846." A few copies of this work found their way to this side the water. One of those in whose hands it fell was Rev. John S. Barry, of Scituate, who has made a valuable contribution to our local annals in a history of Hanover, and for several years has been engaged in writing a history of Massachusetts, now in the press; and, therefore, is engaged in critically comparing authorities.

He recognized passages in this book as being similar to those found in Prince and Morton, and cited as from Bradford's history. In this book, however, the author referred, as the source whence he obtained them, to a "Manuscript history of Plymouth Plantation in Fulham Library." There were other passages also, containing new matter, which were referred to the same source. Mr. Barry was impressed with the belief that this MS. referred to could be no other than the long-lost history of Bradford. He immediately communicated his views to a few friends of the Massachusetts Historical Society, who concurred in them. One of these was Mr. Deane, who is now one of the publishing committee of the Society. He immediately addressed a letter, detailing these circumstances, to a distinguished antiquary of London, Rev. Joseph Hunter, who has already done excellent service in the field of American history; and also stating the object to be to procure a copy for the Society, should the manuscript prove to be Bradford's History. Mr. Deane sent further, as a means of verification of the manuscript, an original letter of Gov. Bradford.

Mr. Hunter promptly responded to the call made upon him, and examined the volume. The result, communicated in a note by the last packet, we give in his own words:

"There is not the slightest doubt that the MS. is Gov. Bradford's own autograph. Not only is there a sufficient degree of correspondence between the hand-writing of the MS., and that of the letter which you transmitted to me, but there is the attestation of one of the family written in 1705, stating that it was given by the Governor to his son, Major William Bradford, and by him to his son, Major John Bradford. There is also the hand-writing of Prince, a memorandum, dated Jan. 4, 1728, showing how he obtained it from Major John Bradford; it also appears to have been in the New England Library. And, finally, the written pages are 270, the number named by Prince, and subsequently by Dr. Young, as the number of pages in the long lost volume."

It is needless almost to add that this announcement was received with the deepest interest and greatest gratification by the members of the Historical Society. An exact copy of the original has been ordered; the Bishop of London, who has the charge of the Fulham Library, having kindly placed the manuscript, for the purpose of copying it, in the hands of Mr. Hunter. It will be put to press as soon as it is received; and will be published with all the exactness and completeness that characterises the Society's publications. [Boston Post.

THE CALIFORNIA PIONEER.—A sad story is that of Gen. Sutter, a man noted for his benevolence, but now reduced to poverty. The first gold found in California was discovered in the race of his mill, and soon thousands of squatters had "prospected" upon his possessions. With a "hand open as the day to melting charity," he relieved the wants of all. We are told that the aged patriarch, guileless as a child, and totally wanting in commercial tact, unsuspectingly confided his secrets, his business, even his property, to any one who, by affectation of interest, or a hypocritical show of assistance, offered themselves to his friendship. One after another, thousands of his broad acres slipped from his grasp; he placed his affairs in the hands of an agent who deceived, deluded, and finally robbed him of some hundreds of thousands of hard dollars; his property dwindled down to merely a tithe of what it has been, and the old man's sorrows were heavy upon him.

In this condition, he put his farm, his sole remaining support, into the hands of his son, who proved worse than even strangers, and robbed him of his last possession. He is now reduced to all but begging, but awaits the decision of some commissioners in respect to a land claim.

The ship Cynosure, from Liverpool, arrived at New York on the 22d with seven of the crew in irons. They were charged with attempt to revolt. When three days out they refused to do their duty. The captain, second mate and physician fired revolvers at them. One received five bullets, one in the mouth; another was shot in the region of the heart, and has been removed to the hospital. Several others were wounded.

THE BATTLE OF BLOODY BROOK.

In the autumn of the year 1675, a little army of brave men had assembled at the town of Hadley, on the banks of the Connecticut River, to defend that place and the neighboring hamlets from the attacks of the Indians, who, banded together under the command of the brave Phillip, had committed many and serious depredations along the valley of that river. Among other towns which had suffered from the malignant hate of the savages, was Deerfield, a few miles above Hadley. This place had been partially burned, and the inhabitants scattered, during the previous summer, and there yet remained in the fields some 3000 bushels of wheat in stacks just as the husbandmen had left it when driven from his home. It was desirable, not only to obtain this for the use of the little army and the numerous families who had assembled at Hadley for protection, but also to keep it from falling into the hands of the Indians, and it was decided to send a party to thresh it out, and transport it to headquarters. Capt. Lathrop was appointed to command the detail of sixty six men and eighteen teamsters, who had been selected for the expedition. It was made up of young men, the very "flower of the country," who burned to distinguish themselves in aid of the cause which they were assembled to defend, the sanctity of their homes and firesides.

Many a cheek was wet as they took up their march toward their destination, and many a maiden heaved a deep-drawn sigh as her lover disappeared from her sight; for, although no immediate danger was apprehended, yet none knew in those troublous times where the storm might break upon their devoted heads, and overwhelm them in its fury. The departure of so considerable a body of their choicest men, therefore, gave cause of uneasiness to all, and unnumbered prayers were offered to Heaven for their safe return.

Arriving in safety at Deerfield, the men commenced with a will the performance of their work, and the grain was threshed out, the teams loaded, and with light hearts they started to return to their expectant friends. The savage enemy had, however, through their numerous spies, obtained intelligence of the expedition, and determined to cut it off. Collecting a body of between six and seven hundred warriors, Philip narrowly watched the movements of Captain Latham and his party, and when they started to return, he planned an ambuscade at a spot which, in every way, was suited to his purpose.

After leaving Deerfield, for some three miles the road ran nearly parallel with the Connecticut River, through a level country; it then diverged, and for half a mile ran along the edge of a morass, which it crossed, and took a southerly direction toward Sugar Loaf Hill, across what are now the "Home Lots," to the eastward of the village of South Deerfield.

The morass was covered with a thick growth of underbrush, which afforded concealment for the savage foe, who, with nostrils dilated, and eyes glaring with deadly hate, lay in wait like couchant tigers, trembling in their eagerness to spring upon their unsuspecting victims. Little dreaming of the danger which lurked in their path, the little company of brave hearts came onward to their fate. With lamentable carelessness, Lathrop failed to throw out flankers on his front and flanks, but marched blindly into the snare laid for him by the cunning Philip. Crossing the morass without suspecting the proximity of their foe, the little band reached the banks of a small stream, or rivulet, which crossed the road, near which, tradition informs us, grew great quantities of the luscious wild grape, which were ripening in the sun, and the tempting bunches hung in profusion from among the branches of the surrounding trees. While waiting for the teams to draw their heavy loads through the morass, they hastily piled their arms, and hastened to partake of the tempting repast so bountifully spread. Now was the opportunity for the savage foe, and "quick as fire from smitten steel," a volley was poured upon the devoted youths, which laid low many a promising form.

Cool and calm under all circumstances, and as brave as cool, they rallied at the word, and, seizing their arms, dealt back upon their fiendlike enemy a shower of balls which made many a warrior bite the dust. A second, and a third, aimed with a clear eye and steady nerves, told as well that the savages began to waver. A gleam of hope broke through the fearful prospect, and for a moment they dreamed of victory. But now appears the savage form of the Wampanoag Chief, and in thunder tones he cheers on his band. The dusky warriors rally at the sound of his thrilling voice, and, surrounding the brave pale faced youths, they deal death on every side. With half their number slain, the heroic little band perceive now the hopelessness of their situation, and the certainty of their fate. Not a nerve thrilled with fear; not a heart faltered; but calmly they determined to sell their lives at fearful cost to the foe. One by one they fell, a gory harvest, to their mother earth, and the crimson life-blood, from their still beating hearts, finds its way, in many a rill, to the neighboring stream, and mixing with its waters, christens it "Bloody Brook."

Early in the action, their brave leader was shot down while cheering on his men; and now, falling faster as their numbers decrease, a solitary few are all that are left to contend against the overwhelming force of the enemy. The foremost of these, turning to encourage his comrades, finds but seven remaining of all that goodly company. Finding that further resistance will only add to the scalps of the victors they dash through their enemy's line, and run for the Deerfield River, pursued by 200 savage warriors. Two only lived to reach the bank. One attempted to swim the stream, but sank, pierced by a dozen balls; the other managed to slide silently into the water, where he lay screened by a fallen tree and the rank grass, until the Indians gave up the search, and returned to the bloody field to secure the scalps of the dead and dying. When all was still, and during the darkness of the night, he swam across the river, and, stiff and cold, began his march for Hadley, where he arrived on the following day, the last and only survivor of the Battle of Bloody Brook.

Returning to the sanguined field, the savages commenced to strip the much coveted trophies from the still warm bodies of their victims. Not satisfied with this, they severed the heads from their trunks, in their infernal joy, and, raising them upon the points of poles, danced around them in fiendish glee, while fresh streams of blood added their purple tint to the little brook, which, for days ran red with the richest tide that ever rivulet bore.

Their savage revelry was suddenly stopped, however, by the appearance of a party under command of Captain Mosely, who having heard the firing, had hastened to Lathrop's relief. But, alas! too late. Fired with vengeance at the sight of their mangled comrades, they broke through the savage foe, and charging back and forth, cut down all within range of their shot. After several hours of hard fighting, and Capt Trent coming up with additional force, the Indians were compelled to retreat with the loss of ninety-six warriors. Mosely lost only two killed. The dead were collected and buried, and within a few years a marble monument has been erected over the spot where they fought and fell.

History makes no mention of Philip as connected with this battle. But from well authenticated Indian tradition, as well as from the fact that he is known to have been absent from Mount Hope, his residence, at the time, it is almost certain that he planned and led on the attack.

The U. S. steamship Mississippi arrived at New York on the 22d from Ile de Janeiro, which port she left on the 24th of March. While the Mississippi was at Ile the Russian Minister visited the ship, and was received with a salute. The Russian flag was hoisted, causing considerable excitement among the French officers in port.

THE SOLDIER'S VOW.

THE TALE.

One beautiful Indian summer day, in the autumn of 1844, a stranger appeared in the streets of Hanover, N. H., whose garb bespoke the utmost poverty and destitution. As he staggered along, he was surrounded by a crowd of village boys, who amused themselves by insulting him with coarse jests and personal indignities. He bore their abuse with exemplary patience, and begged them to wait till he felt a little better, and he would sing them a fine song. His voice was thick with unnatural excess, and he was too weak to protect himself from the rude jostlings of the crowd, yet he smiled on the tormentors, and exhibited no other sense of his helpless and forlorn condition than a look of grief and shame, which, despite his efforts and smiles, would occasionally overspread his countenance.

Late in the afternoon, the writer, then a student, passed him in company with a friend, when our attention was arrested by a voice of unusual power and beauty, singing the favorite national song of France, La Parisienne. As he protested, A great number of students from the college gathered round him, and at the conclusion an involuntary expression of delight broke from the entire mass. He was enthusiastically encored and afterward the Marseillaise called for. The same rich, clear voice rang out that wild inspiring, in the very words which are wont to arouse the spirit of the French soldier to frenzy. The admiration of the poor inebriate's auditory was now raised to the highest pitch. Despite his tattered and filthy garments, his squalid beard and brimless hat, now that the fume of liquor had subsided, his form appeared symmetrical and manly; and his face, glowing with the sentiments of the patriotic song, and flushed with excitement at the unexpected praise he was winning, assumed an expression of intelligence and joy that beautifully set off his really fine features. "What and who is this stranger?" was the universal inquiry.

"His singing is incomparable, and his English and French are both faultless."

"Yes," said he, dropping his eyes, "I can give you German, or Spanish, or Italian, as well, or Latin and Greek either," he added carelessly.

In reply to the many questions that were showered upon him with the coin he so much needed, he at length said, in a sad tone, and slowly endeavoring to push his way through the crowd: "Gentlemen, I am a poor vagabond, entirely unworthy your kind sympathy. Leave me to rage and wretchedness, to go on my way."

Our curiosity was too much excited to allow this, and, amid loud cheers, we escorted him to a room, where he was furnished with water and good clothes, and the barber's art put in requisition, and after an incredibly short time, he reappeared upon the college steps, smiling and bowing gracefully, a man of as fine appearance and noble bearing as eyes ever beheld. The delight of the crowd at this transformation was intense, and repeated shouts rent the air: "Give us La Parisienne!" echoed from all sides, and as soon as silence could be obtained again, that clear, rich voice uttered those inspiring words:

"Peuple Français, peuple de braves,
La Liberte trouve sa brav."

He was then conducted to the spacious chapel, and there he held an audience of one thousand persons spell-bound for two hours, by one of the most interesting autobiographies that it was ever our lot to hear. Born in Paris, of wealthy parents, he had in early life been thoroughly educated at the University of Wittemberg, and received the Master's degree. He soon after joined the fortunes of Napoleon, and with the rank of lieutenant, he was with him during all his campaigns in Egypt, in Italy, in Austria, in Russia, and at Waterloo.

His account of scenes in these battles, and his description of places and cities were expressed in choice and graphic terms, and, on being compared with history, were found to correspond in every particular. He related many unwritten and curious incidents in the life of Napoleon, which had come under his observation, and finally closed with a touching account of his own career after the battle of Waterloo. In the terrible route that followed that memorable event, his detachment was chased by a body of Prussian hussars, and, becoming scattered in the night, he wandered for three days and nights in the woods without food or drink.

The chase being at length given over, the poor Frenchmen sank down weary and sick with his wounds, and ready to die by the road-side. A humane Dutch girl, discovering him in this situation, brought him refreshments and cordials, and among the latter a flask of brandy. "Here," said the old soldier, "was the beginning of my woes. That angel of mercy, with the best of motives, brought me in that flask a deadly foe, which was to prove more potent for evil to me than all the burning toils of the Egyptian campaign, or the intolerable frosts and snows of the Russias—more fatal than the cannon of seventy battles—which kindled in me a thirst more insatiable than that which forced me to open my veins on the desert sands of the East. Till that day I had never tasted strong drink. I had uttered a vow in my youth to abstain from it, and to that vow I owed my life, for not one of all my comrades who indulged in the use of it, survived the Egyptian campaign.

"But, as I lay in anguish, longing for death, and momentarily expecting his approach, a sweet face appeared to me, wearing an expression of deep pity and sympathy for my sufferings, and I could not accept without inquiry whatever she gave. She gently raised my head and wiped with her handkerchief the damp sweat of my brow, and administered the cordial to my lips. It relieved me; I looked around, my courage, my love of life returned. I poured forth my gratitude in burning words, and called down the blessings of Heaven. Ignorant of what it was that so suddenly inspired me, as soon as my spirits flagged I called for more. I drank again and again; for three weeks her loved voice soothed me, and her kind hand administered to my wants.

"As soon as my strength was sufficiently recovered, fearing that some enemy might still be lurking near, I bade her adieu with many thanks and tears, sought the sea side, and embarked as a common sailor on the first vessel that offered, and have followed the sea ever since. My fatal thirst has ever accompanied and cursed me, in port and on deck this foe has debased me, and kept me from all chance of promotion. Oh, how often have I, in the depth of my heart, wished I had died on the field of Waterloo, or breathed out my life in the arms of my gentle preserver. Six weeks ago, I was wrecked in the packet ship Clyde, off the coast of New Brunswick. I have wandered on foot through Canada and New Hampshire, singing for a few pennies, or begging for bread, till I met your sympathy to-day. How do these college halls, and this noble band of students recall to recollection the scenes of former years."

The emotion of the stranger for a moment overcame his voice, and when he resumed the tears were still coursing each other down his cheeks. "I know not why God should direct my steps hither; but, gentleman, this shall be the beginning of a new life in me, and here in His presence, and in that of these witnesses, I swear, as I hope to meet you in Heaven, never to taste a drop of alcohol in any form again."

Prolonged and deafening cheers followed these words, and I noticed many a moist eye. A collection was immediately made, and more than fifty dollars were put into his hands. As he ascended the coach to take his departure, he turned to the excited multitude that surrounded him, and said: "It is but just that you should know my name. I am Count Sant Lanes, a nephew of the great Marshal Lannes. May God bless you all—farewell!" As these youths thoughtfully returned to their accustomed pursuits, not a few resolved in their deepest souls that temperance and virtue should ever mark their character, and the soldier's vow should be theirs.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1855.

The Nashville Meeting.

The Missionary Board adjourned Friday, [illegible] A central influence will be widely [illegible] and healthful.

Appropriations amount to $150,000. Of this amount $12,000 for China, and $24,000 for Indian missions; about $100,000 for [illegible] missions within the bounds of the South. Thus our Church is redeeming its pledges to give the gospel to the [illegible]. This sum, if spent in Egypt or Asia, would make a considerable swell for an anniversary, and be trumpeted abroad. As it is, this work is at home, and without romance. But it is the greatest work now conducted by missionary auspices. The Southern [illegible] derive a benefit, a safety, a character from these labors beyond the calculations of statesmen and political economists. Christianity, whose spirit of charity has not been displaced by schemes of philanthropy, will [illegible] to them. God bless them. We know of no denomination having equal claims with the M. E. Church, South, upon EVERY MAN IN THE COUNTRY for the support of its missions.

It was determined to establish a station in Santa Fe, New Mexico. The society is also looking in the direction of the natural and necessary extension of our Church—Central and South America. For prospecting and opening stations at suitable points, $5,000 were appropriated. This movement is most hopeful. With the highest satisfaction we regard it, and with interest shall look to its [illegible].

For sufficient reasons, the next anniversary was appointed at St. Louis, the first Monday in May, 1856; New Orleans, to which it was previously appointed, consenting to it.

Brownson's Lectures.

We felt some curiosity to hear this gentleman's lecture before the Catholic Institute last Sunday night. A fifty cent ticket, under ordinary circumstances, would not have kept us away. But it is the duty of Protestants to rebuke this Sabbath profanation.

A hopeful sign of the times is the independent manner in which our city press has [illegible] to Mr. Brownson's performances and the principles advocated by him.

The Crescent fearlessly raised the blanket and showed the animal from snout to tail.

The Delta dealt out hard but impartial justice. Alluding to the valedictory of Sunday night:

"The Doctor then assailed the two fundamental evils of the age, Materialism and Philanthropy.

We must confess that we have heard before all that he had to say on these subjects, and heard it much better said. It is a hardy thing to accuse so staunch a Roman Catholic as Mr. Brownson of plagiarism, but, in justice to a modern thinker of great capability, we must declare that his opinions were borrowed, his arguments a rehash of others which have reached a respectable age, and only the style was his own. In his onslaught against materialism, he adopted the very ideas of a Catholic, Thos. Carlyle, and in his ridicule of modern Philanthropy he used the very words of a Red Republican, John Mitchel.

He started by stating that material prosperity was not the highest want of humanity. Thomas Carlyle begins and ends all his [illegible] with that principle. He denied that even our material progress was satisfactorily proved, and referred to the supposed steamship described by Homer and the horses snorting smoke, (or steam engines) with which Jason was to plough the predestined furrows. So does Thomas Carlyle, but jocosely, and with a comical wink of the eye. He railed against the exact sciences, because they sometimes clashed with Scripture, and denied that geology has any right to be called a science at all; and here the coincidence between him and the Scotch philosopher momentarily ceases, because Carlyle is incapable of uttering tirades against chemistry or geology such as the learned pundit of Boston treated us to last night."

The Bulletin tells us "the last lecture of this celebrated Yankee advocate of the Pope's spiritual supremacy was delivered in Armory Hall on Sunday night. Public curiosity had been somewhat satisfied by previous lectures, and consequently the Hall was not so crowded as on the former occasion when we listened to him at the same place." That paper closes thus:

"We must say of the Doctor's discourse, as a whole, it was more logical, and to a mixed audience, less objectionable than his former discourse delivered in the same place two weeks previously. To some portion of his remarks very few genuine lovers of their country would reasonable object. His last postulate, however, that the Pope's spiritual supremacy is the only panacea for the evils of the world, we regard as susceptible of being subject to an objection, which all his sophistry, ingenuity, wit, learning and logic would strive in vain to remove. The Pope surely has been supreme, spiritually and politically, over his own States for more than a thousand years. He has had time, therefore, for making an experiment. And what is the result? Aye, that's the question—what is the result? During this long period not a [illegible] has moved his tongue against the reign of His Holiness: or if so, the tongue has been quickly silenced, and by an "external application too." Italy, therefore, ought to be [illegible], according to the doctrine of [illegible]. And yet are there no [illegible]? no midnight assassinations? [illegible] robbing the traveler? no beggary, and squalid wretchedness? [illegible] there, who understand the value of [illegible], ought surely to love it; [illegible] taken French bayonets to keep [illegible] driving off the Holy Father himself, we cannot think the country [illegible] of the United States, after all."

[illegible] would have been believed if, [illegible] he had foretold that the three [illegible] of the Crescent City would, in [illegible], speak out in that manner?

College Matters.

The Auburn (Ala.) Gazette says:

"An adjourned college meeting was held in Greensboro' on Saturday, 7th inst., Col. John Erwin presiding. Speeches were made by several distinguished citizens, which are represented as being very felicitous. The Committee on subscriptions reported the sum $82,950. Additional amounts have subsequently augmented it to $94,000, while confident anticipations are entertained that it will soon reach $100,000. To every friend of education such indications of zeal and interest in a noble cause are the highest degree cheering. We do not believe that so large an amount of money, absolutely considered, has ever before been raised in this State for similar purposes."

The contest waxes generously warm. We hope by 4th of July it will be worked up to $100,000 cash, or subscriptions equivalent to it.

Our friend, Rev. W. A. McCarty, writes of Auburn, Ala.:

"We have about $50,000 for the college, and the amount is still increasing. Auburn, for her means, has done nobly."

We have lately visited East Alabama, and found its spirit up. In a letter to the Southern Christian Advocate, President Wightman gives the following information as to the prospects of Wofford College:

"It gives me great satisfaction to say that the institution is doing well. There are in attendance in the collegiate and preparatory departments between seventy and eighty students, and we have reason to anticipate that this number will be largely increased at the beginning of the next term, on the fourth Wednesday of August, when a new freshman class will be formed. The endowment left by the venerable founder of the college, fifty thousand dollars, was paid over to the Board of Trustees by the executors on the 1st January, and invested without delay. The proceeds of the amount funded, with the patronage already secured, will meet the expenses of the institution the present year. Professor Du Pre is now at the North for the purpose of purchasing an extensive chemical and philosophical apparatus, which will be here by the time it is needed."

TRI-COLORED SKETCHES IN PARIS, DURING THE YEARS 1851, '52, '53. New York, Harper & Brothers, publishers: 1855.

This is a book of 368 pages 12mo; handsomely bound, printed in clear but rather small type, and with abundance of clever illustrations. The contents consist of articles written from Paris for publication in a New York daily journal, and, we believe, over the nomme de plume of "Dick Tinto." Without saying much about the literary merit of the work, we do not hesitate to pronounce it a spicy and wide awake production. Much of its contents are now, however, familiar to the public, and as mere jui desprits they have lost value and relish with age. There are too many superannuated facts and worn out criticisms in its chapters. We should judge that the book is about worth buying and reading, this warm weather. At H. D. ARCOLA MISSION.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

Dear Brother—It becomes my duty to report through your paper the state and condition of the mission under my care. The Arcola mission is in the Alabama Conference, in the Demopolis District, in the northeast corner of Marengo county, and is the first mission established in this county among the colored people. It now embraces fifteen appointments, 408 members, 250 children catechised. One has been received on probation this quarter, and three dropped. It is a self-sustaining mission, and may be safely reported as prosperous.

Yours, truly, JOHN WILLIAMSON.

CHURCH HERALD AND REV. R. ABBEY.

YAZOO CITY, April 18, 1855.

Brother McTyeire—I presume you have complied with the request of the Church Herald, as expressed in a card in the Vicksburg Whig of the 14th inst., in which they state that my letter of the 7th inst. "gives an incorrect impression of the transaction referred to."

The "transaction referred to" was this: I asked the Herald to publish a brief notice to its subscribers that I would send to such of them as desired it a copy of my debate with the editors on Apostolic Succession. This they refused to do, because it had been determined that my name should not again appear in the Herald.

My friend in Vicksburg then asked that I might have the names of the subscribers to the Herald, so that I might send the work to them. This permission was given on condition that I would copy the list at my own expense and trouble. A friend proposed to do the writing for me, as I was a hundred miles distant. On application for this purpose at the office, the agent manifested much confusion; did not absolutely refuse to give the names, but asked a short time to see and consult with the editors. Afterwards he set the matter at rest by saying "the names of the subscribers to the Herald should never be sent out of the office while he had any connection with it."

He said, however, that I might come to the office with seven or eight hundred copies of the book, and write the names on them from the pocket book, and leave them with him to be mailed. But I should not carry the pamphlets from the office with the names on them, even to put them in the post office. This is the way I understood it.

This, in my view was throwing embarrassments around the thing which were a little more than ridiculous. Their conditions could not be complied with.

After they refused to let me inform their subscribers of the publication, but determined to keep them cooped up, out of my view, and would not let me carry or send my own books from the printing office to the post office with the names of the subscribers on them, it could scarcely be expected that I would commit them to their keeping. They had not manifested much desire that their subscribers should see the debate, and I had no evidence of a change in their mind in this regard. I do not even now know that their subscribers are let out of the cage they have placed them in, so that I can get my book to them.

Now, after all this we are told that "The business agent of the Herald, without consulting with the editors, refused to allow a list of subscribers to the Herald to go out of the office, but offered to the party who appeared on the part of Mr. Abbey every facility for using the list within the office," &c.

Without consulting with the editors! He held the question under advisement a day or so, for the purpose of enabling him to consult with the editors, as he stated. Moreover, he had then before him the written authority of the editors to let me copy the names.

I do not pretend to intimate that they gave me authority to go and get the names, and then told the clerk not to give them. I only state the awkward and embarrassing facts as I understand them. The "facility" they afforded me for getting my pamphlet to the subscribers to their paper is described above.

And what is all this ado about? Merely because I desired in half-a-dozen lines, to inform the subscribers to the Herald, in the only possible way that I could do it, that they could see, if they chose, the whole of a debate, the half of which they had seen. But I was not then aware that the fiat had gone forth that my name could not again appear, in any way, in the Herald.

For the life of me I cannot yet understand the difficulty about the name. If they were as successful in the debate as would naturally be expected, and as they may be presumed to have been, I do not see why that should cause them to hold up their paper as a screen between the debate, published in whole, and the eyes of their subscribers.

Moreover, I do not see why this late card should be published in the Vicksburg Whig. What is the matter with their own paper, that their cards cannot be published in it? A strange freak, this.

Really, I thought I was done with the thing. I thought the end of it was the publication of the debate. It was intended to be the "End." But the Herald will neither print my name nor let me alone; but I must be hunted up in the political papers, in cards, which I may or may not, by chance, ever get sight of.

I wish the Herald would either treat with me as other persons are treated with, or let me alone.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

SHANGHAI, Jan. 19, 1855.

Dear Bro. McTyeire—As I have not written to you since my arrival, I trust you will give place in the Advocate to a few lines, which may be interesting in giving to the friends of China some information in regard to the state of things here at present.

Upon our arrival, on the 17th of September last, we found there was in the course of erection a building intended to be occupied by two of the new missionaries. When it was completed, it was allotted to Brother Lambuth and myself. Brothers Jenkins, Cunnyngham and Kelly occupied Dr. Taylor's former residence, as Brother Jenkins's was so much damaged and in so much danger as to be uninhabitable. Things remained thus for some time, when a reported threat of the rebels to burn Dr. Taylor's house rendered it necessary for the ladies to seek safety among their friends, while the brethren remained to guard the house and its contents. These disturbances induced Brother Jenkins to rent a vacant house in the London mission grounds, and remove his family thither. He was in the meantime busily engaged in preparing his old home for future use, but was interfered with occasionally by balls passing through and making new breaches. The alarm about the rebels proving to be false, Sisters Cunnyngham and Kelley returned to their old quarters. They were thus harrassed for two months, until the French, Americans and Imperialists finally built a wall up the canal called the Yang-King-Pang, passing Dr. Taylor's house, and cutting off the brethren who remained there from all communication with foreigners, and exposed to the mercy of the Chinese. They then of course abandoned the houses, taking their moveables with them; not, however, till they received a promise from Mr. Murphy, our Consul here, that the buildings should be paid for. Soon afterwards Brother Jenkins's house was burnt by the rebels, and in a few days Dr. Taylor's shared the same fate. Thus, save the small house in which I am now writing, and which is occupied by three new missionaries and their families, Methodism has only one mission-house in Shanghai. Brother Cunnyngham is received with much kindness in the family of Rev. Mr. Nelson, of the American Episcopal Mission, from whom our mission has received many marks of true kindness, and to whom we feel under many obligations. Brother Jenkins is still in his rented house, one-half of which is occupied by another family.

I suppose the brethren will get about $3,000 each, the original cost. As soon as they get the money they intend to begin preparations for building new houses. They will of course procure land more advantageously situated than that upon which the former buildings were erected. I should have stated that the titles to their land are still in their possession, and can now easily be sold at an advanced price.

The Imperialists and rebels are fighting more or less every few days; the rebels generally getting the best of it. The French have had a quarrel with the rebels, resulting in actual hostilities. The cause was the destruction by the French of a rebel battery so situated as to endanger French property, the rebels retaliating by firing a cannon at the workmen while doing the work of destruction.

On the morning of the 6th inst the French and Imperialists made an attack upon the city, the particulars of which you will find in the following extract from the North China Herald, published at Shanghai:

"The rebels were quite aware of the intention of the French to attack the city on that morning, the spot where and the time it was to take place. They therefore made good use of their time to fortify themselves within the houses. They took the precaution to barricade some of the streets, and made passages through the houses internally, so as to be able to keep up a communication from one end to the other without exposing themselves to the fire of the enemy.

A-ling (the rebel leader) had a letter, written by a Frenchman, addressed to the Admiral, praying him, in the name of the insurgents, not to take any further proceedings against the city. He stated therein that he held it for Tae-ping-Wang. However, should he persist in attacking the city, that they must defend it to the last man. This letter was sent at a late hour on Friday night, by an insurgent, to the barrier gate of the French lines, who hailed the sentinel and requested it might be sent on by a coolie to the French Consul.

Early on the morning of Saturday, the 6th, a breach was made in the wall, just at the back of a large pawnbroking establishment in the city. The attacking party sustained their principal loss at the first assaulting and ascent of this breach. The rebels had planted a large gun, loaded to the muzzle with grape-shot, opposite to where the breach was made, and fired it on the first appearance of the assailants. By the explosion of this gun several officers and men were killed and wounded. The French behaved bravely: they soon took possession of the line of wall between the breach and the north gate, and planted the French flag on the top of the rampart. The rebels made a desperate charge on their enemies down the narrow street leading to the aforesaid gate, but the French turned their guns on them and fired, discharging a heavy fire of musketry at the same time, whereby, it is said, about forty rebels were killed. The French then pursued them up the street, which was soon cleared, and the guns of the rebels on the walls and batteries inside were thrown down. After displaying the greatest coolness and courage, the French, having exhausted their ammunition quietly withdrew within the French lines.

Meanwhile the Imperialists, finding the northern portion of the wall and adjoining streets temporarily undefended, spread along in great numbers. Others scaled the wall at different points, and the north gate having been opened by the French for the admission of more, these valiant braves, throwing away their fighting arms, drew their knives and began to display their prowess in cutting off the heads of defenceless women and children. Their bloody pastime, however, was but of short duration. The war cry of the advancing rebels struck terror to their craven hearts, and they fled in fear and panic. Some 400 never left the walls to tell their deeds of butchery. Others tumbled or were hurled headlong from the parapets, and broken heads, necks and limbs completed the disasters of the day. The total loss of the French was nine killed and thirty-six wounded."

Thus, you see, the rebels still hold the city, and how much longer they will hold it is one of the unknown things of the future. The French have made no other attempt since the failure of the last.

We know but little, with certainty, as to what Tae-ping-Wang is doing at Nankin. He is not just now making any movements of importance, though there are some reports that he contemplates descending on Shanghai the next.

I have before me a copy of the Anglo-Chinese Calendar for 1852, which contains some statistics of considerable interest, a few of which I will lay before your readers. The whole number of foreign male residents in China, independently of the inhabitants of Macao, and those living at the anchorage of Woosung, Swatow, Namoh and the mouth of the river Min, statistics of which have not been obtained, is about 1,100. There are 75 male missionaries in the field, supported by 17 different societies. Of these 46 are American, 24 English, 3 German, and 2 Swiss. They are stationed as follows: Canton, 11; Hong-Kong, 10; Amoy, 6; Fuchau, 7; Ningpo, 14; and Shanghai, 28. There are nine newspapers published in China, one of which, "Strings of Pearls from Far and Near," is in the Chinese language.

The question is often asked by those at home, and it is an absorbing question to us in our intercourse with each other, why has not more fruit resulted from the immense expenditure of money, and labor and life in this country? I am sure no one can answer it in such a way as to meet every objection, but I will throw some light upon the subject in the minds of those who are as yet unacquainted with the facts.

It is well known that China has a population of 470,000,000 at least. Of this number perhaps one-third can read, while the remaining two-thirds are in the most hopeless ignorance. Moreover, while those who can read can give the proper sound to the characters, still such is the peculiarity of the written Chinese that it is the merest chance if they understand what the characters mean. This results from its remarkably elliptical construction, and from the fact that the written language is totally different from any spoken dialect in the Empire.

Again, while they have "gods many and lords many," still they may be characterized as a nation of Atheists; and in addition, a Chinaman's word or oath, from the Emperor down, is not worth a straw. It is notorious among us that in the face of the priests, in their temples, and in the presence of their divinities, whom they profess to regard as the guardians of their country and of their homes, when questioned as to their opinion of them, they tell us they are false, and are unworthy of adoration; most solemnly assuring us, at the same time, that they never worship them. We never hear of Chinese suffering martyrdom for their religion, or for anything else but lust or covetousness.

But while they are so careless and openly profane in the face of their divinities, they are, on the contrary, most scrupulous in worshipping their ancestors. This is a duty most religiously attended to, and most diligently inculcated from childhood to old age by parents and priests; so that not only does it become a part of a Chinaman's daily thoughts, but there also seems to be an anxiety among the people to spend the accumulated treasures of years for its satisfactory accomplishment.

The difficulties before us, then, are—1st. The double work of overcoming their unconquerable prejudices, and arousing them from their unparalleled religious indifference and stupidity. 2d. The difficulty as above stated, of communicating knowledge by means of books, rendering it necessary that the Scriptures and all other religious books should be accompanied by a missionary, who, viva voce, may explain the truth, and in burning words proclaim its bearing upon their conduct, their hopes and their destiny. But we have not so many missionaries, and this is impossible. 3d. A difficulty I have never seen adverted to in any of our papers—viz: the influence of the foreign residents in China, which I affirm to be "evil, and only evil continually." From those men, who are regarded by the natives as Christian men, they have daily lessons in swearing, drunkenness, and all manner of debauchery. The consequence is the missionary, in his rounds among the people, is compelled to hear even little boys both out in English such oaths as we too often hear from the same class of persons in our towns and cities in America. These and many other greater evils they have learned from those who are to them the only representatives of what we teach—our own countrymen.

These statements, I am aware, do not fully explain the cause of the existing state of affairs, but they surely reveal the true state of things, and in so doing cannot fail to throw some light upon a subject which is to the missionaries a source of deep anxiety and close searchings of heart.

It is, then, with much interest that we look forward to the renewal of our treaty with China, as we have some hope then—however small—of gaining such a footing as shall enable us to go here and there and sow the word of life, with all the advantage of a living, moving, speaking, and burning ministry. And it is also a natural consequence that some of us should have a strong desire to leave these places so much frequented by foreigners, and go where we can preach the Gospel and labor untrammelled by the follies of fashion, which even here holds a sway as absolute as at home, and unmolested by the debaucheries of our own misguided countrymen.

Through you, Mr. Editor, I would say to my dear brethren of the Alabama Conference I earnestly hope they will continue to feel it their duty to give the whole weight of their influence to the cause of missions, with which they are becoming more identified. It is with the deepest gratitude and pleasure that I remember my short association with them, and it gives my heart much comfort to look forward to the final meeting in our Father's house, where we shall lay by our work, and go home to celebrate the marriage of the Lamb.

Your brother in Christ,

JAMES S. BELTON.

One Round on My Mission.

The M. E. Church, South, is endeavoring to preach the Gospel to the poor. The slaves are not forgotten. The following will give those of our readers not acquainted with ministerial life on plantation missions a pretty fair idea of it. A noble work, but requiring for its successful prosecution as much humility, zeal, labor, patience and wisdom as would qualify a missionary to the Indies. And will the reward be less?—Ed.

At the first appointment we preach in the master's house. After supper, came fifteen or twenty "little darkies," with sparkling eyes, to be catechized. We begin, and they very promptly answer every question in Capers's First Catechism and all the ten commandments! Skip, and ask what is the fourth, tenth, &c., and they're at no loss for an answer. This is owing to the instruction of their mistress.

We stay all night, and by 9 o'clock next morning are at another plantation. The horn is blown, and thirty or forty "chaps" are assembled in the form of a semi-circle, and waiting for the simple lesson of truth. They know a good deal, owing to the labors of their last year's pastor.

Catechism done, we give them out a hymn from the catechism which they've committed to memory, and they drown your ears with their singing. They sing beautifully.

This is at the "quarter;" but let us go to the church, one mile off. We find it crowded; and while explaining to them that "It is well with the righteous and ill with the wicked," some weep, others rejoice in love. The weeping ones join society.

At the next, several appointments are associated together; they have a large house of worship, are pretty well instructed, and have preaching frequently. No catechizing done this time. Crowded house, very attentive. God is with us.

Next Sabbath, at 11 A. M., at another associated appointment. No little ones out here. Some are out to the heart, and cry for mercy till the congregation's dismissed, and even linger about the yard. Three o'clock finds us at another plantation. No church built here; so we must preach in a negro house, if at all. The little ones have seen us, and here they come for the catechism. This over, read out our text, preach, and some are powerfully convicted, and cry, "God have mercy on me, a sinner." Others rejoice. But here comes the overseer, and says "stop that noise!" Oh, how important that professing masters employ pious overseers! for he can do more harm by a word, frequently, than the missionary can do good by a sermon.

But we leave this place, and by nightfall are at a plantation where we must preach in the overseer's kitchen. Too late for catechizing to-night. The overseer is opposed to anything like religious excitement. We preach, call for mourners, God is with us. But he holds his peace. Meeting over, we repair to his hospitable house. He has much to say about religious meeting, &c. Says he abhors anything like a noise, &c., notwithstanding he is a missionary Baptist. We tell him the Bible says they shout like thunder, in Heaven; but he has never seen any such passage, and thinks religion is a quiet something. We read it to him from 19th of Revelations.

Next Sabbath, find a good house built by the owner, who is a Methodist himself, and his overseer, too. Good many here to catechize. Large membership, and some very consistent Christians. At 3 P. M. we find a new church, erected by the owner. Religious overseer here. We preach, call for mourners; the altar crowded with weeping sinners and rejoicing Christians. We dismiss, and each member must shake hands with the missionary. We unhitch Dobbin from the limb of a hickory tree, and jog off home, singing:

"Jesus, I my cross have taken,
All to leave, and follow thee,
Naked, poor, despised, forsaken,
Thou from hence my all shall be.

I have called thee Abba, Father,
I have set my heart on thee,
Storms may howl and clouds may gather,
All must work for good to me."

MORMON BOOK CONCERN IN CALIFORNIA.—The Mormons have taken the lease of a lot of land in Broadway, California, for the purpose of erecting a building to be used as a church, book depot and printing office. A press belonging to the sect is on its way to the Sandwich Islands, and a very large invoice of Mormon books and tracts, are expected at an early day from England. A newspaper will be started as soon as the arrangements are completed. As the Mormons are not a people to allow a project to fail, if labor will accomplish it, it is reasonable to suppose that the whole institution will be in full blast before many months. Elder Pratt is to be chief manager.

ALL IN CHRIST.

BY MARION HARLAND.

(Authoress of "Alone," a Virginia novel.)

I.

Jesus, Saviour, from thy dwelling
High, all stars and thrones above,
Hear my faltering accents, telling
Of weak faith and smouldering love.
Poor love for Thee, the only worthy,
Dull faith in Thee, the only wise;
While to all things base and earthy
How madly cling my wistful eyes!

II.

I am blind! In rough paths groping,
With outstretched hands and sightless eye,
Through gloom so dense, I scarce am hoping
That dawn will ever gild the skies.
Black, grisly spectres hover o'er me,
Filling my quaking soul with fright,
Thou, of all worlds the sun and glory,
Radiant Redeemer! be my light.

III.

I am lonely! often keeping
Sad vigils o'er affections dead;
Some in the grave's strait chamber sleeping—
Some like bursting bubbles fled!
Yet for full love my deep soul longeth—
Gently each seeking tendril bend
To Thee, to whom that soul belongeth,
Loving Redeemer! be my friend.

IV.

I am guilty! oh, how sinning!
Against my kind—against my God;
Hell and corruption ever winning,
My soul into the downward road.
Insanely gloating on pollution,
Quaffing thick lees for pleasures pure—
Rend thou away each fell delusion,
Holy Redeemer! be my cure.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE TRACT SOCIETY.

SEMI-ANNUAL MEETING.

Brother McTyeire—I am requested by the President of the Mississippi Conference Tract Society to give notice that the semi-annual meeting of the Society will be held in Jackson, Miss., on Saturday, the 16th June, at 10 o'clock A. M., at which time it is requested that every member of the Board shall be present.

Lest some member may not have been informed of his election, you will please publish the names of the officers of the Society as given below:

H. H. MONTGOMERY, President.

Vice President—H. J. HANNIS.

Secretary—J. A. LIGHT.

Treasurer—W. P. BARTON.

MANAGERS:

A. T. Fly, D. M. Wiggins, H. M. [illegible], W. B. Hinds, L. Wiley, R. T. Jones; [illegible] Cook of Vicksburg; R. Abbey, of Yazoo; [illegible] J. W. Burruss, of Woodville; W. John[illegible] Gallatin; Mr. Dix, of Natchez; J. M. [illegible] of Jackson.

From the frequent applications made to me for copies of the Constitution of County Conference Tract Societies, I am led to infer that they have failed to preserve it. When published last year, I would therefore request you to republish it, so that all may get a copy. Not having seen it officially announced, I would state, for the information of all concerned, that Brother R. Abbey, of Yazoo City, has been appointed agent of the parent society, and is engaged in the duties of his office; but as he will not be able to reach many parts of the Conference, none should wait for him, but once, as far as practicable, carry out the objects of the society in getting all the money that can be raised, for the purpose of publishing tracts and cheap books for the million!

Brethren will please not fail to give me due time, all information necessary to enable me to make my annual report to our next Annual Conference.

J. A. LIGHT, Secretary.

FEMALE LOVE.—How few women have been in love. They marry because they are asked, and because the marriage is made. It is their vocation to be married; parents approve, and they have no other attachment. Any observant person, living in society where is continual marrying, must be struck with this fact. Cupid's quiver must be exhausted, or his arrows blunt—he pierces hearts. I am inclined to think that a woman really in love, one who bears the symptomatic malady, would be thought very ill indeed. Yet I have often fancied that there must be a man born in the world for every woman, whom to see would be to love, to chase, to adore; one with whom her sympathies would be so entirely blended that she would recognize him at once as her lord. Now and then a pair come together; and woe to her that is joined to this other self too late; for neither peace, nor happiness, nor contentment will dwell there, though she may have a loving and faithful heart. Therefore, I entreat you to know and love sincerely before you make the leap.

Woman would be more humble and modest if they did not through ignorance and carelessness, mensure the temptations of others by their own experience. Marry for love, and God for happiness, and "by the sweat of thy brow thou shalt eat bread."

ENOUGH FOR ONE BED.—Emigration to the State of Michigan was so great during the years 1835-36 that every house was filled even with travelers wanting lodgings. Every traveler there at that time will recollect the difficulty of obtaining a bed in the hotels, even if he had two or three "strange bed-fellows."

The Rev. Hosea Brown, an eccentric methodist minister, stopped one night at one of the hotels in Ann Arbor, and inquired if he could have a room and bed to himself. The landlord told him he could, unless they should be so full as to render it necessary to put some one in with him. At an early hour the reverend gentleman went to his room, locked the door, and soon retired to his bed, and soon found comfortable sleep. Along toward midnight he was roused from his slumbers by a loud pounding at his door. "Hallo! you there!" exclaimed he, "what do you want now?" in a tone of distress on the last word.

"You must take another lodger, sir," said the voice of the landlord.

"What! another yet?"

"Why, yes; there is only one in bed there?"

"Ouch! here is Mr. Brown, a methodist preacher, and myself, already, and I think that enough for one bed, even in Michigan." The landlord seemed to think so too, and left the parson to his repose.

MINUTES OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

The blank appearing in the published minutes of the late session of the Alabama Conference, in the Board of Commissioners to locate the contemplated college, was occasioned by the Secretary failing to hear the nomination. I have since learned from reliable authority that Col. B. T. Pope, of Ashville, St. Clair county, Ala., was elected as one of the lay members from that District, and the blank should be filled with his name.

This notice is given us the Secretary's apology, and to place the name of that gentleman before the Methodist public as one of the Board. The Commissioners will bear in mind that the meeting of the Board will be held on the fourth day of July next, at Summerfield, Ala. T. W. DOAMAN.

Deaths.

Mrs. MARIETTA K., wife of Col. B. B. Lewis, of this city, and only daughter of Dr. King, has gone to her "inheritance among the saints in light." She was called from among us the 21st of April, 1855, being 26 years and a few months old. An intimate acquaintance with Mrs. Lewis enables me to record my testimony in favor of her goodness of heart, the grace of her manners, the sweetness of her disposition, and the ornature of her mind. From childhood she had been training her soul for its heavenward flight, having connected herself with the M. E. Church when only 12 years old, and although her religion sought no emblazonment of itself, was exempt from everything like ostentation, it was founded in the fear and love of God, was the religion of principle, and expressed itself loss in profession than in uniform obedience to the divine commandments. She lived religion and made her life, rather than her words its exponent.

The only daughter of idolizing parents, the devoted wife of the fondest and kindest of husbands, standing as she did in the morning of life, with the warm light of social and domestic love lying all around her, it was no easy matter for her to follow willingly the summons of that "dark and mysterious herald from an unknown world;" yet she went, not only with willingness, but joy.

It was good to hear her words of holy trust, and sometimes of rejoicing, as we spoke of the valley of "fearful shade," and of the beautiful home beyond. Although the seal of silence is upon her lips now, and the dimness of death on her eyes, yet the words charged with encouragement that came whisperingly above the "parting strife" from the one, and the light of tranquil trust and of outbeaming glory that fell from the other, are among the hoarded treasures that memory will fondly guard in the years to come.

She has left us, and she is happy. We mourn but cannot murmur; for she was God's, and he has taken her "from the evil to come."

"Peaceful be thy silent slumber, Peaceful in thy grave so low,"

until the Father summons his scattered children to the banqueting-house in Heaven!

DIED—In Gainsville, Miss., on the 19th of April, Mrs. JEMIMA CROSBY, wife of Rev. G. L. Crosby, of inflammation of the lungs, aged 32 years.

The deceased was a daughter of Robert Wise, of Sumpter District, S. C., and was a native of South Carolina, but in childhood removed to Florida, and was there married in 1839. In 1848 she joined the M. E. Church, and was ever a consistent member, though her feeble health often prevented her from attending on the means of grace. Her piety, though unostentatious, was sincere and deep. Her virtues were of that retiring nature which bless and cheer woman's true sphere of action, the domestic circle. To her husband and children, priceless in the worth of her affection while living, and enshrined by a consecrated memory in their hearts now that she is dead. She has left five children, one of them an infant of two weeks, to the care of her sorrowing husband, while seven of the little lambs of her flock have gone before to their Saviour's arms.

Her husband feels that his loss is her eternal gain; and though he buries his joys in her grave, he buries not there his hopes.

SKYLARKING.—No. I.

We had the rare luck to be one of the party who accompanied Mons. Godard in his voyage to the Upper Regions, on Sunday evening last, from the warehouse yard at the corner of Poydras and Baronne streets. So extraordinary was the spectacle, and so overwhelming were the sensations inspired by our divorce from terra firma, that we feel incompetent to import more than a faint shadowing of them within the limits of an ordinary newspaper article. The aerial party consisted of Mons. Godard; his daring assistant, Mons. Mandult; and three passengers, viz: Mr. Louis Dessommes, Mr. Star Davis, and ourself. We five men, the ballast, provisions, wines, and other articles in the car, made a dead weight of about fifteen hundred pounds, to be wafted up to the ethereal regions by the beautiful "American."

It was astonishing, upon clearing the enclosure, to behold the dense crowds of people outside—Poydras and Baronne streets seeming to be paved with human faces rather than round stones—not to say flattering, to be so generally looked up to by all classes of society. It was as hilarious to see the commotion beneath us as we passed along—the stay-at-home community scampering about over their back-yards, galleries, and other places, in order to get a good view of us. We felt some nervousness in ascending, but this feeling was soon absorbed by the sense of sublimity, the excitation, inspired by the unequalled scene. It was well worth beholding, and worth the peril of life (should an ascension be so considered) to any lover of the sublime. We return our thanks to the face of nature generally, for the candor with which it revealed itself to us the city its form and lairiencies, the river its tortuosities, and the lakes and bayous their whereabouts.

We will undertake to explain what is the greatest wonder of being up in a balloon. We were much puzzled by it at first, but explained it to ourself by recollecting what we have been taught of the atmosphere. It was the difference between looking perpendicularly through the air, and horizontally through it—a difference altogether astonishing. At one mile from the earth houses looked much smaller than at a horizontal distance of two miles. Horizontally distant, a house may look as large as your hand; yet you will not be able to distinguish it by its minor details from any other house. Perpendicularly, a house may look no larger than a sixpence; yet you will be able to count its windows, chimneys, pillars, and other small details as if you held its daguerreotype in your hand. Horses on the shell road seemed to us likants creeping along a chalk line; yet we were able to distinguish their legs quite as plainly as we could those of an ant on our fore-finger. Charity Hospital square looked as if we might grasp it all with one hand; yet we could discover the minutiæ of that establishment with a clearness and certainty that seemed absolutely miraculous. The chimney of the gas works, down which we looked, reminded us of a tiny cotton-spool; the French Cemeteries resembled boxes of crockery stuffed in with grass; the Ridge Cemeteries seemed scraps of green velvet, studded with little bits of egg-shell; the Metairie race-track was so utterly insignificant as to draw expressions of the highest astonishment from all the passengers; the city press swamp bore the semblance of a plain covered with dog-fennel; and the Carrollton and Lake train of cars, over which we passed, resembled a snail creeping slowly along, but sending up a noise prodigious for an object so small.

Before we reached the Metairie Ridge, Godard hauled Mandult into the basket, and hung up his barometer. Over the Ridge Cemeteries, the latter instrument indicated an altitude of 10,000 feet; an announcement we could never have believed, but for the Lilliputian appearance of the race course. An expansion of the gas, and escape of a quantity down through the neck of the balloon, caused us to descend. Nearing the lake, we came down to two thousand feet. Finding everything favorable for a splendid trip, Godard announced his intention of crossing the lake, and offered to land any of us who might not wish to go farther. The party was of course unanimously in favor of the biggest kind of a ride. So out went some ballast, and away we sailed. Crossing the lake, we hailed Oshermen in pigmy smacks; played with Echo till he made us hoarse; admired the balloon over our heads, the setting sun, and the rising moon; held our breath to listen to the roar of the million white-crested waves beneath us—wide-sounding and solemn, like a song of eternity; and eat our supper of roast turkey, bread, salmon-pate, and wine, at an elevation of ten thousand feet, with coquettish little clouds hovering around us, as if they wished to approach and partake of our good things. We—that is to say, ourself—tasted of the wine very sparingly, and only in ceremony; being determined to indulge only in the intellectual nectar of the ride—a draught more exhilarating than any that ever came from a terrestrial vintage.

We left Lake Pontchartrain to the west of Pass Manchac, and crossing the latter, passed to the east of Lake Maurepas, in a northwesterly direction. We crossed an immense wilderness, interested by bayous gleaming to the moonlight, and musical with the song of the whip-poor-wills, owls, katydids and frogs, which we were able to hear plainly at an indefinite height. Again we played with Echo, who was not so short-tongued as on the lake, but more mellow and musical; descended low enough to distinguish cypress swamps and pine highlands; and dropped bottles at ten thousand feet, for the astonishment of the sound of their reaching the earth, and the length of time elapsing before the sound would reach us.

At length we neared symptoms of civilization. A man in the forest beneath hailed us with a bugle, and played us a tune, which seemed a strain belonging to heaven rather than earth. We passed over trees in the woods; at length farms came in sight—dull gray patches on the sombre green of the rolling panorama; could hear the shouts and excitement of the people, and the dogs barking as though they would bark their heads off. At some distance to the left, a cluster of twinkling lights indicated a town. Descending, we could discern handsome mansions embosomed in groves on the margins of the farms, with the gardens, hedges, roads and fences. In due time, a large cluster of lights to the right indicated another town, and one of considerable size. We had chart and compass, and knew our course; but having no idea of our rate of progression, were unable to hazard a guess as to our whereabouts. We descended repeatedly within hailing distance, but our shouts were answered by words which we could not understand, mingled with the baying of the dogs. Between nine and ten o'clock, we descended for information, and were told by a man that we were in Jefferson county, Mississippi. This was a great astonishment, none of us believing that we were yet past the State line. The first town we passed to the left, must have been Clinton Louisiana, and the other, to the right, Liberty, Miss. Our course had veered round to the north, and Godard made calculations to land at or near Vicksburg. We were now passing over a magnificent cotton country; at one turn of the head we were able to count from twenty to fifty plantations.

Descending several times low enough to exercise our lungs, and finding that the country people had gone to bed, Capt. Godard prepared to treat us to a series of aerial tableaux, a feast of surprises and a dessert of grandeur. At twelve thousand feet, we were amid the lower clouds, sometimes in the moonlight and sometimes in shade; for as the currents of air varied in speed at different altitudes the clouds were continually overtaking us, or changing their shapes and positions about us. After a brief stay up there, the gas expands and streams down through the neck, sending us toward terra firma with a slight nausea. Godard, on his knees before the barometer, with a bag of sand resting on the edge of the car, its mouth grasped in his hand, takes us up at will to any desired height. Up we go again, to fourteen thousand feet—right into the middle of a large cloud; a dense fog surrounding us, moistening our garments, and shutting out all view of the earth; but permitting Dame Luna to look at us through a resplendent halo, tinted with the hues of the rainbow. A sensation of thickness in our ears indicates the rarity of the atmosphere, though our lungs can discover no difference. Down we drop, and up again, several times, renewing our vapor bath, and inhaling the down-jetting gas in rather unpleasant quantities. Finally, with a liberal discharge of sand, up we go again, to the clouds, through them, and far above them, to our greatest altitude, namely, sixteen thousand feet, or nearly three miles.

This is the grand event of the journey. We know we shall never be able to describe it justly. No poetic enthusiast, no opium-eating or mesmeric dreamer could ever conceive of anything half so beautiful, so exquisitely grand, so overpoweringly sublime. The picture was daguerreotyped all over our soul, and were we to outlive Methuselah, it would never in the least be tarnished by the mold of forgetfulness. The deep blue of the ethereal vault, studded with stars and illumined by the moon, twinkling and beaming in their pristine glory, canopied us, and rested all around us, on a horizon of snow-white clouds. Though these clouds were separate, they appeared to us as one undivided mass, their jagged shapes and shady outlines being plainly marked upon each other. They shut out all view of the earth, and seemed to form a vast bowl or basin beneath us—a valley of vapory snow-banks, fit for the revelry of the gods, for an ethereal Pantheon, or any mythological congress. The moonlight was so clear, and so strongly reflected by the vapors beneath, that the watches, compass and map of the party were as intelligible almost as by day; and we, having a newspaper in our pocket, drew it forth, and were enabled to read the smallest print in it with ease, and did read some of it aloud, for the gratification of the party. All this time, though we breathed as freely as ever, our blood was humming in our ears, and the coolair, acting upon our cloud-moistened clothing, diffused quite a chilliness over us. At one time, Dessommes held down in the bottom of the basket for warmth.

In this grand situation we remained nearly a half-hour. At length a flag was opened in the clouds directly beneath us, and all below looked black as death—we could distinguish nothing. When the opening became tolerably wide, we were enabled to see the cotton fields gliding by—little gray spots, not as large as our hand. The expansion and escape of gas having again sent us earthward, we made one more rise, to fifteen thousand feet, among and above the clouds.

Our gallant little captain now concluding that we ought to be in the neighborhood of Vicksburg, kept prospecting for the river with his glasses. At last it seemingly appeared. We all hailed it with delight, but upon nearing we found it to be only a chain of cotton-fields, of which we could see neither end. Godard then determined to land at the first opportunity, to discover our whereabouts before going further; he was fearful of getting too far from the river. Sloping down to a cotton field, we found it bristling with dead timber, resembling black and white needles standing on end. Several other fields offered a similar appointment; but at last we came to a food destitute of tree or stump, and down we bounced right in the middle of it, at precisely one o'clock, having been on the wing six hours and fifty minutes, and traversed a geographical distance from the city which we have since ascertained to be one hundred and sixty miles—an average of twenty-three miles an hour.

The cotton-field in which we landed belongs to Mr. Stephen O. Smith, and is located thirty-five miles from Vicksburg, and fifteen from Port Gibson, in a northeast direction. A negro who saw us land, came running to us—crazy with delight, for he had seen a balloon before. He told us all we wanted to know, and was sure that his master would let us have carriage and horses to take us to Vicksburg, which boat like a genuine African, told us was only fifteen miles off. The balloon having refused positively to continue its journey with more than two persons, it was necessary that three of us should stay behind. The only one of the party that could speak French and English was Mr. Dessommes, and Godard therefore selected him for his companion and interpreter. The balloon, all shrunken in its lower part, mounted slowly and sailed lazily away, just above the tree-tops. It looked very tired, and doubtless did not go far. Peter, the negro, seeing that it did not steer directly for Vicksburg, shouted at the top of his voice—"Hello! massa! you's going too far to the left! Say! too far to de left!"

We must now be brief. How Davis, Mandult, (who had encased himself in a suit of black, upon getting into the car,) and ourself, followed Peter to his master's house, a mile off; how Mr. Smith would let us have carriage or horses for love or money, nor would let us see more than the tip of his nose through the shutters of his window, but was certain that Mr. Clark, a mile further on, would oblige us; how we went to Mr. Clark's, piloted by Peter, who was the only friend we found in that neck of woods, and could get nothing but a seat for one in a buggy with an old negro, at the moderate figure of two dollars, which seat Davis purchased and drove off; how Clark could not give us lodging, but gave us a drink of water without charging for it; how Mandult despaired when we told him in pantomime (neither of us understanding the language of the other) that we would have to walk on; what a dry time of it we had, wading silently till daylight through dust ankle deep, conceiling roots and stumps, to the great damage of our toes; how we got wet knee-deep in attempting to leap a stream which Mandult hopped over; how the dust then gave us a pair of yellow mud leggings; how Mandult, discovering three dead trees in a field nearly in a line, took them for telegraph poles, and shouted "telegraph!" how, while, we were blindly guessing by which to get a breakfast without saying "bal loon," a heavy-seat brick wagon came along, into which we jumped and jolted six or eight miles through a beautiful country; how we met a barouche which Davis had sent out to meet us, and how we rattled into Port Gibson, covered with mud, clay and brick dust; how we were lions in that town, and at Grand Gulf, and on board the Frank Lyon; how Davis took Mandult, threw his spangles and wheel a somerset whenever he found a man who doubted the story of our adventure, of which there were plenty; how we beheld the rare spectacle of a storm of rain in coming down the river, and how we landed here during the eclipse of the moon on Tuesday night—were all matters of which we could write lengthily, had we the time to do it or our readers the patience to read it.

We would now have no more hesitation in going aloft with Godard than we would in entering an omnibus, or sitting down to a good dinner. [Daily Crescent.

THE PROTRACTED DROUTH.—The protracted drouth which has prevailed throughout the Southern country—we may say all over the Union with here and there an exception—has already caused immense injury and threatens more. Should the weather of May prove as dry as that of April, the losses, in a pecuniary sense will be almost incalculable. But this is not the worst by a long ways. Provisions of all descriptions are now enormously high and steadily advancing. In view of anticipated short crops. If these anticipations, unfortunately turn out well founded, we may look for still further advances, which cannot fail to lead to distress among the poorer classes of our population, now bad enough off in all conscience.

A heavy, soaking rain, all over the country, at the present moment, would be worth millions, and tens of millions of dollars, while at the same time it would allay apprehensions—beginning to be painfully oppressive in many quarters—and not without cause, we are sorry to say.

As everything relative to this all-absorbing topic possesses a great degree of interest, we submit the following, from the pen of Major Blanchard, which was hand it us on Saturday, with pleasure. We have no idea how the major's theory if practically applied, would turn out, yet still we have no objection to seeing it put to the test:

The whole country is suffering for want of rain, and there is no prospect of any. Under such a dispensation of Providence, we must endure much misery unless a remedy can be found.

Now it is well known that Eesy proposed to regulate the seasons by immense fires, and whether his theory be true or not, there is no time now to discuss it, but we can try the experiment, and if it fails, we shall be no worse off than now. I therefore, proposes that the citizens of Louisiana, in the country and cities, should all unite on next Thursday morning, at 7 o'clock, and set fire to the piles of fuel which they can collect in the meantime—each planter on his plantation, and the cities as their authorities may direct.

This extensive and simultaneous conflagration will surely make a change in the atmosphere, and like burning prairies, will probably produce the rain so much needed.

Fellow citizens, let us try it.

ALEXR G. BLANCHARD.

New Orleans, April 28, 1855.

A PUBLIC CONVENIENCE.—It would be a great convenience to the people of several wealthy and popular parishes, if the Postmaster General would cause the mails to be carried over the Opelousas Railroad. He has, we believe, been petitioned on the subject, but refused to grant the request of the petitioners. We imagine that, if the matter was set before him in a proper light, he would reconsider his conclusion, and comply with the wish of the citizen interested. In fact, we are unable to see how he could do otherwise, assuming that he is anxious to discharge his duties and oblige a portion of the public when such a course would not inflict too serious a loss upon the department. In the case, however, to which we allude, the ends of economy and convenience would be subserved by making the change desired. If our friends in the interior move promptly, judiciously and unanimously, we think they will attain their object. If we can be of any assistance to them they can command our services.

In this connection we append the following, taken from the Franklin (St. Mary) Planters' Banner, of the 26th.

Railroad Connection—The "suspicious-looking" little steamer "Mary Jane" is now making tri-weekly trips between this place and Tigerville, connecting with the railroad by means of Holden's line of stages. This line was started, we learn, in consequence of the refusal of the Postmaster General to adopt the suggestion of our mail contractor, to employ the railroad as a mail carrier, which, had he acceded to, would have opened a direct mail communication by this route. We are not astonished at the refusal of the Postmaster General—for, being so far removed from us, it can hardly be expected that he should be aware of the great advantage to be derived by this change; but we are somewhat surprised that the people of Attakapas—at least the business portion of them—have not long ere this got up a petition to this effect. This would be of more utility in furtherance in the object than anything the contractor could say, who might be supposed to act alone from motives of personal interest, though in our opinion the general interest of this section would be quite as much subserved. A petition from the people would certainly meet with due consideration at Washington, and if in favor is of any value, it is surely worth asking for.

In relation to the recent extraordinary falling in of the bluff in the neighborhood of the Artesian well at Selma, Ala., the Reporter says:

The land slide has made but little progress since Saturday evening, at which time a large portion of the bluff, extending from the end of the railroad track, some fifty or seventy yards down the river, fell in. The wells in the vicinity are still dry. What will be the result, those can only conjecture. Various are the conjectures as to the cause and effect, and to give all the opinions would occupy more of our paper than we can spare. We believe, however, all agree that the bluff did actually fall in, and that the wells have ceased to afford any water.

THE SOCIALIST COLONY IN TEXAS.—The Dallas (Texas) Herald, of the 24th ult., says:

The colonists intended to settle the colony of M. Considerant and associates in this vicinity, are beginning to arrive. It is designed, we learn, to introduce during the present year between one and two thousand. The number will be added to by fresh arrivals each succeeding year.

M. Considerant and family will be here in the course of two or three weeks, for the purpose of taking up their permanent residence in the country.

DEATH OF "CURRER BELL."—The London News announces the death of "Currer Bell," (Charlotte Brunti) author of "Jane Eyre," "Shirley" and "Villette." The announcement will be received with regret in this country. She was the last survivor of three wonderful girls, the daughters of a clergyman, who, now very aged and infirm, survives his wife and all his many children.

SUBSTITUTE FOR SUGAR CANE.

One of the editors of the New York Journal of Commerce lately received a letter from a missionary in South Africa. The letter is quite readable, and contains considerable interesting information. From it we take the following extract, as it relates promptly to one of the leading staples of the "Sugar-bowl of the Union," as Louisiana has been facetiously styled:

I herewith send you a few seeds of a plant indigenous to this country, for the manufacture of which into sugar a patent has recently been obtained in England by a gentleman from this colony. These had rested in the patent office no doubt of its entire success, and that it will bring streams of gold into their pockets.

The plant is called Imfe (vowels as in French) by the Kafirs, but they distinguish some two dozen varieties by specific names. I send you three varieties, with names on each paper, viz.: Utshuna, Umcafari, Blanc. While growing it resembles broom-corn, and produces its seed after the same manner. The native of Natal plants it with indifference, and cultivates it in the same manner, and it comes to perfection in about the same time, say from three to four and a half months. They cultivate it wholly for its succharine juice, of which, under but slight pressure, it yields a much larger quantity than does the common sugar cane, but not of so rich a quality. Indeed I may say that the same bulk of juice contained from one-half to three-fourths as much sugar as the juice of common cane. The advantages are that very common canes are that it grows well wherever Indian corn does; it is raised from the seed in four months; is ready to be made into sugar; it grows on high land as well as on low; and the abundance of seed it produces may be used for provender for horses.

No matter in what manner this African production of sugar may be carried—even if it should double the production of the United States—it would not affect the sugar interests of Louisiana in the slightest degree, for the simple reason that their expenses of freight, insurance, transportation, etc., added to its original value, would bring it up to such a cost in this market that it could not begin to compete with the home crop. These expenses, without taking the distance into consideration, more effectually protect the Louisiana planter than would a thousand tariffs.

But if it will grow wherever Indian corn grows; matures as fruitfully on high grounds as on low; and if its seed furnishes good provender for horses in abundance, both the people and the horses will have a sweet time of it should the experiment succeed. There is no mistake about that. We will all become obeyed with sweetness, until our stomachs revolt at the very sight of sugar, and children, instead of crying for candy, will cry at the mere mention of a confectionery establishment. Sour, bitter manufactures will be in demand, and human invention will be racked to devise delicacies, the principal ingredients of which will be vinegar, wormwood and nobilities in general.

We presume the missionary intended to write that the plant would grow as readily as Indian corn in latitudes of the same parallel as South Africa; not that it would flourish in the cold climates of New England, Canada, Nebraska, Newfoundland or Norway. Such a proposition would be simply absurd, for it would be nonsensical. We raise Indian corn and sugar cane in perfection in Louisiana, and good Indian corn is raised in Maine and Canada, but no sugar cane, because of the severity of the climate. The plant is too tender for any but a warm and genial latitude. It is almost certain that the South African plant partakes of the qualities of its American cousin. If it does not, it will be strange indeed. We hope our New York cotemporary will experiment with the seed sent him at as early a day as possible, and give the result to the world. Probably it would be well to send the seed South, and make the first essay in the warmer section of the Union.

From China.

By a recent arrival at San Francisco, the following further particulars of the last attack upon Shanghai have been received:

They bombarded the city, and with 250 marines and sailors and 1500 Imperialists, attempted to storm the place. The French frigate La Jeanne D'Arc and steamer Dubord also firing into the city to protect the attacking column. The Insurgents maintained their ground with great determination, and hurled the Imperialists from the walls as fast as they ascended, for some time. The French behaved with great coolness and bravery, but Lieut Barbe was killed and Ensign Disory wounded in the first attack. The combat was maintained with great spirit from half-past 7 till about 11 a m, when the Insurgents drove the Imperialists back with much slaughter; and the French, finding that their Chinese allies were worse than useless, were compelled to retire within their lines. A few shots were fired subsequently from the French ships of war but about noon it seemed that the contest had been concluded for the day, and the Insurgents left masters of the city. We are informed that the French had 7 officers killed, 4 wounded, and 13 prisoners killed and 33 wounded. The officers killed are Lieut. Dutun and Ensign Pith; and wounded, Ensign Disory, Huys, Barbastain and Forestiers.

It is well known that on the rebel side at Canton as well as Shanghae, there are many foreigners. It is said there are fully 70 in the city of Shanghae, which may in a degree account for the discontinuance of the French in their hits attacks on that city.

The Chinese pirates appear to have recommenced their enterprises with increased audacity. The Mail announces the receipt of news of the capture by pirates of a bark and two lorchas sailing under the British flag. All their crews are believed to have been murdered.

The British war steamer Rattler, was despatched on the night of January 8th, in search of a fleet of twelve pirate junks, which had been cruising for weeks at the back of Hongkong Island; but her ship proved unsuccessful. She visited the piratical headquarters, but the junks were, at that time out on an expedition.

The steamer Chusan, on her way down the coast, from Shanghae to Hongkong, fell in with a junk in distress, on board of which were fourteen pirates, who were hauled over the main yard and hung at the yard arm.

The British steamer Hermes attacked a fleet of thirty pirate junks off Amoy, destroyed them; the rest escaped in a log. Six of the Hermes's crew were wounded.

A fleet of twenty-seven junks attacked a large Macadarin station on Nappa Island, killed one red-button Mandarin and upwards of 100 men, and captured three war-junks, belonging to the Imperialists.

A lorcha, having a large amount of treasure on board, shipped by Chinese, was captured off the harbor of Swatow by a fleet of five rebel jucks, after a hard fight of two hours.

The whole coast of China is reported to be swarming with pirates.

The British Consul at Canton, in view of the critical condition of affairs at that port, has notified his countrymen, resident there, who desire or expect protection, to register their names to the Consulate. The Americans in Canton have held an Indignation Meeting to denounce the unconcern of their Naval Commander.

LOUISIANA ITEMS.

—The Thibodaux Minerva of the 28th has the following paragraphs:

The Lafourche still continues to recede at this point. We had a pleasant shower of rain on Sunday last. Not enough, however, to do any good to the suffering crops.

Truth, if not public opinion, will bear us out when we assert that, as a general thing, the prospects of the sugar crop in the parish of Assumption are decidedly more flattering than in this parish. We noticed on our way down from Mr. Napoleonville on Tuesday last, a much better stand, both of ratoon and plant cane, in fact, at one of the plantations—that of Messrs. North & Talbot, the cane looks almost as well now as it usually does in the most favorable seasons. We would by no means wish to be understood as asserting that the entire crop of Assumption is of this character; for such is far from being the case. The planting interest in this whole section of the State is suffering greatly from the want of rain. With the exception of a few light showers, we had no rain since September last. The earth is almost completely parched; and our fields, from the great quantity of dust moved by the winds, present more the appearance of battle fields than anything else to which we can compare them. Should we not soon be favored with a rain we know not to what extent the growing crop will be damaged.

The Concordia Intelligencer of the 27th says:

The unparalleled drought still continues. The young cotton on the river bottoms seems doing well enough, and the corn shows itself very clear of weeds; but on the hill lands the soil is too dry to suffer the seed to sprout. It rests inactive in the ground.

The river has been on the rise slowly for the last week, but on Wednesday the white caps of foam became visible, indicating that some river above had got in earnest in giving aid to the freshet.

The Minden Gazette says:

We have had beautiful warm weather during the past week. A great time for planting cotton. We suppose the farms in this section are in excellent condition. The country is very healthy, so far as we can learn.

The Alexandria Democrat of the 25th says:

The heat is intense thus early, and all hope of rain is well nigh abandoned. We might say the crops were unfertilizing, but this might not be proper, as we have no crop to suffer. Never, in the history of this parish, has such a sad calamity befallen agriculture. Every thing is dried up, parched, ruined, and relief is not even probable. We begin to have faith in Cooper's drama, the goddess of which was kind enough to inform him that there would be no rain for seven years!

WEATHER AND CROPS IN ALABAMA.—The Mobile Tribune of Tuesday publishes the following:

A friend writing from Bethel, Wilcox co., under date of the 26th ult., remarks that "So far, everything in the agricultural way looks most promising; but this will not long be the case unless we have some rain. Very few planters have a stand of cotton and corn will not have much if rains. In consequence of the winter and spring being so favorable to out-door work, every farmer of any energy at all is ahead of his labor—has bestowed more attention upon the preparation of his land—preparing for the planting of sweet potatoes, curing for his stock and "smelling fire" about the farm, than upon any previous year of the sun sank behind a bank of clouds" yesterday evening, (Wednesday,) and if a sign, held in much esteem by many weather prognosticators be of any truth, it must rain before Sunday.

CLINTON AND P. H. RAILROAD.—By reference to an advertisement in another column, it will be seen that an arrangement has been effected by the Railroad Company with the steamer Laurel Hill, to connect three times a week at Port Hudson, on the downward trip of the steamer. This arrangement is one of great importance to our traveling public, as it will put them through to New Orleans the same day of leaving Clinton, in good style. It will be the quickest, best and cheapest route available—and can be relied on for permanency. [Clinton (La.) Whig.

The New York Tribune says:

The filibusters have opened offices in Broadway and other thoroughfares for the enlistment of men to serve in the war with Spain, and we hear that applications are quite numerous. The remnant of the Mexican volunteers, and a squadron of office-holders from the Custom-house stand godfathers to the new army, which is to be called the "Worth Legion."

Particulars of Foreign News.

BY THE STEAMER AFRICA.

HALIFAX, April 25.—The Royal Mail Steamship Africa, Capt. Harrison, from Liverpool on the 11th inst., arrived at this port last night, and will be due at Boston by or before noon on Thursday.

The St. Louis sailed from Southampton for New York on the morning of the 12th, having been detained some hours at Havre, on account of the 15th being a holiday.

The packet ship Nonpareil arrived at Liverpool on the 11th, in 14 days from Philadelphia.

The Russia prize ship Sitka arrived in the Downs on the 8th inst.

The ship Robert, bound to New Orleans, had put back to Liverpool in a damaged condition, having come in collision off Holyhead with the steamer North Carolina, from Philadelphia for Liverpool. The steamer sunk in about ten minutes, but no lives were lost.

The Vienna Conference.

The 44th Conference was held at Vienna on the afternoon of the 8th and lasted but one hour. The Russian Plenipotentiaries had not received their instructions. Drouyn de L'Huys and Ali Pacha were present. Nothing whatever is known as to the chances of agreement, nor is it known when the next meeting will be held. It is rumored that the Western Plenipotentiaries are about to quit Vienna—this however is considered doubtful. Everything at present seems at a stand-still. New complications are spoken of with Prussia, but of what nature is not stated. It is said that Ali Pacha's instructions are to assent to the joint protectorate of the Great Powers, but nevertheless to express the regret that the Sultan's sovereignty was not recognized. The question relative to indemnity for the war is deferred.

The War.

Nothing important had been received from Sebastopol up to April 8th. The position of both armies was unchanged. Night skirmishes on a small scale continued. The weather was fine and dry. An armistice of three hours had been allowed to bury the dead.—The Allies report themselves ready to open a general bombardment of the city.

The Russians have constructed two new batteries and have converted the ambuscades into an advanced parallel. The French are advancing towards the Malakoff works by a serpentine sap. Omar Pacha had not marched on the Alma as represented, but had occupied two villages half a league from Eupatoria, and had enlarged his circle of fortifications to shelter 5,000 men. The Allies were sending him that number as rapidly as possible. Ten thousand Egyptians had sailed for Eupatoria, and the French reinforcements, and those from Sardinia, would also land there shortly. An important statement is made that the Allies are changing their tactics in the Crimea, that they are about to fortify and hold as a material guarantee, the already strong position of Kamiesch with 20,000 men supported by the fleets. The embarkation of the Sardinian troops would commence from Genoa on the 15th, in the English steamers, for Constantinople, but the retreat of the Russians from Silistria rendered the further occupation of Gallipoli and Varna unnecessary. The Allies could not have operated in Bessarabia without the aid of Austria; and not to remain inactive, the expedition against Sebastopol was undertaken. The remainder of the document is occupied with pointing out the immense difficulties of the siege, and exonerating Napoleon, who planned the campaign. It also contains a copy of Marshal St. Arnaud's private instructions. The document has excited much interest at home and abroad, and is regarded as an apology for raising the siege.

Germany.

Discontent exists in Hanover against the King's attempt to restore the privilege of the nobles. Nothing from the other States.

Austria.

The Emperor of Austria's coronation will take place on the 18th of August. Sickness is reported in the Austrian army as a reason why it is not ready to take the field.

Italy.

Russian Count Patoohi is visiting all the Italian States, except Sardinia, assuring them of the friendship of Russia. He is said to have obtained assurances of neutrality from Tuscany and Naples. It is reported that the Duke D'Grammont, French Minister at Turin, will proceed to Rome to mediate in the difficulty between the Pope and Sardinia. Napoleon had purchased estates in the Roman Territory of Civita Nova. The Pope has had a narrow escape with his life from the accidental falling of a beam. Two cardinals were injured. Particulars not to hand.

Denmark.

The trial of the Ex-Minister before the Supreme Court is postponed till June 4th.

Russia.

St. Petersburgh advices are altogether indefinite as regards politics. They, however, reiterate that Russia will not make concessions. The cholera continues its ravages in St Petersburgh—on the 20th there were 200 deaths.

India.

The Overland mail has been telegraphed Calcutta dates to the 10th March and Bombay to the 18th. Trade in India was dull. News unimportant. No intelligence from China.

LATEST BY TELEGRAPH.

PARIS, Friday Evening.—There is no news of importance. The funds closed to-day as follows: Four-and-half per cents. 94 a 95; Three 1901. 56; Bank shares 20 01f.

Spain.

Advices from Spain to the 12th state that the Militia Law, with Marriga's amendment, had been adopted. Another attempt at an emeute had been repressed.

The Spanish Government has remitted to London the documents on which was demanded the recall of Lord Howden, the British Minister, for his interference in religious matters. In the Cortez the vote of confidence in the National Guard was carried, and the excitement had ceased, and Madrid was tranquil. The government has borrowed from capitalists 40,000,000 reals at 10 per cent.

England.

No later news from the Crimea. The Times' Paris correspondent writes: "It is rumored that we are to have another levy of 100,000 men in France, and that from 60,000 to 80,000 troops will be placed at the disposal of Austria, should war be the issue of the Conference at Vienna."

The last accounts from the Northern ports of Europe show that navigation would probably be quite opened by the 20th inst.

Although nothing definite can transpire till Monday, various statements are hazarded as to the terms of the announced loan, and fifteen million pounds is set down as the sum required.

Commercial Intelligence.

LIVERPOOL COTTON MARKET.—The business in Cotton had again been large, but without animation or improvement in prices, the market closing tamely. The calm was attributed to spinners having laid in a sufficient stock to enable them to resist an advance. At the opening of the week the demand was active, but towards the close the demand fell off, the market becoming quieter. The better qualities of American Middling Uplands were in rather short supply. The week's sales amounted to 70,000 bales, including 15,000 for speculation, and 7 800 for export. The sales on Friday were 10,000 bales, including 4000 for export and speculation. All the circulars repeat the quotations as follows: Fair Orleans, 5⅝d; Middling, 5¼d; Fair Mobile, 5⅜d; Middling, 5¼ to 5 3 16d; Fair Uplands, 5⅝d; Middling, 5 1-16 to 5¼d; Ordinary 5⅛ to 5⅜d; Inferior, 3 to 4d. The stock on hand is 665,000 bales, including 449,000 American.

LIVERPOOL BREADSTUFFS MARKET.—The market is generally quiet. Prices are unchanged. The Brokers' circular says: Wheat has been extremely inactive throughout the week, prices turning cheaper. In Flour a moderate retail business has been done at previous rates. Indian Corn is in fair request for Ireland, but last week's prices are barely maintained. Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co.'s circular reports Breadstuffs very quiet, the market favoring buyers. Western Canal Flour, 42s for old, and 37 to 38s for new; Baltimore and Philadelphia, 42s 6d to 43s for old, and 40 to 41s for new; Ohio, 43s 6d to 44s; Canada, 40 to 41s; Sour, 38 to 40s. White Wheat, 11s 10d to 12s 4d; Red, 10s 4d to 11s 2d. Yellow Corn, 42s 6d to 42s 9d; Mixed, 42s; White, 41s 6d to 42s. The weather continued backward.

LIVERPOOL PROVISION MARKET.—H. Spence & Co. report Beef in fair retail demand with prices somewhat favoring purchasers. Pork quiet. The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

"Not I," he replied. "Look out, I am going shovel up."

So saying, Mr. Drinkwater began to send up the earth, which lay piled around him. I stood looking on, meditating whether it would be practicable to follow that rascal Shannon, and make him restore his plunder.

As the earth in the hole was removed, a large lump of quartz was exposed to view, which quite filled one side of the hole, and had compelled Sam to reduce the tunnel he was opening to very small dimensions.

"There's a nice convenient thing to have in a hole," observed Sam, striking his shovel against the quartz.

"I tell you what, Sam," said I, "I should like to see what's under that block. Gold has been found in such places as that before now, especially with a slaty bottom."

"Not much chance, I am afraid," said Sam. "And yet it is a likely clay, eh." But, then, "it's the good of a likely clay to a man with my luck?"

"Never mind your luck; I'll go and get a crowbar." After some trouble, I succeeded in borrowing that implement, and after excavating round the block, we tried to raise it. For a long time it would not budge an inch, till at one great struggle the stone was lifted just enough to enable me to see under it; but while I stooped to prop it up, the crowbar slipped, and the block fell into its place again. Sam, whose back had been turned to the stone, to enable him to get a greater purchase, turned round puffing, and exclaimed that he would shove no more.

"Sam," said I, gasping a little, "keep cool, old fellow; there's gold under it. I saw it. Mick Shannon has cheated himself, and no mistake."

"Hurrah!" cried Sam, "we'll soon have it up then;" and he seized the crowbar.

"Stop," said I, "recollect it is getting near nightfall. Better leave it as it is. I don't mind helping you to have a look, though." And while I propped the stone, Sam picked out some small nuggets, which there could be no mistake about. It was with some difficulty that Mr. Drinkwater could be got home; and I am inclined to believe that he took several walks during the night in the direction of his hole, feeling uneasy in his mind, except when he could see the moon shining on his block of quartz.

The next day, we took one hundred and twenty-eight ounces of gold from under that block; and although I worked afterwards at the hole for some weeks, no more was found. As for Sam, on the morning following, he came to my tent with his blankets on his back.

"I am off," said he.

"Good-bye, then. I wish you luck in New Zealand."

"No need of that," replied he; "a man with health and strength, and three hundred pounds to stock a farm, can do without luck in New Zealand."

"Happy country."

"And remember this," continued Sam; "if ever you should get tired of knocking about, and want a quiet home, or if there should come a time when you are poor, and want a friend, don't be afraid to write, for you will have him in Sam Drinkwater."

And with these words Mr. Drinkwater squeezed my hand, and went on his way.

A "COUP DE SALON."

A singular incident occurred a short time since in one of the elegant salons of the Chaussée d'Antin, where a ball had assembled a numerous and brilliant company.

A few years ago, in one of the principal cities of one of our southern departments, a love-match united two young and amiable persons, under the most favorable auspices. Their mutual passion had awakened such a lively sympathy, and excited such an interest for them in the city, that the relatives were obliged to give their consent to their marriage, which they had at first refused.

These romantic unions look bright and smiling at first, but they are not always happy. And thus it was in the case in question. Soon passion was extinguished, concord ceased, and storms prevailed. Which was wrong? Both, without doubt. Hostilities reached such a pitch that to live together was impossible; the relatives interfered, and a family tribunal pronounced a separation indispensable. They had each brought a small but equal dowry into the general fund; each took their own; the wife returned to her family, and the husband went to Paris, as the best place to enjoy his liberty.

In Paris he felt the need of amusement. Doubtless he sorrowfully grieved over the separation he had so eagerly sought; such a contradiction is the human heart! The young husband, once more a bachelor, seeking to dissipate his ennui, threw himself with much zeal and as little prudence into the whirl of pleasure, that in a short time he was completely ruined.

Family misfortunes destroyed his hope of assistance in that quarter, and he was forced to rely alone upon himself. Various expedients failed, and after many vain efforts he was forced to fall back upon his accomplishments. He was a good musician, playing the violin, and he endeavored to obtain scholars, without success, however, and he was obliged to engage as a member of a quadrille band.

Thus it was that he was present at a fête in the Chaussée d'Antin, a short time ago. Concealed in the group of musicians, he contributed sadly to the pleasures of the evening, his melancholy glance wandering over the assembly. When he perceived a lady, young, beautiful, graceful, richly attired, sparkling with jewels, and surrounded by an admiring crowd. He recognized his wife, who was just taking her place for the dance before the orchestra. The violin slipped from his hands, and the unhappy artist fell fainting upon the stage. They hastened to the poor musician, raised him up, and bore him to an adjoining room.

The young lady, ignorant of the cause, approached, recognized her husband, and in her emotion exclaimed: "Edward! Is it possible! Edward!"

A few moments after, the musician recovered his senses, opened his eyes, and seeing his wife alone with him, said: "Fear nothing, Madame. You have come to request discretion. I will not speak; I will not shame you by saying who I am. Be assured, and return to the ball."

"Yes," replied she; "but you will return with me. I will remain until you are able to accompany me."

Then, leading the stupified musician, she reentered the ball-room, saying to the guests: "Permit me to introduce my husband!"

It was a good thought—a return of tenderness—and a better explanation could not have been given of the words that all had overheard.

They were reunited, and the husband shares the brilliant position his wife enjoys through a large inheritance. They will doubtless be happy, for both are wiser than they were.

EXTRAORDINARY WELL.—In an interesting letter to the New York Courier and Enquirer, Mr. E. Merian, the New York meteorologist, states that there is in Lockport, N. Y., an Artesian well 400 feet in depth, from the bottom of which rises a vein of salt water, holding in combination a large per centage of diliquescing chlorides, which mingling with waters of other veins, produce instant crystallizations of beautiful saleratus, in flattened eight-sided prisms of about an inch in length, an eighth of an inch in width, and a sixteenth of an inch in thickness. The lamina of these are so perfect that a single crystal may be divided, by means of heat, into two dozen distinct sheets. This well is peculiar in more respects than one. It is accustomed to spout salt water for but a few moments at a time, and then subsiding, remains quiet for the space of an hour, at the conclusion of which it again begins to puff and roar and shoot forth its saline jets. When the workmen were sinking this well, the auger, upon attaining a depth of 265 feet, fell suddenly about 14 feet, and reached the bottom of a subterranean river, flowing with so strong a current as to produce a perceptible motion in the upper part of the stem of the auger.

One of the most remarkable features of the liquor law lately enacted by the Legislature of New York, is, that with all its pains and penalties against the traffic in spirituous and intoxicating liquors, it places no restrictions on the manufacture of the article. Manufacturers are allowed to make as much liquor as they please, and of any kind or quality which they may wish, provided they sell it beyond the limits of the State. Protracted meetings are being held by the liquor dealers in all parts of the city. They assemble nightly in nearly every ward, and it is said that at these revivals the "power of the spirit" is abundantly manifested.

A FRENCH STORY.

The winding up of a romance in real life has recently taken place in the quasi official world of Paris. Thus runs the story:

At a Court ball, some twenty years since, a young officer of the French cavalry met and was charmed by a beautiful English girl. He obtained an introduction, and danced with her as often as he could, without challenging the remark of his Grace, the young lady's papa. Our hero was handsome, amiable, witty, and in every way a person to win the good will of the fair sex. He was of good family, and had the aristocratic de affixed to his name, although he could boast no patrimonial estate.

The young lady was of England's privileged class, both noble and wealthy. This, however, our lover did not know when first he bowed before the charms of her beauty. Love begets love, and women are grateful; and the fair girl returned the young soldier's devotion. They met often—how or where we can not say; but, Paris is large, and English customs are convenient for young people. This was all charmingly agreeable, but unsatisfactory; for theirs was a flirtation with a serious intention affixed to it—marriage!

At length our heroine discloses her wishes to her parents. They are horrified; their daughter marry a Frenchman! Merely a lieutenant, a man without estate! It was not to be thought of. She listens to this decision in tears. A first weakness passed, however, she feels Nature's dictates and the strength which love gives. She next boldly and firmly declares to her parents that she loves the young officer with her whole heart, and him alone will she marry. They will not permit her to judge of her own happiness; she can wait till she is of age, when the clergyman may marry them without parental leave.

My Lord and My Lady are made conscious that their fair and gentle daughter has a will of her own, and also a patient determination to gratify that will. They come to parley, and enter into negotiations with the young couple. The lovers are to be separated for two years; it shall not be considered an engagement, and the young lady shall receive the addresses of other suitors.

On the other hand, the lovers are to be permitted to correspond, and if they remain lovers at the end of two years, they shall marry with full consent and approbation.

The young lady consoles her anxious lover with assurance that her love is unchanged, and that the two years' absence will only serve to prove their affection for each other, and endear them to one another still more.

They part. The English party return home. During a month they exchange letters daily, and such letters! Of what a length, and how full of terms of endearment! How poor language seemed to them.

But one day our fair heroine listened in vain for the postman's knock, so well known to every Londoner. He came not. The next day passed, and the next, and no tidings; and thus many days passed, and brought disappointment only. Weeks lengthened into months, and no letter cheered the sick heart of the poor girl. The third month came round, and her hopes became faint. Then My Lady consoled with her daughter, upbraided the young soldier, and urged my acceptance of Lord —— as a suitor for her hand.

"It was thus that a true English heart should resent an insult. Three months more passed. Meanwhile the unhappy damsel writes letters, and sends them in every possible way, in the hope of obtaining an explanation of this long silence. None comes; doubt becomes conviction—she is deserted. She stifles the love in her heart, and pride comes to strengthen her self-respect. Having no longer a desire of her own, she yields to that of her mother. "My Lady, I will marry Lord ——, but since I have so decided, let us be married quickly."

It was done. Fifteen years pass by. Our heroine is a widow. Five years more, and My Lady lies ill unto death.

She calls her daughter to her bedside, and confesses that she had detained the letters of the young officer—that he had been faithful. The proofs of it were by the hundred in such a desk. My Lady dies. Our heroine seeks those letters of the lover of her youthful days, and finds heaps of his, and also those she had written in the vain hope of obtaining an explanation of his silence.

Twenty years of disappointment were forgotten in reading the ardent expressions of affection and devotion which they breathed. She was young again, and her heart had known no care—it was again the spring-time of her life. She took the letters with her, and went to Paris.

She sought information from the Minister of War, of him who was lieutenant in the cavalry in 1834. The authorities replied that the lieutenant at that time was now Commander-General, and that he was now stationed in one of the Southern Departments. The widow wrote to the General that she was at Paris, and desired to see him. He obtained leave of absence, and hastened to meet the lady. All is explained, and our lovers are married. To be sure, the General is no longer young; but his manners have the same charm, and his elegance and style lessen his apparent ago. The lady carries her inadmissible forty years as if they numbered but thirty. The latter twenty years of their lives are likely to be happier than either of the first.

And so ends a real-life romance, that is very like one in a story book.

AN ADROIT AND VERY DISHONEST YOUNG LADY.—The Tuskegee Republican gives the following account of the breaking up of a system of depredations which had, for a long time, been carried on against the East Alabama Female College:

From time to time fresh incursions were made upon the wardrobes and other property of the girls, and their finest and most valuable articles disappeared before the ravages of the plunderer. Silk and muslin frocks, talmas, work-boxes, jewelry of almost every description, portemonnaies, with all their contents; in fact, all sorts of things that young ladies usually have at College, whether for convenience or ornament, were laid hold of and carried off, and no clue could be obtained as to who it was done by. The President, Mr. Bacon, was indefatigable in his efforts to unravel the mystery, but without any success. Perhaps it is not too much to say that he was suffering mental torture, while the institution over which he presides with great dignity and appropriateness, was suffering both in reputation and in purse, for several of the students, rather than be annoyed by such constant pillage, had gone home.

But detection came at last. One day a girl, who had formerly been a student at the College, but who, having left, continued a habit of visiting the young ladies, had the boldness to wear, during one of these visits, one of the very dresses which she had purloined. The young lady to whom it belonged recognized it, and after the girl had left informed Mr. Bacon of the fact. She was immediately sent after and brought back. She denied that she had stolen it, or that it was the dress that was lost. But a search at the house of her parents established her guilt. Nearly all the articles that were taken were found there and brought back; a few she had so disposed of as to be beyond recovery. And thus the mystery of months has been solved, and we are happy in having it to say, that in consequence the young ladies who had left the College are returning.

It could answer no good purpose to mention the name of the girl who was the plunderer. Her parents live about three or four miles from the town, are exceedingly poor, and there can be no doubt they were cognizant of what their daughter was doing. The girl herself is about fourteen years of age, and must have a good deal of shrewdness to enable her to carry on so large a system of stealing without being even suspected.

SIZE OF LONDON.—London extends over an area of 78,029 acres, or 122 square miles, and the number of its inhabitants, rapidly increasing, was some 2,362,239 on the day of the last census. A conception of this vast mass of people may be formed by the fact that, if the metropolis was surrounded by a wall, having a north gate, a south gate, an east gate, and a west gate, and each of the four gates were of sufficient width to allow a column of persons to pass out freely four abreast, and a peremptory necessity required the immediate evacuation of the city, it could not be accomplished under four and twenty hours, by the expiration of which time the head of each of the four columns would have advanced a no less distance than seventy-five miles from their respective gates, all the people being in close file, four deep.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where valuable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on no uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

DR. JOHN BECKWITH,	WILLIAM MCNUTT,
HON. S. O. PERRY,	H. W. KIMBALL,

R. C. BARROW,	JOHN W. ERICKSON,
D. L. DINSMORE,	REV. DUNCAN BROWN,
COL. ISAAC DANE,	JEROME B. PILLOW.

S. GRISWOLD & CO.

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and make well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not, their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be.

THE METHODIST DENOMINATION has long felt the need of a suitable Music Book, for Church, Conference, Social, and Camp Meetings; one of suitable size, to be conveniently handled, and one which should comprise the best Hymns, familiar to the denomination, set to appropriate music. We have the pleasure of announcing that such a book has been prepared, with much labor and care, by B. HABBARD, Esq., author of "Songs of Canaan," Musical Gems, Temperance Melodist, etc., etc.; assisted by Rev. W. MCDONALD, of the Maine Conference, author of the Wesleyan Minstrel. The book bears the title of

THE WESLEYAN SACRED HARP.

The authors say in their preface: "Our object in compiling this book, is to supply a denominational want which is felt, and often expressed by our preachers and people. . . . We commit the work to God and his children, praying that all who sing from these pages on earth, may sing the new song in Heaven forever."

We are pleased to know that so far as it has been examined, the Harp meets the strong approbation of the denomination, and we trust that it will soon be in general use.

Zion's Herald, Boston, speaks thus of this work: "This book is, without doubt, one of the very best of its class. We like it because its pages are not disfigured by the light doggrel which sometimes finds its way into similar works. The hymns in this volume are mostly from our own hymn book. We cheerfully recommend it to all who feel the need of such a work."

From the Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati, Ohio: "We commend the Wesleyan Harp most cordially to the singing members of the church, especially all such as believe in praising God."

Price single, 50 cents half bound; 62½ cents full cloth. Also, per hundred, $40 half bound; $50 full cloth.

Bells! Bells! Bells!!!

For Churches, Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Plantations, etc., made, and a large assortment kept constantly on hand by the Subscribers, at their old established and enlarged Foundry, which has been in operation for Thirty Years, and whose patterns, and process of manufacture are so perfected, that their bells have a world-wide celebrity for volume of sound and quality of tone. The present Proprietors have recently succeeded in applying the process of loam moulding in Iron Cases to Bell Casting—which secures a perfect casting and even temper; and as an evidence of the unimpaired excellence of their Bells, they have just received—Jan. 1854—the FIRST PREMIUM (A Silver Medal) of the World's Fair in New York, over all others, several from this Country and Europe being in competition; and which is the 16th Medal, besides many Diplomas, that have been awarded them. They have patterns for, and keep on hand, Bells of a variety of tones of the same weight, and they also furnish to order Chimes of any number of bells, or key, and can refer to several of their make throughout the States and Canada. Their Hangings, comprising many recent and valuable improvements, consist of Cast Iron Yoke, with movable arms, and which may be turned upon the Bell; Spring acting on the Clapper, prolonging the sound. Iron Frame, Tolling Hammer, Counterpoise, Stop, etc. For steamboats, Steamships, etc., their Improved Revolving Yoke, or Fancy Hangings in Brass or Bronze of any design furnished. We can supply whole sets, or parts, of our Improved Hangings, to rehang Bells of other construction, upon proper specifications being given. Old Bells taken in exchange.

Surveyors' Instruments of all description made and kept on hand.

Being in immediate connection with the principal routes, in all directions, either Railroad, Canal or River, Orders can be executed with dispatch, which, either personally or by communication, are respectfully solicited.

DR. JOHN S. DARE'S STEEL SHOULDER BRACE AND ABDOMINAL SUPPORTER.—These instruments, invented by Dr. Dare, of Virginia, are superior to any other for supporting the back, expanding the chest, and securing an erect form, so essential to health, vigor and good appearance. The ease with which they are worn, possessing great elasticity, which is never lessened by use, and being adapted to every movement of the body without constraint, will secure for them a large and extensive sale.

Having examined the above instruments, I certify that they are admirably adapted to further the purpose intended. WARREN STONE, M. D.

Panama Route.

THE ISTHMUS—NEW GRENADA.

The charming letter of Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald gave our readers a vivid conception of the route to California by Nicaragua. We republish, from the S. C. Advocate, Bishop Andrew's letter of the Panama route, with his comments upon the topography, geography, history and society of that portion of the Continent. He writes March 14th,

"Having travelled by railroad from Aspinwall to Panama in three hours—a railroad fifty miles long and costing seven millions of dollars—and his party was left behind for a night, by being half an hour too late.—

It was miserable management on the part of the managers on the eastern side of the Isthmus, and our passengers, feeling themselves badly treated, resolved to insist on indemnity from the Company, through the intervention of the U. S. Consul. The Company at length consented to pay the passengers thus detained a dollar and a half till the steamship on the Pacific was ready to receive us on board (this would about pay our board at the meanest hotels of the place) but nothing for our incidental expenses, which were heavy, as you pay three or four prices for every thing, and if you make out to live at all, you must pick up a hundred incidental comforts outside of your boarding house. Bro. A. was quite sick, so much so as to induce me to call in a physician, a Dr. Burgard, formerly from Missouri, where his family still resides. He attended with unremitting assiduity, and refused to take any pay, stating that he had not been in the habit of charging ministers of the gospel anything. May God abundantly bless him for his kindness. My devoted and faithful companion is now so far recovered as to be able to resume her journey. I have been in many places, but Panama is the last at which I should like to fall sick, for in addition to miserable cots on which to lie, there is nothing to be procured for the sick to eat. In the first place there is scarcely any thing to be got in the place; and in the second place you had it nobody knows how to prepare it; and in third place you have a Catholic church in every squure, and the perpetual tingling of their bells is enough to distract any sick body. The climate of Panama is as hot as July, and there is very seldom much variation of temperature.

The soil of the Isthmus is rich, and vegetation luxuriant almost beyond conception: the cocoon nut trea laden with its fruits, in every stage of its growth, the banana, plantain, pine apple and bread fruit, flourish richly and in abundance in the woods; it is said that cotton also does well; but the inhabitants are too incorrigibly lazy to cultivate any thing. While the country belonged to Spain, and white slavery existed, there were, it is said, a number of fine plantations, but this is emphatically a free country now—every body is free. The consequence is that there is little or no cultivation of the soil—nature supplies the native with everything which is absolutely essential to his existence: the consequence is that he will rarely use much exertion to obtain any thing beyond. The emigration to California, by affording profitable employment to so large a number of mules and their owners, awakened in them a desire for accumulation, and since then the employment of a large number of natives on the railroad, and their necessary intercourse with energetic and enterprising Americans, has created a necessity for the acquisition of money in order to gratify their newly discovered wants. This new impulse has roused their sluggish natures a little, but the labor of cultivating the soil is too much for their energy. They will engage in any little matter of trade or picking up a few dimes by carrying passengers to and from the Pacific steamships, which affords them a sort of semi-monthly harvest, for be it observed we have no wharves here to which your steamer may fasten herself, and afford you every facility for stepping directly on board. Instead of this you take a boat at Panama, and after rowing about a mile and a half, you reach your ship and clamber on board, and if the weather should happen to be stormy, it is no very comfortable job.

The city of Panama, like many other Spanish cities, is walled in, though the sea in several places has made breaches in the walls, which I should suppose would at any time have afforded very small protection to those enclosed within its circle. It is a city of Catholic churches. I understand that the place is supposed to contain some eight thousand inhabitants, and there are some fourteen churches, many of them quite large. Just opposite the house where I first stopped are the ruins of the old Jesuit College, which must have been, judging from its ruins, a very large and probably an imposing edifice; but it was destroyed by order of the government some time during the last century, when the Jesuits were banished from the country for improper intermeddling with the affairs of government. Some few years since they attempted to re-establish themselves in the republic, and a large number of them landed in Panama, but the authorities took charge of them and left them the option of instantly leaving the country, selecting their place, and going thither at their own expense, or of being sent away at the will of government. They chose the former alternative and were sent across the Isthmus to Aspinwall, and from thence sailed to some of the West India Islands.

During the revolutionary struggle which resulted in the establishment of the republic of New Grenada, a large proportion of the Catholic clergy took part with Spain, and not a few of them were found fighting in her armies. When the struggle was over and New Grenadian independence achieved, most of these ecclesiastics left the country either voluntarily or otherwise. This left the country rather bare of Priests, and what was worse, planted the fraternity in a rather suspicious attitude toward the government. The supremacy of the church over the civil power has been repudiated, and the government at one time took the church under its wing, paying the clergy out of the public treasury and reserving to itself the right of appointing the priests, and like many other modern political economists, they made the drafts upon the public chest as light as possible. Under such a state of things it was not likely there would be any superabundance of priests, nor that they would be of the most exalted character. Subsequently the civil power has said to the church we have nothing to do with you, make as many priests as you please, but you must pay them yourself. This movement, which brings matters just where they ought to be, has not very materially improved the character of the clergy or the church. If one is to judge of the prospects of the Catholic Church here from the looks of their church edifices, wasting and decay are fast stealing over it. The churches look old and dilapidated. I remember one near my boarding house in which decay is visible every where; the timbers within it, and the wooden frames and gratings of its windows are all rotting, and some of them have fallen entirely out. There is reason to think too that the priests have not a very commanding position or powerful influence with the community. The people see and acknowledge that their ministers do but little or nothing towards the improvement of the public morals. Indeed, they do much to destroy good morals. It is nothing unusual for them to drink to intoxication, and they are not strangers at the gambling table or the cock pit. In this state of things there is every reason to apprehend that the people, losing the proper respect for religion, as they see it exhibited, will drift into entire infidelity.

It is known that in the republic of New Grenada, whilst there is a formal recognition of the Roman Catholic as the religion of the country, there is entire toleration accorded to all sects of Christians, and should the Church send any number of intelligent devoted missionaries to this country, men full of faith and the Holy Ghost, who would qualify themselves to preach in the Spanish language, and who would come prepared to devote themselves with apostolic zeal and perseverance to evangelising this people, not commencing a quarrel with the Roman Church, but exhibiting the truths of the glorious gospel of the grace of God as they affect the experience of each individual, and exhibiting these precious truths in life and heart—such an one would be no doubt cordially received, and be eminently useful. The Protestant Church has been talking and writing and praying about liberty of conscience. Now here, just at our doors, God has opened our way, and we are invited to enter and occupy the ground, and yet what has the Protestant Church in the U. S. done for the sister republic of New Grenada? The Seamen's Friend Society employs a chaplain for seamen, who has fitted up a small chapel in his house, where he preaches regularly most of the time to small congregations with but small encouragement. He has persevered in his work with patient perseverance, and has done good in distributing a large number of Spanish Bibles and Testaments and Tracts, thus sowing seed which will hereafter bring forth good fruits, but he does not feel himself sent to the natives; his mission is especially to the foreign residents here who speak the English language—in my humble judgment the most unlikely portion of the community to be largely profitted by his labors, for the simple reason that almost all of that class regard themselves as mere birds of passage, and because of that fact as scarcely amenable to the laws of a decent Christian morality, such as they would respect at home. Hence many of them seem determined, during the time they are here, to indemnify themselves for past restraints. They despise the Catholic religion as mummery, and hate the gospel, because of its sacred and holy restraints, and many who at home were regarded respectable members of the Church have here cast it all away, and it would awaken many a pang could wives and daughters at home know what passes in Panama. These men are a great hindrance to the work of God in such a country as this. They sin with a high hand, and usually finish their career in two or three years, because of dissipation. There ought to be a preacher here who would labor mainly for the natives: let him gather the few faithful who might be rallied, organize a little church here in the wilderness—let the ordinances in gospel simplicity be administered, and let all hands stir each other up to the accomplishment of this great work. God would certainly bless such an effort. O that I could wake up the Southern Methodist Church to enter with earnest zeal upon this glorious work! Oh, where is our zeal for God? The Jesuits went every where to propagate their cherished dogmas, and to subject the nations of the earth to the Papal dominion; no dangers appalled them; however savage the tribe, however distant the journey, however much the fatigue, or great the privation, nothing deterred them. The world was to be conquered and made tributary to their sovereign God the Pope; and we Protestants and Methodists, glorying in our purity of creed and our glorious plans of operation, fold our arms and ask about good circuits and good stations and easy work, and shrink from distant fields and hard work; and our people talk of hard times, and grumble about missionary contributions, and sometimes the preachers wink at it; and the people build fine houses and buy fine plantations, and negroes to make their children rich, and deck their daughters and their wives with jewelry to more than quadruple the amount of their missionary contributions. And so we are going, preachers and people, and if God grant us not a re-baptism and re-conversion, I know not what we shall come to before long. My heart is full of this subject, and I wish that I could infuse this spirit into the Church every where. What are our colleges and our young men good for, if these fields are to be neglected? God wake up the Churches."

"HE LEFT A VERY LARGE PROPERTY."

This is the closing sentence of a recent obituary, and it suggests some reflections.

What a pity he was obliged to leave it! He had taken great delight in accumulating it. As he added field to field, farm to farm, he had looked with pride upon his extended domain, conscious that he was the largest land-holder in his town. His cattle, if not wandering upon a thousand hills, ranged over more than that number of acres of rich pasturage. Stocks, notes, bonds, mortgages, crowded his safe. And it was all the fruit of his own industry, energy, and good judgment. The rust of usury and the canker of extortion had not soured any of his gold. It was well and fairly earned, and he loved it all the more because it was so. It grieved him to leave this large property, to depart from the world as poor as he came into it, and to enter the other world utterly destitute of the wealth he so much loved in this. But he had to leave it, every cent of it.

He might have taken it with him. Rather let me say, he might have sent it forward in advance of him. As the capitalist, who contemplates moving to a foreign country, converts his property into drafts, and remits from time to time to the land of his future residence, so he might have made remittances to that undiscovered country; so that on his arrival there, he would find abundant treasures laid up in heaven for him. Every dollar which he had given (consecrating it with sincere prayer) to assist in carrying the glad tidings of salvation to the ends of the earth—every contribution in aid of the many Christian enterprises for the glory of God and the good of man—every cup of cold water given to a disciple in the name of a disciple—every tear of pious sympathy for the suffering—every gift of kindly charity to the needy—would have added to the store of his "durable riches." He might have been rich towards God, and a joint heir with Jesus Christ to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. If it was sad for him to leave that large property, how much sadder that he sent none of it before him!

It is much more pleasant to go to, than to leave a large property. The man who, poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith, closes his eyes upon this life, goes to take possession of a large property. He owned not a foot of land on earth; but for him "sweet fields beyond the flood stand dressed in living green." His food here was coarse, perhaps scanty; but there, he will eat freely from the tree of life which yields twelve manner of fruits. His garments here were plain and poor; but there he shall be clothed in white robes, washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. He associates here with those who are despised and rejected of men; but there his companions will be an innumerable company of angels and the general assembly and Church of the first-born. Who would not rather go to a large property than to leave it?—Vermont Chronicle.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

REPENTANCE.

This was the theme that employed all the talents of the inspired forerunner of Jesus Christ, and engaged the profound attention of the listening multitudes of Judea and regions round about. This was the theme that was first heard to fall from the lips of Him who "spake as never man spake," when he began to teach that the long looked for "Kingdom of Messiah" was at hand. This was the first principle taught in that gospel, that was to spread peace, joy and contentment throughout the earth, wherever its glad sound was heard. It is one of the pillars upon which Jesus Christ built his spiritual kingdom, the expanding motion of which is, to cover the earth with a knowledge of the Lord, and take under its protection the people of the whole earth. Under the shadow of this mighty rock, then, let us sit and die course on one of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity:

ITS ORTHODOXY.

This will stand or fall with the Bible, being one of its chief doctrines, and so interwoven that the two cannot be separated. It has been received as a sound doctrine in all ages of the world, both under the Jewish and Christian dispensations. This will appear from the abundant proof contained in the Scriptures, and found in the lives of the kings and prophets of the Jews and Apostles of our Lord. All these not only believed and taught the doctrine, but were often exercised in it. But that it is an orthodox doctrine more fully and sufficiently appears from the fact that it was taught by the Saviour of sinners himself. "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand," —Matt. iv., 17.

ITS NATURE.

"Repentance is sometimes used generally for a change of mind, and an earnest wishing that something were undone that has been done." This may be evangelical or otherwise. If it proceede from the fact that we are brought to suffer on account of our crimes, and not from the fact of the crimes themselves being offensive to God, we term it eclipsh and unscriptural. On the other hand, if our sorrow proceede from a sense of injustice to God, without taking into consideration our own suffering only in a secondary sense, we term it evangelical; provided it attaches to it the hating and the leaving of sin, and a continual tendency towards God, through the means instituted for our recovery and pardon.

Repentance implies a knowledge of sin, and our utter hopelessness while out of Christ.

Without this knowledge it would be impossible for us to understand the nature of our offences; and how could we sorrow or repent for something we know nothing about? It teaches that sin is the violation of God's law, and that we have not ceased thus to do since we have arrived at the years of accountability; also, that to violate this law is to pull down the judgment of God upon us, and, as far as we can, heap dishonor on the Name that purchased salvation for us with the price of his own most precious blood. Evangelical repentance is a sorrow wrought in the heart of man by the operation of the Spirit of God. Through the agency of this Spirit we are made to feel the keenest pangs of sorrow and sorest distress, not as a merit of justification, but on account of our sins, a knowledge of which is revealed to us through the light of this Spirit.

Neither is it often the case that the proud heart of man can be subdued without being shaken over the nethermost hell; nor can he be induced to cry, "Lord, save me!" until, like sinking Peter, he finds himself half-swallowed up, not in Tiberias, but in the lake of fire! Though this sorrow is wrought in the heart it does not worst our condition; neither is the Spirit of God the source of such sorrow; but the light that opens our eyes on the brink of eternal woe, and shows us that sin is the cause that makes the frowns of our insulted Redeemer rest so heavily upon us.

Repentance is the forsaking of sin. This is a natural thing in rational beings; to leave off or abandon those things which are the source of all their sorrows. Yet, strange as it may appear, it is often the case that we cling to our sins, though we know them to be the cause of our deepest distress. We can attribute this only to the weakness and corruptness of our nature, and the complete sway held over us by our enemy. In most instances, however, when the above principles of repentance are truly experienced, this will follow.

Again, repentance is a strong cleaving to God, with an earnest desire of justification. An ardent desire not only to know, sorrow for and forsake sin, but to be with God; to abide and walk in him, not in a sinful state, but in a justified one; and desiring with all the heart to be like God, as well as in him, that we may be filled with his love, endued with his Spirit, washed with his blood and qualified for his eternal kingdom.

ITS USE.

The use of repentance is to prepare the heart for a deeper work of grace, termed "justification and regeneration." If we wish to produce a luxuriant growth from the earth, we thoroughly break up and pulverize the ground before we cast the seed in. So repentance is used to break up the fallow ground of the heart, that when the seed is cast therein it may not only spring up through justification, regeneration and adoption, but grow to perfection, bringing forth its fruit—love, joy, meekness, &c.

It is as a gate to spiritual happiness, through which we pass to pluck the fruit of the Tree of Life, which stands in the midst of the second Garden of Paradise. We feed awhile on joy, until we are filled to overflowing; then we taste of hope, sweet hope, which tells us that ere long we shall abide where the fruit is most perfect. Again, we reach hither the hand of faith, and pluck peace, righteousness and holiness, thus feasting on the twelve manner of fruits yielded every month in the year, which perpetuates a truly happy life in Christ.

Then sorrow, if thou art the gate to joy, if thou openest the doors of Christ's Kingdom, and from thence pourest out to my soul the balm of comfort and an eternity of bliss, make haste to fasten thy fangs in my proud and stubborn heart.

Louisiana Conference. METHODIST.

A STRANGE SECRET OF NATURE.—The American Medical Gazette for May, has the following curious account of the petrifaction of human bodies:

In the old Cathedral Church of Bremen is a vault, the atmosphere of which possesses the peculiar property of preserving from decay all bodies that may be placed therein.

Visitors are shown eight human bodies, besides a number of oats, dogs, monkeys, birds, etc., all of which, by mere exposure to this atmosphere, have become dried and free from all offensive effluvia; resembling in appearance, coarse parchment.

The body nearest the door is that of an English major, said to have lain here one hundred and eighteen years.

The second that of a German student, who lost his life in a duel. The hard, dry flesh still shows the sombre wounds on his throat and arm. His body has been here one hundred and seventy years.

The third, that of a Swedish Countess, whose body has remained free from the lot of common mortals for one hundred and forty years.

The fourth, that of a Swedish General, who was killed in the "Thirty Years' War," and whose throat still exhibits the mark of the wound of which he died.

The fifth is that of his aid-de-camp, who lost his life at the same time, by a cannon ball striking him in the side. The destruction of this parts is plainly visible.

The sixth body is that of a workman, who fell from the steeple of the church when near its completion—four hundred years ago—and broke his neck. Owing to this accident, the peculiar properties of the vault became known; for the body of the deceased workman was laid in this vault for a few days, and, having evinced no signs of decomposition, the singularity of the fact induced the authorities to permit it to remain and here it has remained during all that time.

The seventh is the body of an English lady, who died 130 years since of a cancer on the lower jaw; the ravages of the disease are still perceptible in the ulcerated flesh.

The eighth is the body of a working man, who has lain here for sixty years.

In marble sarcophagus, standing in the middle of the vault, are said to repose the mortal remains of the Swedish Chancellor, Van Eoglebrechten; but they are not permitted to be exposed to public view, on account of some still surviving relatives of the family.

Each of these bodies retains to a great degree the appearance peculiar to itself in life. Thus the Swedish General was a short round faced man inclined to corpulency; his aide-de-camp was a slender, well-proportioned man, in the prime of life. As in general appearance so also in facial expression do these bodies differ: the parchment-like skin, though drawn tightly over the bones, still shows something of the manner in which the muscles beneath once worked.

The only reasonable solution of the peculiarity of this result (for no other part of the church possesses it) that I have heard, is, that here all the plumber's work of the building was executed, in melting and otherwise preparing the materials for the roof. We can only suppose, then, that the entire chamber became so surcharged with lead, that it has continued ever since to give forth vapors, which, forming an antiseptic chemical compound of lead, have operated upon the cadavers exposed to its influence.

From the Claiborne Advocate we extract the following:

It may be safely estimated that there are over twenty-five thousand bales of cotton awaiting a chance for shipment at the various landings on Bayou Dorchete and Lake Bistineau. Here are over a million of dollars, the proceeds which would result from a sale of this cotton, thus cut off from the customary amount of money circulating in this region of country at this season of the year. All this for want of a railroad. When will the people learn the necessity of devoting every energy and resource in pushing forward the only work which can render the natural resources of this country available.

The weather continues quite warm and shockingly dry, the influence of which are alike enervating to animal life, and withering to vegetation. The young crops are already suffering greatly for want of rain. Unless we are favored in this respect before many days the consequences will be most disastrous. Fears are entertained that the drought will be a protracted one, inasmuch as we seldom have much rain in the months of May and June. Another failure in the crops will bring ruin and desolation upon this region of country. The shortness of the produce of last year is already beginning to be felt most poignantly. Provender for horses can hardly be obtained at any price, by those who are so unfortunate as to be out of a supply. Provisions of all kinds are unprecedentedly scarce, and unless navigation opens, of which the prospect is gloomy, we shall be placed upon short rations for the balance of the season.

LOUISIANA.—The Baton Rouge Comet of Thursday, has the following items: Five miles east of this city, there was a very refreshing shower on Tuesday evening, sufficient to lay the dust in the roads.

The Madison Journal says: "The weather is very warm—the earth is very dry, and the crops are suffering. Corn is being eaten up by insects, and there is no remedy while the dry weather lasts. Cotton is dying out very fast, and unless we have rain soon, it will all be destroyed. The prospect for corn is fully as bad at present as it was in 1851, and to add to our distresses there is none of the old crop in the country. Our morning and evening prayer is for rain."

John Randolph of Roanoke.

Sitting one day opposite a gentleman at a hotel dinner-table in Richmond, he observed that he was eating one of those luxurious soft crabs of that region, and that, as was the custom of the hotel, a glass of milk had been placed near his plate, looking up from his own, he said in a thin, piping voice:

"That's a singular dish of yours, sir, very singular; crabs and milk! Juba, bring me a bowl of milk, and crumble some crabs in it!"

At the same hotel, he said to a waiter, in the temporary absence of Juba, handing to him at the same time his cup and saucer:

"Take that away—change it."

"What do you want, Mr. Randolph?" asked the waiter respectfully, "Do you want coffee or tea?"

"If that stuff is tea," said he, "give me coffee; if it is coffee, bring me tea; I want a change."

Most readers have heard, perhaps, of his reply to a well known and highly respectable gentleman of the South, who introduced himself to him while standing and conversing with some friends with—

"I should be pleased to make the acquaintance of so distinguished a public servant as Mr. Randolph. I am from the city of Baltimore—my name is Blunt."

"Blunt, eh?" replied Mr. Randolph, "I should think so, sir;" and he deigned him no further notice.

Equally familiar to many, it may be, will be found his reply to a gentleman who rather forced himself upon Mr. Randolph's notice, while engaged in conversation with others, in a hotel in Virginia.

"I have had the pleasure, Mr. Randolph, recently of passing your house."

"I am glad of it," said Mr. Randolph; "I hope you will always do it sir."

On one occasion, at Washington, a brother member of Congress was enlightening Mr. Randolph as to the issuance of "shopping" at the capital.

"The merchants," said he, "have two prices—an 'asking price,' and a 'taking price.' I used to send my wife to make all the purchases for the family, by which we made a saving of fifteen to twenty per cent."

"I had rather my wife," said Randolph, bitterly, "should make a living in any other way but one, than that!"

Being a confirmed old bachelor the remark was no less comical than severe.

Scarcely anything more characteristic of Mr. Randolph is recorded of him in any of his biographies, than in the following incident, which occurred on the morning he was to leave for England, on his last visit to that country. The steamer is waiting to convey passengers when his friend calls upon him

"Mr. Randolph," he says, "in the name of Heaven, what is the matter! Do you know that it is nearly ten o'clock, and that the steamboat waits for nobody? Why, you are not even dressed.

"I can't help it, sir," replied he, "I'm all confusion this morning, everything goes wrong; even my memory has gone a wool-gathering. I am just writing a farewell address to my constituents, and I've forgotten the exact words of a quotation from the Bible, which I want to use, and as I quote correctly, cannot close my letter until I find the passage; but, strange to say, I forgot both the chapter and the verse. I never was in fault before, sir. What shall I do?"

"Do you remember any part of the quotation?" asked his friend, "perhaps I can assist you with the rest."

"It begins," said he, "with how have I loved thee, sir—, but for the life of me, I can't recollect the next words. Oh, my head! There, do you take the Bible and run over that page while I am writing the remainder of my address."

"My dear sir," was the reply, "you have no time to do this now; let us take the letter, Bible and all on board the steamer, where you will have enough time to find the passage you want, before we reach the packet."

After a great deal of hesitation and reluctance, and after much expostulation, the proposition was agreed to.

A rather cruel test of the affection of his servant John was tried on the occasion referred to. John had in some way offended his master that morning, and, as he was preparing the trunks, Mr. Randolph said to him:

"Finish that trunk at once, John, and take it down to the steamboat, and on your return, take passage in the Philadelphia; call on Mr. ——, in Arch street, and tell him that I have sailed; then go to Baltimore, call on Mr. ——, in Monument Place, and say that I shall write to him from London; thence proceed to Washington, pack up the trunks at my lodging, take them with you to Roanoke, and report yourself to my overseer."

After a pause, he added, in a sarcastic tone: "But you need not obey them, unless you choose to do so. You can, if you prefer it, when you arrive in Philadelphia, call on the Manumission Society, and they will make you free; and I shall never look after you. Do you hear, sir?"

This unjust aspersion of John's love, was too much for the faithful fellow; his cheek swelled, his lips quivered, his eyes filled, and he replied in great agitation:

"Massa John, this is too hard! I don't deserve it. You know I love you better than any body else, and you know you will find me at Roanoke when you come back!"

"I felt my blood rising," said Mr. Randolph's friend, and I could not avoid saying:

"Well, Mr. Randolph, I could not have believed this, if I had not seen it. I thought you had more compassion for your slaves. Surely, you are unjust in this case; you have punished him severely enough by leaving him behind you, without hurting his feelings. You have made the poor fellow cry, Mr. Randolph."

"What?" said he with true emotion, "does he shed tears?"

"He does," I replied, "and you see them yourself."

"Then," said Mr. Randolph, "he shall go with me. John take down your baggage, and let us forget what has passed."

"I was irritated, sir," he added, turning to me, "and I thank you for the rebuke."

Thus ended the singular scene between Randolph and his servant. John instantly brightened up—soon forgot his master's anger—and, in a very few moments, was on his way to the boat, perfectly happy.

DISCOVERY OF GOLD ON THE ARKANSAS RIVER.—The newspapers in the Southwest of this State reports that a large gold mine has been discovered on the head waters of the Arkansas river, about five hundred miles west of Springfield, Mo. The mine is said to be as rich as any of the gold mines of California, and hundreds of dollars have been taken out in one week.

The statement is confirmed, also, by accounts received from Indians and hunters, who have examined the locality. The region is a mineral one, and has long been supposed to contain gold.

The gold fever is prevailing to a great extent in the Southwest counties of this State, and people are preparing to forsake agricultural and all other pursuits, and turn their attention entirely to gold digging. At Springfield the epidemic has attacked every young man in the town, as the Advertiser asserts, and a company is being formed, to march as soon as possible to the new El Dorado. [St. Louis Evening News, 30th ult.]

An old soaker in Boston being found in the gutter on a rainy night, the water making a clear breach over him from head to heels, was asked by a passer what he was doing. "Oh," replied the inebriate, "I agreed to meet a man here."

The Expedition Against the Sioux Indians.

The St. Louis Pilot concurs cordially with the head of the War Department in its policy of sending out an expedition against the Indians, and relies upon the frequent murders and depredations committed last year as furnishing ample proof in vindication of such an expedition. In reply to the complaints as to the tardiness of the movements of the government, said by the New York Times to be prevalent, the Pilot makes the following sensible and forcible remarks:

"In our opinion, the Secretary is fully justified in sending out this expedition, and we hope it may be large enough to inflict summary chastisement upon the Indians, and cause them henceforth to respect the lives and property of American citizens. We learn from the New York Times that complaints of the tardiness of the government in relation to the campaign against the Sioux are quite prevalent. These complaints are not just.

It is only a few weeks since the four new regiments were ordered, and the recruiting is rapidly going on. Provisions and munitions of war are being forwarded to Fort Leavenworth as rapidly as the low stage of water in the Missouri will allow. The greatest activity prevails on the part of all the government agents stationed at this point. We have every reason to believe that the expedition will be ready to start at the proper period. Until late in the spring or the beginning of summer the grass is not sufficiently high to furnish food for cavalry horses. People at the East do not seem to understand these things. They seem to consider that an expedition of this kind can be started in a moment, and forget the necessity of forwarding large stores to distant and remote points, where the means of subsistance cannot otherwise be obtained. The country through which the expedition will have to pass is large and uncultivated, producing nothing but the wild grass of the prairies. Some difficulty and delay has been experienced in the purchase of horses which are very scarce and costly in this region at this time of the year.

Great diligence has, however, been exercised by the officers to whom this business was intrusted, and we have every reason to believe that no delay will be experienced from this source. We always supposed that the new regiments were not to be employed on this expedition, but were to relieve the old regiments at the different stations where they are now employed. To concentrate the old regiments at the proper point would require some time, even if the new regiments were raised in a day, which is not possible. There is, therefore, no just ground for complaint, unless it be on account of the tardy action of Congress in passing the bill for the new regiment.

The Secretary of War has been diligent and energetic, and he has been zealously seconded by the army officers to whom the charge of the expedition has been intrusted. All complaints, then, are entirely premature. Let us await the result of the campaign before we call in question the management of the Secretary and the officers who will be in command. We of the West are better able to understand these things than they can possibly do at the East; and if there be any just cause of complaint we may be sure it will issue from this quarter."

LAFOURCHE ITEMS.—We clip the following items from the Thibodaux Minerve of last Saturday:

Since our last issue the Lafourche has risen considerably at this point, and we now have sufficient water for navigation purposes. Down freights are scarce, but up freights are abundant.

The cant saying: "All signs of rain fail in dry weather," was never more fully verified than during the present week. We have had flying clouds and clear skies nearly every day, since Sunday last; but the thing the most desired—rain—is still wanting. Nearly every cistern in town is dry. A large majority of our citizens, such as have been in the habit of using cistern water, are now compelled to use water from the Lafourche, which change has been productive of deliterious consequences, causing diarrhœa in numerous instances. With this exception, the health of both town and country are unexceptionable.

The fruit crop, from present indications, will be plentiful this season.

The Hon. Louis Hebert, State Engineer, is now in town. He has been making a reconnoissance of this section of the State, with the view of carrying into effect some of the resolutions passed at different times by the State Legislature to improve the navigation of our bayous. If the honorable gentleman, who certainly has every indination of one thoroughly versed in his profession, succeeds in having something done for this, heretofore neglected portion of the State, he will deserve the thanks and congratulations of our people. We shall see what we shall see.

The Fifth District Court, Hon. James L. Cole, presiding, commenced its session here on Monday last. The docket is unusually full, so much so that there is no possibility of getting through during its present sitting. Business, in consequence of epidemics, has been accumulating in this parish for several years past, to such an extent that it may become necessary for the Legislature to pass some special act authorising the Judge to prolong his sitting until such a time as will enable the lawyers to get through with the business.

CRUISE OF THE U. S. FRIGATE ST. LAWRENCE. This national vessel, (bearing the broad pendant of Com. Dulany,) which returned to Norfolk a few days ago, after a cruise of over three years, made 24 visits to ports on the Pacific; sailed 50,237 miles; was 532 days at sea, and 690 in port; had 4 marriage ceremonies performed by the chaplain on board; 8 deaths; 1,203 cases admitted on the sick report; sent 24 invalids home; lost 118 men by desertions, including 21 at San Francisco and 58 at Valparaiso; enlisted 102 men during the cruise; took out 410. There was not a single court-martial in the squadron during the ship's long cruise, a fact which speaks well for both the officers and the men. Lt. Charles H. Poor had command of the St. Lawrence from Jan., 1853, to March, 1854, when he was suspended by W. W. Hunter, who brought her home.

THE U. S. EXPLORING EXPEDITION TO THE NORTH PACIFIC.—The Boston Atlas learns, through private sources, that at last accounts the United States ship Vincennes was at Hong Kong, preparing for the exploration of Behring's Straits and the north-west American coast. Several of the officers attached to this expedition have died during the winter, of diseases contracted during the long stay of the vessel at Hong Kong last summer. Captain Davis, formerly of the Porpoise, Lieutenant Hunter, of the Hancock, and Dr Hamilton, of the Kennedy, have all died the past winter. Another letter, under date of February last, refers to a "terrible suspicion which has long been held by all, and now amounts almost to a certainty, that the Porpoise has been totally lost at sea, with all on board." She has not been seen or heard of by any vessels since she parted from the Vincennes in the gale of the 21st September last.

THE KINNEY EXPEDITION FOR NICARAGUA. It is said, will take out from six to seven hundred persons, among them Fletcher Webster, son of Daniel Webster. It is said that the Company have a good understanding with the Transit Steamship Company and with the Nicaraguan Government.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1855.

New Churches—Open air Preaching.

For several weeks the experiment of open air preaching has been without opposition or notice, or attracting much notice any way, going on in our city. Rev. J. A. Ivey, pastor of the Morgan street Methodist Church, preaches sabbath evenings about 5½ or 6 o'clock, on the Washington square, 3d District. His first congregation was mostly composed of the Fire Engine and Hook and Ladder companies near by. The listeners were orderly, and evinced a disposition to secure order. The tract distribution, following the short sermon was welcomed. All this, while balloon ascensions have been going on in Congo square.

Last sabbath evening the presiding Elder, Dr. Keener, took the open air stand before a good congregation, and preached—"God so loved the world."

Dr. Clapp's new church,—the "Church of the Messiah"—has been opened.

Last sabbath 11 A. M., the fine and large Baptist Church on Coliseum place, was thrown open for the first time. Appropriate services were conducted by Rev. W. C. Duncan, pastor. Mr. D. were on the occasion, and we presume will continue to officiate in, a gown of black silk. The tower of this church is not complete: otherwise it is complete, and very commodious, and the congregation and members are prospering.

HOME CIRCLE.—Send your two dollars to Stevenson & Owen, Nashville, for this monthly. It will grace your parlor table, and be good reading for every member of the family. A fine portrait, forty-eight double column pages of reading and a tasteful miscellany. The editor will keep the numbers out fast till he overtakes time—then, a regular monthly.

OUR QUARTERLY.—"Have you seen our Quarterly?" remarked a critic friend of ours the other day. "You ought to speak in the highest terms of it—capital number. I no longer doubt its destiny to be equal with the best and at the head." We had not then read it, but cannot now that we have.

HARPER FOR MAY.—McGinnis, 36 Camp street, has laid it on our table. Harper, is a literary, newsy and funny magazine. It has a higher quality—its sound, conservative and moral tone.

DR. ANGELL.—His card appears in our advertising columns. The Doctor, we are happy to learn, intends settling in the city, and we hope will bring some alleviation of the ills our flesh is heir to here. He brings the best testimonials from Huntsville, Ala., his late residence.

AUSTRALIAN CONFERENCE.—The first session of the Australian Wesleyan Conference, commenced January 18th, when about forty ministers from the Australian colonies, Van Diemen's Land, New Zealand, and Polynesia, met together in York street chapel, Sydney, the Rev. Wm. M. Boyce presiding. There are 9 Districts, 108 ministers and 19,897 members.

There are also, 35,576 children in the day and sunday schools. 1,958 persons are on trial for membership. About 12,000 of the members are natives of New Zealand and the Islands. There are also about 60 native ministers, not included in the 108 reported. Of the preaching places 442 are regular chapels.

ENGLISH METHODISTS.

Dr. Beaumont and the late Dr. Morrison, of China, married two sisters. Mrs. Beaumont is left with seven children, one of whom only is married, a daughter, to the Rev. Mr. Milne, who has been a missionary to China, but has now returned to England, the victim of a distressing epilepsy. There are three sons; the eldest is a law-student, the second is studying medicine, and the youngest, about fourteen, is at school. Dr. Beaumont died a poor man, as to silver and gold, and the allowance from our Widow's Fund is a poor pittance indeed; knowing this the Hull Methodists have originated a subscription for the family, and the responses are already of the most generous character, so much so, that the committee express their determination to raise at least £2,000, or $10,000.

The Wesleyan Missionary Society had last year an income of £114,498, or about 560,000 dollars. It has missions in the West Indies, at a cost of 80,000 dollars per annum, and in the North American Provinces, at an annual cost of 50,000 dollars. They have stations on various parts of the African coast, and in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope. In India, their missionaries are confined to Ceylon, Madras, and the Canarese country; while in China, they have only recently made a beginning, by settling three missionaries at Canton. Their mission at New Zealand is a flourishing one, and involves an annual cost of about 25,000 dollars. The auxiliary Wesleyan Societies in Australia are preparing to relieve the Parent Society altogether, and in addition to undertake the charge of the very extensive Wesleyan missions already existing among the Fejee and Fe iendly Islanders, Thoughts on reading the old Minutes.

THE MAY FAST.

The first Friday in May was set apart as a day of fasting and prayer, for the general prosperity of the Church, and especially that the Lord of the harvest would send forth more laborers into his vineyard.

It is not amiss to recall attention to this fact, by way of remembrance, stirring up all pure minds. We hope the day was kept.

If any one's desire needs provoking, let him read the bound Minutes of the Annual Conferences. An impressive lesson there touching "laborers."

Go back in these authentic ministerial lists and read up. First question: "Who are admitted on trial?"

A goodly array of names answers. The thought of the heart then is: "Now the waste places will be cultivated; there will be no unheeded cry, 'Come over and help us!' The laborers are many."

Read that Conference journal next year, and what a large proportion are missing! The second year's trial makes another sifting, and the question, "Who are received into full connection?" is feebly responded to. Failing health or death, or the cares of the world, or the deceitfulness of riches, have hindered many who bid fair to run well and gloriously. When called at the score of the third year, they answer not. At the ordination of Elders, at the end of the fourth, about one in ten stands in his lot and proclaims himself still at the Church's service.

Where are the nine? This is a solemn and practical question for a fast day entertainment. Is the Church accessory to this ministerial defection?

If these all were moved of the Holy Ghost to take on them the work of the ministry, how comes it their uneasy consciences have been relieved from the "woe is me," and their zeal quenched, and their candle put under a bushel, and their consecration vows absolved?

The tests of learning applied to candidates are not so severe, nor the standard so high, as to be the cause.

The work required of them carries not more self-denial and toil than characterized the primitive ministry. If, however, too heavy a burden has been put upon tender shoulders; if, ushered into the awful presence of his work without sufficient preparation, the beginner has been overwhelmed and disheartened, the Church should look to it. Here is the loss and the fault, and with her lies the remedy.

It may be that the beginner, after going a little way, found he had not counted the cost; or the matter may have set easily on him, and he as easily thrown off by trifling difficulties; or embarrassments, growing out of an insufficient support, may, in his estimation, have forced him from a cherished field. Actual suffering may not have touched him or his, but he saw an array of bad prospects, and lacking faith in God's promises, feared to run the gauntlet. While the Church prays, here is something for the Church to do, before the prayer can be sincere. Wisdom and liberality for training and sustaining laborers in the vineyard, and keeping them there, are proper objects of prayer.

One more thought, suggested by the old Minutes, and this for encouragement. While many fall away whose entrance inspired high hopes, the hand of God is seen in the development of others who inspired none. Go back ten, twenty, or forty years, and scan the recruits as they come up from the academy, abandon the profession, the shop, the plough. Mark that name there. It does not sound great. A bruised reed is not weaker. The Presiding Elder was not sanguine in recommending him; thought he might do; would try him. The Bishop hardly knew an appointment that would have him. Follow up that name. It rises and shines. From one appointment ascending to another, you trace it, and in a few years it stands in connection with the highest.

Does this not stimulate our faith? God can be at no loss for the men we want. They follow the plough to-day, they are in the workshop, or idling in professional vestibules, or buried in earthly rubbish, who need but His call and His annointing to be as bright and shining lights as ever illuminated the Church.

Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth more laborers.

Can't Something be Done for Him.

"An inquirer" in the Banner of Peace, —Cumberland Presbyterian paper published in Tenn.—gives a pretty hard case:

"A minister who spent the principal part of four years as a circuit rider, fell into the hand of affliction. A physician attended him about a month, for which he charged one hundred and fifty dollars. The poor minister received annually for his services, about thirty-five dollars. In view of the above, I ask a civil, a moral, and especially a christian people, if a "minister can't be favored."

One of that sort ought to find favor anywhere. We never knew a case like it: such is not the rule in Tennessee, is it?

Generally, a physician who charges "a poor minister" after that fashion, would have to take it out in charging—the patient would have nothing to pay with.

As to the right, that is not to be questioned; but the usage would be ruled unprofessional. Such is the generous practice of physicians in the South, to whom, as far as our knowledge goes, the ministry is more indebted for disinterested and large benevolence, than any other class of society.

The Churches.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

The funeral sermon preached by Bishop Pierce in memory of the late Bishop Capers has been promptly issued and a copy is on our table. The sermon is on sale at the Methodist Publishing House. Price—Five cents without cover, and Ten cents per copy, neatly bound in paper. Thirty per cent. discount to wholesale purchasers.

Rev. J. L. Saunders, in California, is representing the militant feature of the Church in characteristic style. It appears, from a complaining statement of the California Advocate, that in a "Methodist Church" at Diamond Springs, on Sabbath evening, the 18th March, the Rev. G. B. Taylor, pastor of the M. E. Church at Placerville, after entering the pulpit, was hindered from preaching by Rev. Mr. Saunders of the M. E. Church South, now residing at Placerville, who had announced four weeks before, that he would preach there if agreeable; but was informed by some parties that his appointment would clash with Rev. G. B. Taylor, and that in consequence it would not be agreeable: notwithstanding he preached, and, it seems, was therein sustained by the citizens. PHIL. 1. 15-18.

Numerous inquiries reach us about the Sunday School Visitor. When will it be forthcoming? We presume the pressure of attending to other requirements keeps this back. The children must wait for the second table.

Our advices report Bishop Andrew and party safely arrived in the Golden State. Their Conference is over before this time, and we look for a letter of news by the next steamer.

The St. Louis Advocate, speaking of the plan of Episcopal visitations:

"Noticing it closely, it may be observed that the time of the Conferences from the first to the last extends through a little more than two months. It has long been the great argument among those who have insisted upon an increase of the number of Bishops, that they should have time to "travel through the work at large"—visit the several important points—oversee the general interests—equalize and harmonize the administration of discipline, &c., &c. Now as they will be engaged in holding Conferences only about two months out of the twelve, there will certainly be time for all this during the remaining ten, and if it be done, as we suppose it will, an amount of good will be effected beyond what has been effected for many a year. We hope it will be so."

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, NORTH.

Rev. D. D. Lore, recently returned from Buenos Ayres, has been appointed to New Mexico, by the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The minutes of Liberia Conference show an increase in the membership of 134, and of probationers 55. There are among the members 102 natives.

They have 21 schools, 731 scholars, and 125 officers and teachers.

They have raised during the year last past $740 87, which is a fraction over 49 cents per member, and a larger average than churches at home.

Before the New Jersey Conference Rev. J. McClintock, editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, gave a statement of the present condition of that periodical.

The Quarterly has had a greater circulation than any other paper of the kind in this country. Under his editorial care the Review has had a circulation of 3200, but it has fallen off to the number of 1700.

A report of the Biblical Institute, at Concord, was read. Ninety-one students have been connected with the school since the last annual report. The income for the past year has been $2436. The Institute is in a prosperous condition and promise much to the church.

BAPTIST.

Rev. D r. Manly has yielded to the earnest desire of his friends in Charleston, S. C., and has accepted the pastoral charge of the Wentworth street Baptist Church. Dr. Manly has for many years presided over the University of Alabama. He has finally determined to relinquish this eminent position, and to return to the city where he won his first reputation as a divine, a scholar, and a man capable of directing the highest intelligence towards its best objects. He has resigned the Presidency of the Univercity, to take effect next January or as soon as his place is filled by a successor.

Rev. Dr. Oncken, the Baptist Missionary in Germany, writes to the American and Foreign Bible Society, that he and his associates have circulated 81,000 copies of the Bible during the past year.

Prof. Milo P. Jewett has resigned his office as Principal of the Judson Female Institute, Marion, Alabama, having purchased the Cottage Hill Seminary, in the city of Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He has been very successful as a teacher, and it will be very difficult to supply his place.

The Georgia Baptist State Convention met in Newman, 20th April: 120 delegates in attendance.

A report of the Treasurer of the Convention showed the amount of funds on hand to be $17,642 53. The funds of the Mercer University, (the property of the denomination) apart from the Theological Department, embrace $121,866.

EPISCOPAL.

The Rev. Homer Wheatoo, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of New York, has lately been received into the Romish communion.

The papers announce the following converts to Romanism from the Church of England: The Rev. Mr. Palmer, of Oxford University; Rev. Edward B. Denne, D. C. L., Vicar of Lewknor, Oxfordshire; Rev. D. Edwards, Curate of King's Cliffe.

Some members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Massachusetts are making efforts to establish a Theological Seminary in that state. One gentleman has offered to give $40,000, provided a like amount be contributed by not more than four other persons.

The Gospel Messenger states that another Protestant Episcopal clergyman has entered the Romish Church—the Rev. B. W. Whitcher, of Whitestown, in the diocese of Western New York.

PRESBYTERIAN.

The four Boards of the Presbyterian Church acknowledge the following sums as received during the month of March:—Board of Domestic Missions, $11,496 89, and for Church Extension, $368 27; Board of Education, $3,107 97; Board of Foreign Missions, $19,144 09, of which $566 25 is for the Waldenses, and $5,901 10 from donations in India for 1853-4; and Board of Publication, $3,816 29. Total $37,933 51.

In the several Theological Seminaries connected with the Old School Presbyterian Church, there are 293 theological students at present, divided among the establishments as follows: At Princeton, N. J., 115; at Alleghany, Pa., 51; at Union Seminary, Va., 29; Columbia, S. C., 42; New Albany, Indiana, 19; Danville, Ky., 37. Besides these there are known to be at least four others studying theology under private instruction, and probably from 12 to 15 more, thus making the total about 300, so that the annual supply of ministers in that church for the next three years will be about 100.

Panoplist, is the name of a new Presbyterian (O. S.) paper, which has been issued at Houston, Texas, under the editorial care of Rev. J. Twitchell.

Rev. Dr. Cox, the talk-talky orator is telling the Presbyteries what sort of commissioners or delegates to send up to the Assembly, about to meet in St. Louis: some good advice herein:

"The people are expecting the General Assembly with increasing interest and satisfaction. It ought to be anticipated by all our Presbyteries with large hearted and appropriate wisdom. They will certainly do great good, or great harm, by meeting at St. Louis. The reasons are many and mighty. Of this I would affectionately warn all the Presbyteries. If a Presbytery has any member in it that is only goodish and weak-minded; impulsive, and not at all comprehensive, or well experienced or rightly informed; or, if he be partisan, emotional and destitute of knowledge and good manners; or, if he be a theorizer, an abstractionist, or a philosopher of one idea; or, if he be obstinate, or unanimous in self esteem only; then I say, for the sake of all the ends that Paul would pursue and prefer, or which the wisdom that is profitable to direct would inspire, give him an impartial furlough to stay at home, and consult his honor, and usefulness, and fame, and peace, by putting a wise man, instead of him, as a commissioner to the General Assembly of 1855."

Household Baptism---Infant Baptism.

A correspondent of the Independent sets forth the difficulties of the popular understanding on this subject:

"Every studious believer in the practice of infant baptism knows that it is firmly founded on both scripture and reason. The usual arguments are many, strong and clear. But how to make ordinary minds, especially narrow minds, feel the full weight of these, that is the trouble. The difficulties in the way, I think, are these:

1. Such minds do not appreciate the wonderful nature and importance of the family system. To them every person is a solitary unit, sprung from the very ground, as it were, like Adam. To them a family is but little more than a chance collection of individuals.

2. They do not appreciate the time in which the New Testament was written; they do not enter into the views of the men who penned it, or to whom it was first addressed. Particularly, they see not how familiar to those men were the uniform and amazing dealings of God towards families, from creation downward—his constant including of them in all mercies and judgments, as if it had been a mere matter of course. To these minds the New Testament is only a book addressed first to the sects and doubters of to-day.

3. Therefore, as well as from their general habits of thought, they do not appreciate the great legal argument concerning the Abrahamic covenant and seal, and the inferential reasoning from many texts of Scripture. It is to them a tedious rattling of dry phrases—a dusty battle of words. They want glaring facts and direct commands, something that appeals strikingly to sight and hearing.

4. More particularly, and more than all else, they cannot get over the fact that the New Testament nowhere says, in so many words, that infants shall be or were baptized. When you admit that, you seem to them to have really given over the whole question.

On the principle that there is much in sound, and the world is governed by words, especially that portion of it that talks at this partial phrase, it is suggested that the name of the doctrine and practice be changed—be more Scriptural, true and comprehensive. Let the thing be called what it is, in its great reality, viz: Household, or Family Baptism. The phrase, "Infant baptism," fixes the common mind solely on the mere image of a babe, aside from the mighty idea of a family and all its influences and structure, aside from the whole Bible treatment of the subject of family, from Genesis to Revelation.

DESCRIPTIVE EULOGY.—A plain Scotch woman, after hearing McCheyne preach, described the sermon and preacher to her neighbor:

"He preached as if he was dyin' a'most, to have ye converted."

Heavy clouds often bring softening and fructifying showers, when light ones are empty and pass over.

ACTION AND BELIEF.

The substitution of the term "religious truth" in the place of "man's highest perfection," has given birth to great difficulties.

All societies of men, whether we call them States or Churches, should make their bond to consist in a common practice, rather than in a common belief; in other words, their end should be good rather than truth. We may consent to act together, but we cannot consent to believe together; many motives may persuade us to the one; we may like the object, or we may like our company; or we may think it safest to join them, or most convenient, and any one of those motives is quite sufficient to induce a unity of action—action being a thing in our own power. But no motives can persuade us to believe together; we may wish a statement to be true, we may admire those who believe it, we may find it very inconvenient not to believe it; all this helps us nothing; unless our own mind is freely convinced that the statement of doctrine be true, we cannot by possibility believe it. That union in action will in the end lead very often to union of belief, is most true; but we cannot insure its doing so; and the social bond cannot directly require for its perfectness more than union of action. It cannot properly require more than it is in the power of men to give; and men can submit their actions to a common law at their own choice, but their internal convictions they cannot.

Such a union of action appears historically to have been the original bond of the Christian Church. Whoever was willing to receive Christ as his master, to join His people, and to walk according to their rules, he was admitted to the Christian society. We know that in the earliest church, there existed the strangest varieties of belief, some Christians not even believing that there would be a resurrection of the dead. Of course, it was not intended that such varieties would be perpetual; a closer union of belief was gradually effected; but the point to observe, is that the union of belief grew out of the union of action; it was the result of belonging to the society rather than a previous condition required for belonging to it. And it is true farther, that all union of action implies in one sense a union of belief; that is, they who agree to do a certain thing must believe that in some way or other, either as a positive good or as the lesser evil, it is desirable for them to do it. But belief in the desirableness of an act differs greatly from belief in the truth of a proposition; even fear may give unity of action, and such unity of belief as is implied by it; a soldier is threatened with death if he does not fight, and so believing that to fight is now desirable for him, as a less evil than certain death, he stands his ground and fights accordingly. But fear, though it may make us wish with all our hearts that we could believe the truth of a proposition, yet cannot enable or compel us to believe it. . . . . A general hearty belief in Christianity is to be regarded by the Christian society, whether it be called Church or State, not as its starting point, but as its highest perfection. To begin with a strict creed and no efficient Christian institutions, is the sure way to hypocrisy and unbelief; to begin with the most general confession of faith, imposed, that is, as a test of membership, but with vigorous Christian institutions, is the way most likely to lead, not only to a real and general belief, but also to a lively perception of the highest points of Christian faith. In other words, intellectual objections to Christianity should be tolerated, when they are combined with moral obedience; tolerated, because in this way they are most removed; whereas, a corrupt or disorganized church with a minute creed, encourages intellectual objections; and if it proceeds to put them down by force, it does often violate the right of conscience, punishing an unbelief which its own judgment can see, has in great measure been justified.—DR. ARNOLD.

NOT PREPARED.

"Brother D., the congregation is assembled, and I've preached twice to-day and once last night, and am very much exhausted. I want you to preach."

"Oh, no! Brother C., I have been reading the ——— all the evening, and am not prepared, and I don't want to get up there on a venture."

On a venture! what a word for an ambassador of Christ to use! For the messenger of God, sent to a guilty race! For a watchman standing on the walls of Zion, who sees, or ought to see, the sword coming, and who is made responsible for the salvation of the people!

Not prepared! Not prepared to do what? To please the ears of men, or to tell sinners to repent and believe the gospel? On a venture! I suppose he meant: "I am afraid I shall not speak with eloquence sufficient to please the ears of man." He certainly did not mean that he could not tell sinners to repent and be converted.

Brother C. is a man of feeble health, and had been on his regular work all day Sunday, and Saturday night before, and about night, after excessive labors, he returned to the village of ———. The church bell had rung and the congregation assembled, when brother C. approached him with the above language, and received the answer.

Brother D. had preached at 11; but being a man of talent and position, he could not preach on a venture! God save the preachers from pride. ITINERANT.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

ABBEVILLE CIRCUIT—BIBLE CLASS.

Abbeville circuit is a very pleasant work of nine appointments. Abbeville, which is the county site of Henry county Ala., is a pleasant village, the citizens, though but few of them members of the church, are kind and hospitable, especially to ministers of all denominations; there is a number of excellent young gentlemen in the village, whose talents and influence I sincerely hope may very soon receive a religious direction; this surely is wishing them no harm. There are two churches in the place: a Baptist and a Methodist church, the membership in each is small. O! what a reason for them to be faithful, the fewer the number the greater the responsibility. God grant that they may think of this. If these few will be faithful; maintain their integrity as christians; walk worthy of their vocation, and keep themselves unspotted from the world. Yea, if they will be christians, they can and will accomplish much for the cause of religion.

Lawrenceville is about seven miles north of Abbeville, the citizens are kind and social. Great friends to temperance; so much so that king alcohol finds no resting place for the sole of his foot. May this long be the case. The people are enterprising in their habits, and are directing their energies towards intellectual as well as moral improvement. The Methodists have a considerable membership at this place, and are making preparations to build a good church. The Lord occasionally pours out the Spirit upon them, and we are looking and praying for greater displays of his power among us.

The citizens of Lawrenceville and the surrounding community, are making great efforts to build up a good school; one that will be equal in point of health, location, and moral influence, with any in the south of Alabama.

The prospect for intellectual improvement will, I apprehend, be equal to any school in this part of the State. The right men are employing the right means to accomplish this. They are now building, and have engaged the services of an experienced and talented gentlemen, a graduate of Franklin College, Ga. The first term of the school will commence in July next. Will not those who wish to educate their sons, patronize this school? We think the character of the school will be such as will entitle it to the patronage of a very large portion of south Ala.

Clopton, a new and pleasant village, is also in this circuit, here we have a good new church, and we are looking for a revival of religion. God grant that it may come, and that, "right early." In this place temperance men, and temperance principles have the rule. The rest of my appointments are not far from these three places, some of them are in a healthy condition, others are not.

When I first came to this circuit, being convinced of the importance of reading the scriptures, I began to insist upon the performance of this duty. I made a proposition, especially to the young people, to read the Bible through this year. Many of them have acceded to the proposition, and a large number of young ladies and gentlemen are engaged in reading the Sacred Scriptures, in the Abbeville circuit.

May they obtain much scriptural knowledge, and be charmed with its beauty; with its divinity, and become willing to be saved upon the terms it proposes.

We have yet done but little in the way of sabbath schools. They are just now beginning to go into operation. I hope to be able soon to give you some account of the progress of my Bible class. JOHN W. SOLOMON

OPELOUSAS, LA., May 4th, 1855.

We are getting on slowly, my circuit is large, the congregations good and attentive. We have much to contend against down here; this part of the State is the strong hold of Romanism. We need a stationed preacher for Opelousas and Washington. I have been informed that Bishop Polk succeeded in raising a thousand dollars in Opelousas, for the support of a minister, during a visit he made week before last; the members of this church have been worshiping with us for a long time, ours being the only protestant church in Opelousas.

The Romists have two priests, and when there is no service in our church, our members, some of them, go to the Romish church. The priests are wily; one of them preaches in English, and they say, preaches like a Methodist!

We could use French tracts here to advantage if we had the right kind; I hope Wesley's sermons and the Discipline will be brought out in a short time by our general Editor, in the above language. A French missionary could get a large congregation, if we had the man; and he would be well received all through this country. Can't you pick up a French youth in the city, send him to Centenary College a few years, and thus raise our own missionaries to preach to the creoles in their own language, and by one of their own countrymen? Let us cast about and see if something cannot be done for this people, and may the blessing of God come upon them.

Yours, REYNOLDS TRIPPETT.

THEMES FOR PREACHERS.

It were easy to entertain men's minds with new discourse, if our task were rather to please than to profit; for there are many things which, with little labor, might be brought forth as new and strange to ordinary hearers. But there are a few things which chiefly concern us to know and practice, and these are to be more frequently represented and pressed. The apostle Peter, and other inspired writers, drew from too full a spring to be ebb of matter; but they rather chose profitable iteration than unprofitable variety, and so ought we.—Leighton.

Seeming difficulties generally vanish before faith, prayer and perseverance.

New Publications.

On our table is a fine parcel of reading. It is such reading as Dr. Arnold desired—books, not so much on religious subjects, as on common subjects, written in a religious vein. They bear on each side the imprint, M. E. C. S. Dr. Summers is the editor, Stevenson & Owen, the publishers. They are the first fruits of the Nashville House, though some were done up at Louisville, under a former agency.

Notice.—The Centenary Institute, Summerfield, Ala., will need an able and scientific man to take charge of the Music Department at the opening of the next term, beginning first October, 1855. Application can be made to me at the college until first July.

Minutes of the Alabama Conference.

The blank appearing in the published minutes of the late session of the Alabama Conference, in the Board of Commissioners to locate the contemplated college, was occasioned by the Secretary failing to hear the nomination. I have since learned from reliable authority that Col. B. T. Popo, of Ashville, St. Clair county, Ala., was elected as one of the lay members from that District, and the blank should be filled with his name.

This notice is given as the Secretary's apology, and to place the name of that gentleman before the Methodist public as one of the Board. The Commissioners will bear in mind that the meeting of the Board will be held on the fourth day of July next, at Summerfield, Ala.

Deaths.

Died—In peace, 1st March, 1855, in Tuscaloosa, Ala., Mrs. Rebecca M. Coker, consort of Mr. John Coker, in the 18th year of her age. She was raised by pious parents, Pinkard and Elizabeth Elrod, whose object, in her youth, was to bring her up in the way that she should go. At about twelve years old she became the subject of converting grace, and attached herself to the M. E. Church, in which she continued a consistent member. By her uniform course of life, she gained the love and esteem of all who knew her. Would that we had more Rebecca Coker's. Her friends expressed a deep anxiety for her recovery; but alas! who can stay the hand of death? For one month her illness was protracted, but she bore it with Christian fortitude and resignation, and for several days before her departure her hours were spent in prayer and praise. She met death with all its terrors, and left imperishable testimony behind that she enjoys a home in that Heaven that is prepared for all the faithful of God.

That Heaven cannot heal."

Died—In Harrison county, Texas, April 17th, 1855, Mrs. Susan J. Allen, in the 25th year of her age. She was a native of South Carolina, where she was converted to God in the year 1840. Her maiden name was Gordon. She was married to Mr. T. J. Allen March 27th; only twenty-five days before her death. When interrogated in regard to her spiritual interests, she expressed entire confidence in God, and resignation to his will. She was a faithful attendant on all the means of Grace; and from her conversion till her death, she never doubted the divine reality of religion.

About five weeks before her death, the writer met her in class; she was in a very happy frame of mind and expressed the most confident hope of a blissful immortality.

Revival Intelligence.

New Iberia Circuit, La. Con.
April 31st, 1855.

We have been blessed with some gracious revival influences on the New Iberia Circuit. We have just closed an interesting meeting of three days continuance at Queue de Tartue.

Many sinners were awakened to a sense of the danger and the folly of living in sin: and they manifested this by presenting themselves at the altar of prayer.

Oh, how sublime the scene when sinners—the aged and the young together—bow before God and seek his favor! Such was the scene on Sabbath afternoon. When there was no more room for mourners at the altar, other places were designated for them; but the awakening and alarming influences of the Holy Spirit were so overwhelming, that nearly all the congregation fell upon their knees and cried for mercy.

A number of these professed conversion, and nineteen were added to the church.

We are praying for and expecting glorious revivals at every appointment.

Pray for us.

B. F. Alexander,
Jessee Jenkins.

Lauderdale Circuit, Ala. Con.
April 25th, 1855.

I suppose it is always gratifying to you and the numerous readers of the Advocate, to hear that any good is accomplished in the Lord's vineyard. I rejoice to be able to say that the Lord has visited Old Lauderdale Circuit once more. At our first Quarterly Meeting in March, which was at Pleasant Grove Church, we had a good time, though the weather was unfavorable; and at my next appointment at that place on the 2nd April, we had a gracious outpouring of the Good Spirit, and the membership greatly revived.

I commenced a meeting at Poplar Springs, aided by Brother Hudson from the Marion Station, and Brother J. Hays, a local preacher on the Circuit, on Saturday before the 3d Sabbath in April. The meeting continued till Monday night, and resulted in five conversions and two necessions to the church, and the members greatly blessed; and we are expecting to see greater things than these.

We ask a special interest in the prayers of the friends of Zion.

En. McMeans.

Tallahassee, Florina,

The Lord has lately blessed us with a glorious revival of religion, during which some sixty persons professed conversion. To God be all glory.

Jackson, (Miss.) Conference.—Rev. J. A. Godfroy, Pastor, reports in the Mississippian, 2nd inst.:

"The religious exercises recently continued several days consecutively in the Methodist Church, resulted in thirty-four conversions, thirty-one accessions to the communion of the church, and much spiritual comfort and joy to the professed followers of Christ in attendance upon these services—many of whom now rejoice in professed restoration to the 'power' as well as the 'form' of Godliness.

To the Lord of Grace and Glory be all the praise—amen."

Missionary Reports.

Black Creek Mission, Ala. Conference.

To Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church South.

Dear Brother: The above named work is chiefly in Jackson and Green counties, Mississippi, on the west side of Pascagoula river. This is a sparsely populated country—real Piney woods—fine timber for naval purposes; it is also good for stock. The Mobile and other markets have been well supplied from this region, with the finest beeves. This is a pleasant, healthy country; but it is looked upon as being too poor for cultivation, but if it were cultivated on scientific principles, it would produce enough for home consumption. We have twelve appointments on the Mission; it is rather large for three weeks, but we go around in that time—travelling about 175 miles each trip. Our Presiding Elder (Brother Garrett) has been with us at our first and second Quarterly Meetings, and preached with his usual zeal and acceptability; and we think and we hope great good will result. We have received on trial 14—by certificate 1—baptized 7 infants. We have one Sabbath school, it appears to be doing well so far. The people of this country are very kind and liberal, though but few of them are wealthy. We have collected $9.00 for the support of the Mission. Pray for us.

The City of Mysteries.—Rochester, N. Y., is now known as the "City of Mysteries." It was here that many years ago the plans were matured for the mysterious disappearance of William Morgan, whose fate to this day has never been satisfactorily ascertained. Out of this Morgan affair, a political excitement was evolved that swept like a hurricane all Western New York, and prostrated the Democratic party of the State. Here also was first printed the Book of Mormon, by the Prophet, Joe Smith, who pretended to have dug the golden plates from a Sund-hill near Palmyra. The result of this wonderful imposture is now seen in the strange developments in Utah. It was in Rochester that the Fox girls brought out the mysterious sounds known as the "Rochester Knockings." From this germ sprung the modern spiritual system, numbering Judge Edmonds, Senator Tallmadge, and other eminent men among its votaries. The most recent Rochester mystery was the strange disappearance of Miss Emma Moore in November last, and whose body has just been found in a millrace, under circumstances which deepen the mystery.

Magnetic Telegraph.

New York, May 4.—The Collins Steamship Atlantic, Capt. West, has arrived at this port with highly important intelligence from Europe. The Atlantic left Liverpool on Monday, the 23d of April, and consequently brings advices nine days later than previously received, and two days later than her regular day of sailing. The following summary embraces the main features of the news, both political and commercial:—

Vienna Conference.

The Vienna Conference had been broken off after having held twelve sessions, by the refusal of Russia to accede to the demands of the Allied powers.

There were strong indications that Austria would take the part of the Allies against Russia. Lord John Russell and M. Drouyen de la Hays had left Vienna.

Sebastapol

The bombardment of Sebastopol by the Allies commenced on the 9th of April, with a force of five hundred guns. It was continued incessantly, to the 15th—up to which time an assault was not practicable.

The British Loan.

The new British loan of sixteen million pounds sterling, had been taken by the Rothschilds.

Napoleon in England.

Louis Napoleon, and the Empress Eugenie, had been in England for a week, and been immensely glorified.

It is said that England assents to Napoleon's taking the command of the allied army in the Crimea, but the statement is from doubtful authority.

Moro Taxes.

Taxes had been increased in Great Britain, and income duties were proposed on epirits, tea, coffee, sugar and stamps.

Latest from Sabastapol.

By telegraph from London, on Monday afternoon, 23d, later intelligence had been received at Liverpool previous to the departure of the Atlantic, of which the following is the substance:—

Gen. Canrobert telegraphed to Paris under date of the 17th of April, that the fire of the Allies continued, and that they were gaining some advantage. The loss of life, he says, is great. The bombardment would continue for about a week longer, when the assault would be made upon the city.

Five Days later from Europe

Halifax, May 7, 10 o'clock, r. m.—The Royal mail steamship Asia, Capt. Lott, has just arrived at this port, with advices from Liverpool to the 28th of April, five days later than the accounts by the Atlantic at New York.

The War.

The political news by this arrival is of but little importance. There is nothing of consequence from the seat of war. The bombardment of Sebastopol continued without decisive result, a affairs generally in the Crimea remained without material change since the departure of the Atlantic. Political matters are quiet.

Liverpool Cotton Market

The Liverpool cotton market had been quite active during the week ending on Monday the 27th ult and all qualities of American had advanced 1 16 to ⅛ of a penny per pound. The sales of the week were 102,000 bal s, of which 31,000 bales were to speculators, and 100,000 bales for export. The fair and middling qualities were in the most favor, and had advanced to a greater extent than the lower grades. The authorized quotations were: Fair Orleans 8¼, Middling Orleans 8 5-16, Fair Uplands 5¼d, and Middling Uplands 6 3-16d per pound. [The above is from the circular of Messrs Brown, Shipley & Co.]

Breadstuffs

The Liverpool Breadstuff's market was very buoyant, and all descriptions had advanced. Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co. quote the advance in Wheat at 3d per 70 pounds, in Barley 1 to 2d per bbl, and in Corn 3d per 480 pounds. The same circular quotes Western Canal Flour 38s to 42s 6d, and Ohio Flour 43s to 45s per barrel and White Corn 45s 6d to 46s per 480 pounds.

Provisions.

The Provision market was dull, the only change of moment being in lard, which had advanced slightly.

Consols

Had declined and were quoted at the close at 88¾.

In consequence of an interruption of the working of the telegraph last evening, we are unable to present our readers this morning with the details of the news by the Asia. It, or a portion of it, was received at New York last night, and published in the papers of that city this morning.

Halifax, May 7.—The Asia reports having seen the Collins steamship Baltic from New York for Liverpool, on the 20th ult.

The Crimea.

The latest accounts from Sebastopol, received on the 28th, the Asia's day of sailing are to the effect that the bombardment continued with unabated vigor.

Russian accounts, however, state that the fire of the Allies was growing feebler.

The Independence Belge had published a despatch stating that the bombardment had been discontinued, but it was from doubtful authority, and was believed to be without foundation in fact. Desperate sorties continued to be made by the Russians on the Allied troops before Sebastopol.

The Conference.

Two supplementary meetings had been held by the Vienna Conference, but without result.

Lord John Russell had left Vienna for England

Menschikoff not Dead.

The reported death of Prince Menschikoff is again denied, and it is positively stated that he is alive.

Austria and Prussia.

It was currently reported that an approximation towards amicable relations and a treaty of alliance had been made between Austria and Prussia.

Sardinia.

The Sardinian Ministry had resigned, probably owing to some differences on the question of the war.

Great Britain.

In the British Parliament there had been energetic questioning of the Ministry in relation to the war.

The French Exhibition.

The opening of the French Industrial Exhibition had been postponed until the 16th or 15th of May.

Money Market

The London money market was easier than at the date of our last accounts.

The closing quotations of consols for money was 88¾ to 88⅞.

Later from Havana.

Arrival of the Cahawba.

The U. S. mail steamship Cahawba, R. W. Shufeldt Commander, from New York the 25th ult., and Havana the first instant, crossed the Bar at half past 11 o'clock on Thursday night, and reached the levee yesterday morning.

Nothing of interest has recently transpired on the Island of Cuba.

Commodore McCauley was received with marked attention and courtesy by the Captain General and other Spanish officers. During his stay in Havana he had been extensively feted. The U. S. steam frigate San Jacinto, (Com. McCauley's flag ship) was the only U. S. man-of-war in the harbor—and she would leave on a cruise the 2d inst. The Princeton and Jamestown, it was reported, had gone over to Key West, where it is generally believed the Squadron will rendezvous. The Cyane and Falmouth had not arrived. The British frigate Vestal and the French man-of-war brig Malcagn were to see on the 1st. Capt. McCulloch (of New Orleans) had been released from prison. Mr. Felix still remained in confinement—it is not known when he will be sent to Cuba.

The business of the past week is represented as having been the best of the season. Havana continues perfectly healthy.

We find out much of interest in the Havana Papers. La Prensa contains accounts of evolutions of troops and steam battles, which it seems are resorted to either from lack of more substantial amusement, or for the purpose of being prepared to receive the filibusters in good style.

The ceremony of blessing and distributing the flags destined for the Havana volunteers was soon to take place. The religious portion of the ceremonies would be performed in the Cathedral with much pomp and splendor and the flags were to be distributed by the Captain General's own hand.

The Diario gives a description of a bull fight, in which Senor Matias Lazaro, the new Alfion of Cuba, slew a bull as he had previously announced, with no other weapons than those provided by nature—in other words, blows of his fist. La Prensa, however, states that instead of killing the bull he was killed himself, by the bull and was afterwards arrested for humbugging the people.

The Hon. Augustus Cæsar Dodge left the United States in the steamer Pacific on the 24 inst., to enter upon his diplomatic duties at Madrid. His instructions are said to be of an entirely pacific character.

General Intelligence.

Later from Texas.

Arrival of the U. S. Steamship Mississippi.

Capt. Lowden, arrived from Galveston on Saturday last, bringing our regular files of Texas exchanges. We find in them, however, very little of interest. The papers generally complain of the dry weather, and the injury likely to result there from, to the crops.

A correspondent of the Galveston News, writing from Lockhart, states that a man named A. W. Wheat was not dead a few days ago in that place by a man named Conway. It appears that Wheat had taken possession of Conway's house, and of his wife, and afterwards attacked him with a loaded whip, when the latter made use of his double-barreled gun.

The San Antonio Texan of the 26th ult., has the following paragraphs:

Eight or ten Indians were seen about twenty miles west of our city a few days since and we have since been informed that some persons in pursuit had a conflict with them, but with what success we are not able to learn with certainty. We shall know the particulars in a few days.

We are informed that the grasshoppers are so numerous in portions of Medina county that they have already destroyed all the crops that have been planted, and even cut. We are informed also that they are very numerous in several parts of the State.

An alligator measuring about ten feet in length, was killed a few days ago in the San Antonio River, opposite Goliad.

The Victoria Advocate, of the 21st, states that the mail bag for Refugio, containing the letters for Corpus Christi and other points west, was cut open somewhere, either at New Orleans, or on the route, and every package taken out. No discovery as yet has been made, as to who is guilty.

The Seguin Mercury says a number of gentlemen are about to establish cotton factories on the San Marcos. Those interested are enterprising men.

The contract for the completion and equipment of the first section of twenty-five miles of the Galveston and Red River Railroad, leading from the city of Houston to some point about two miles beyond Hoods, and the crossing of Cypress Creek, has been let to Mr. J. H. Wells, of New York city.

Louisiana.—The Baton Rouge Advocate states that a new wealthy company of New Orleans have purchased Dunbar's Springs and the land contiguous, bordering on the Amite, in the Parish of Livingston, about fourteen miles distant, and nearly due east from Baton Rouge. The waters of these springs are known to possess valuable medicinal properties, which have heretofore been fully tested; and it is supposed that a careful analysis of their ingredients, shortly to be exhibited, will present a most satisfactory result.

The Advocate says: It has rained above and below, east and west of us, and we yet suffer on, without having been visited by anything worthy of denominating rain. We understand that heavy rains have fallen some ten miles east from town, on the road leading to the Amite.

We extract the following from an article in the Baton Rouge Gazette of Saturday last upon the weather and crops:

Since September last, a good and beneficial rain has not cooled the parched ground, or given a chance to vegetation to make any more than a sickly and withered appearance. In the northern part of this State, as far down as the cotton extends, the prospect of corn and cotton is distressing, and on many plantations the cotton has not been planted at all, or even if it possible to break the ground until a good rain infuses a little life. Several of the planters in the Pine Woods, and even in the Felicianas, have to travel from five to eight miles to water their cattle. Every stream, ninth and pond (many of which had not been known to dry within the memory of the oldest inhabitant) are drained of their last drop.

In some parts of Livingston parish, numerous cane lands have been on fire for more than a month, and it is doubtful whether the Odyssey will be able to stop the ravages of this fire. The cracking and roasting of the canes can be heard at half a mile distance, and the whole appearance of that country is gloomy. Unless we have very early, the failure of any crop this year in this section will be a virtual one.

In some places the plant sugar cane thrives slowly, but the sun is consequently ruined.

The Concordia Intelligencer of Friday last says:

The stand of cotton seems to be excellent in our vicinity; the plant fresh and healthy looking, but the crop small for the season. Corn does not look so promising as cotton. Much that was planted did not come up in consequence of the dry and heated state of the earth.

We had a slight sprinkling of rain on Wednesday evening last, very much to the surprise and gratification of every body. On Tuesday night last, we understand, there was a good rain in the neighborhood of Trinity.

We learn from the Clinton Wilk, that a line of stages has been established between that place and Amite City, on the New Orleans and Jackson Railroad.

The Plaquemine Sentinel of Saturday says:

On Sunday, Tuesday and on Wednesday night, we were blessed here to Plaquemine with refreshing showers. Today (Friday) looks cloudy.

The "Last Fast" Steamboat.—The appearance in the East River yesterday afternoon, of a small experimental steamboat—the Ida—created quite a stir among the shipping, in fact all who saw her seemed to be chained to get a peep at her. The boat is 62 feet long, 6 feet 6 inches beam, and draws 10 inches. Her engine is oscillating, with cylinder of 4 inches bore and 12 inches stroke, rated at 3 horse power. With a pressure of 110 to 120 lbs, the speed attained—15 persons on board—was from 8 to 10 miles per hour through the water. The same boat and engine, with the ordinary means of propulsion, runs from 5 to 6 miles per hour, showing a gain of nearly 100 per cent. in speed, and more than that in effective power.

The peculiarity in the Ida's construction is entirely in the arrangement of the paddle wheel back of it. They are triangular in shape, somewhat resembling the tail of a fish, and are placed in pairs, one on each side of an iron rim. Each bucket being hinged at the sharpest point, and left to play freely backward and forward. Rods, properly affixed upon the rim, prevent the buckets from folding back against the rim, and hold them off at an acute angle. Each pair of buckets, therefore, enter and pass through the water, wedge-like, in the form of the letter V, and when the wheel is backed they assume the same form in the opposite direction.

Besides the increased speed, the advantage of these improved buckets is manifested in the very small quantity of water lifted or thrown by the paddle-wheels, and also in the entire absence of jar or vibration when they strike the water—the last the result of the gradually obtained pressure in having the point of the V-shaped pairs of buckets enter first.

The inventor of this truly ingenious contrivance is Mr. John U. Wallis, of North Danville, N. Y. He has secured patents for it in this country and also in England, France, Belgium, etc. [New York Sun.

From New Mexico.—A dispatch of the 30th from Washington, says:

Advices from Santa Fe state that on the 19th ult., two companies of the U. S. Troops, under Col. Fauntleroy, met a party of ninety Utah and Apache Indians, armed and mounted, in Chora'ch Pass. Five Utahs were killed and two dragoons wounded. On the next day a party of Apaches were taken in with and six killed. Some prisoners were taken. The command then returned to Fort Massachusetts, and expected shortly to go to Grand river.

On the 22d, Kit Carson, Lieut. Negruder, and Captain Williams' company on leaving Ponche Pass, saw a party of Utahs. Killed one and wounded another. Geo. Garland left Santa Fe on the 4th for Alberquerque, where he will expedite movements in the field.

The London Times and the British Government.—The repeal of the stamp duty on newspapers published in Great Britain will take from the public revenues of that country a million of dollars annually, a large portion of which will go into the coffers of the London Times. When the taxes on advertisements were repealed, that paper, it is stated, put into its pocket an income of one hundred thousand pounds by the measure. Now that the last restrictive duty is removed these changes in the revenue laws, and for the simple reason that while there would result an immediate increase to their profits, it was also apparent that a powerful blow would be given to the monopoly it had so long enjoyed, and that had enabled it to swallow up nearly all its competitors. The removal of burdensome taxes, it feared, would open the field to other journals, whose by enterprise might become in time its rivals, not only in wealth but also in popularity and influence. The colossal power that this newspaper establishment has gradually succeeded in acquiring and building for itself, in the face of parliaments and ministers, is well known, as also the sentimental tone it generally assumes in dealing with public men and measures, so that it may be safely conjectured the government in liberalizing its policy towards newspapers, had in view what it hoped would follow, the realization of the worst fears of the Times.

Terrific Explosion of a Powder-Mill.—On Wednesday morning last, about 8 o'clock, the chimney of Hedrickson & Detweiler, in Hayrock township, took fire and burned out near the top. Only two or three persons were in the mill at the time; they heard the roar of the fire, and ran out of the building, intending to procure buckets and ascend to the roof with water to prevent the shingles from taking fire. After a moment's reflection, they thought the most risking a hazardous one, and very prudently abandoned it. They made their escape as fast as possible. In a few moments the roof was on fire in several places, and it is said to have been about three minutes before a spark fell through the shingles into the main part of the building, where there was an immense of powder, which, of course, was instantly ignited, and the whole mill was blown sky-high, a part of it not having been seen since. The explosion was terrible and shook the country for miles around. It was distinctly heard in Jacksonville, Princeton and Doylestown. Mr. Charles Reid, residing a farm west of Hayrock, was plowing in the field at the time of the explosion. He informed us that the effect on him was of a stunning nature, and the earth trembled under his feet. The most intimate circumstance connected with the terrible catastrophe is that no one was killed. John Stonebach, Esq., feared himself by getting behind a large tree, less than a hundred yards from the fatal spot. One or two other persons, who were about the mill at the time, made their escapes, as above given, by a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether," and succeed in making their escape from the deadly infernal machine. [illegible] Sunset.... by Frederick Tennyson.

Now the lither, last runs up the golden stair
That leans from sleepy gates from Heaven to Earth,
And all atone to the empyreal air,
Pass in the twilight sweet measures of mirth;
Now far far away, hour by hour,
With the light upon his wings,
Is it a bird, or star
That shines and sings?

What matter if the days be dark and frore,
Their sunbeam both of other days to be,
And singing in the light that floods him o'er,
In joy he overlooks futurity;
Under cloud patches vast
He peers, and sees behind
Great Summer coming fast
Adown the wind!

And how he dives into a rainbow's rivers,
In streams of gold and purple he is drown'd,
Shaking the arrows of his song he shivers,
As though the stormy dirge were turned to sound;
And ever he leaves through
His widow is clearly woven,
Melody, thus falling deep,
His last notes showers.

Let every wind be hushed, that it may hear
The wondrous things he tells the world below—
Things that we dream of he is watching near;
Hopes that we never dream'd he would bestow.
Alas! the mortal faith roll'd
Down the golden notes again,
Or surely he had told,
Of Heaven to men!

So the victorious poet sings alone,
And fills with light his solitary home,
Through that glory sees new worlds foreshow,
And hears high songs, and triumphs yet to come;
He wove the air of them
With thrills of golden chords,
And makes the world to climb
On tiptoed words.

What if his hair be gray, his eyes be dim,
His limbs tremble him, and friends be cold?
Wonder unseen is for thousand gates to him,
Truth waiteth his, nor beauty waxeth old;
More than he tells, his eyes
Behold, his spirit hears—
Of grief, and joy, and sighs
Twixt joy and tears.

Blest is the man who with the sound of song
Can charm away the heartsobs, and forget
The fear of penury, and the stings of wrong,
And drown the fatal whisper of regret!
Darker are the abodes
Of kings, though his be poor,
Who tuneless, like the toads
Pass through.

Blest is the man who sees up by the sky,
Whose heart a glad heart into the skies;
A maiden his own sunrise while he sings,
And paints the daily North to Paradise;
Time shall not cloy
For up the sunny stream;
Dawns, I hear his song;
I see his dreams.

THE PRETTY OLD LADY.

The following exquisite thing, which we find in Household Words, is probably from the pen of Charles Dickens:

She must have been very, very beautiful, when young; for, in childish eyes she had scarcely any imperfections, and we all know what acute and merciful critics children are. Her hair was quite white; not silvery, nor powdery, but pure glossy white, resembling spun glass. I have never been able to make my mind up whether she wore a cap, a hood, or one of those silken head-coverings of the last century called a calash. Whatever she wore, it became her infinitely. I incline, on second thoughts, more to the calash, and think she wore it in lieu of a bonnet, when she went abroad; which was but seldom. The portrait I have of the old lady is, indeed, blurred and dimmed by the lapse of many winters, and some tears. Her title of the pretty old lady was not given to her lightly. It was bruited many years ago—when ladies of fashion were drunk to in public, and gentlemen of fashion were drunk in public—that the pretty old lady was a "reigning toast."

A certain gray silk dress which as it had always square creases in it, I conjectured to be always new; decorated the person of the pretty old lady. She wore a profusion of black lace, which must have been priceless, for it was continually being mended, and its reversion was much coveted by the old lady's female friends. My aunt Jane, who was tremendously old, and was a lady, but whose faculties decayed somewhat towards the close of her life, was never so coherent (says an the subject of May-day and the sweeps) as when she speculated as to "who was to have the lace" after the old lady's demise. But my aunt Jane died first, and her doubts were never solved. More than this I can remember a fat-faced old gold watch which the pretty old lady wore at her waist; a plethoric mass of wheezing gold, like an oyster grown rich and knowing the time of day. Attached to this she wore some trinkets—not the nonsensical charms or breloques that young ladies wear on their chatelaines now, but sensible substantial ornaments—a signet-ring of her grandfather's; a smelling bottle covered with silver filegree; and a little golden box in the form of a book with clasps, which we waggish youngsters declared to be the old lady's snuff-box, but which I believe now, to have been a pounce-box—the same perhaps, which the lord, who was perfumed like a milliner, held 'twixt his finger and thumb, upon the battle field, and which, ever and anon he gave his nose.

I trust I am not treading on dangerous ground when I say, that two of the chief prettinesses of the pretty old lady were her feet and their covering. "To ladies' eyes a round, boys!" Certainly, Moore; we can't refuse; but to ladies' feet, a round boys, also, if you please. How the pretty old lady had the prettiest of feet, with the most delicate of gray silk stockings, the understandings of the finest, softest, most lustrous leather that ever came from innocent kid. I will back those feet (to use the parlance of this horse racing age), and those shoes and stockings against any in the known world, in ancient or modern history or romance; against Dorothee's tiny feet dabbling in the stream; against Maidora's paddling in the cool brook; against Sara la Baignouse swinging in her silken hammock; against De Grammont's Miss Howard's green stockings; against Madame la Pompadour's golden clocks and red-heeled mules; against Noblet, Taglioni, Cerito's, against Madame Vestris's, as modelled in Wax by Signor M. N. There's are no such feet as the pretty old lady's now; or, if any such exist, their possessors don't know how to treat them. The French ladies are rapidly losing the art of putting on shoes and stockings with taste; and I deliberately declare, in the face of Europe, that I have not seen, within the last three months in Paris—from the Boulevard des Italiens to the Bell of the Perfect of the Seine—a single pair of irreproachable feet. The system, artificially arched instep; the geometrical ankle of gentle curves and undulations, the delicate advancement and retrogression of the foot of beauty, are all things falling into decadence. The American overshoes, the machine-made hosiery, and the trailing draperies, are completing the ruin of shoes and stockings.

The pretty old lady had never been married. Her father had been a man of fashion—a gay man—a first-rate buck, a sparkling rake; he had known taste, he had driven curricles, he had worn the finest of fine linen, the most resplendent of shoe buckles; he had once come into the possession of five thousand pounds sterling, upon which capital—quite casting the grovelling doctrine of interest to the wind—he had determined to try the fascinating experiment of living at the rate of five thousand a year. In this experiment he succeeded to his heart's content for the exact period of one year and one day, after which he had lived (at the same rate) on credit; after that on the credit of his credit; after that on his wits; after that in the rules of the King's Bench; after that on the certainty of making so many tricks, nightly, at whist; and, finally, upon his daughter. For the pretty old lady, with admirable self-abnegation, and even her two ugly sisters married; had with some natural tears, refused Capt. Catts, of the line, whom she loved—but who had nothing but his pay—and had contentedly accepted the office of governess; whence, with much self denial, much saving, pinching, and saving—how many times her little cobwebs of economy were ruthlessly swept away by her gay father's turn for whist and hazard; cobwebs that took years to concentrate! she had promoted herself to the dignity of a schoolmistress; governing in that capacity that fine old red-brick ladies' seminary at Paddington; pulled down for the railway now; Portchester House.

'Twas there I first saw the old lady, for I had a cousin receiving her "finishing" at Portchester House, and 'twas there; being as she was some eight years of age; that I first fell in love with a astonishingly beautiful creature, with raven hair and gazelle-like eyes, who was the governess's assistant, and the eldest girl in the school. When I paid my cousin a visit, I was accustomed to feel very little boy of my age; to sit at the same table. I used to set opposite to the pretty old lady, and be fed by her with [illegible] cakes, and [illegible] tarts, which are so frequently met with at genteel tea-tables. I loved her fondly, wildly; but she dashed my spirits to the ground by telling me not to make faces. I wonder whether she married a duke?

The pretty old lady kept school at Portchester House, for many, many years, supporting and comforting that fashionable fellow, her father. She had sacrificed her youth, the flattings of her beauty, her love, her hopes everything. The gay fellow had grown a little paralytic at last; and, becoming very old and imbecile and harmless, had been relegated to an upper apartment in Portchester House. Here, for several years he had vegetated in a sort of semi-fabulous existence as the "old gentleman;" very many of the younger ladies being absolutely unaware of him; till, one evening, a neat coffin with plated nails and handles, arrived at Portchester House, for somebody aged 73; and the cook remarked to the grocer's young man that the "old gentleman" had died that morning.

The pretty old lady continued the education of generations of black-eyed Junos, in French, geography, the use of the globes, and the usual branches of a polite education, long after her father's death. Habit is habit; Lieutenant Colonel Catts had died of fever in the Walcheren expedition—so the pretty old lady kept school at Porchester House until she was very old. When she retired, she devised all her savings to her ugly sister's children; and calmly, cheerfully placidly prepared to lay herself down in her grave. Here had been a long journey and a sore servitude; but, perhaps, something was said to her at the end, about being a good and faithful servant and that it was well done.

Such is the dim outline which the picture in my portfolio presents to me of the pretty old lady. Sharpened as her pretty features were by age, the gentle touch of years of peace, of an equable mind and calm desires, had passed lovingly over the asperities of her face, and softened them. Wrinkles she must have had; for the stern usurer Time will have his bond; but she had smiled her wrinkles away, or had laughed them into dimples. Our just, though severe mother Nature, had rewarded her for having worn no rouge in her youth, no artificial flowers in her spring; and gave her blooming roses in her December. Although the sunset of her eyes was come and they could not burn you up nor melt you as in the noon-tide; the sky was yet pure, and the luminary sank to rest in a bright halo; the shadows that it cast were long, but sweet and peaceful—not murky and terrible. The night was coming, but it was to be a night starlit with faith and hope and not a season of storms.

It was for this reason I think, that, being old, feeling old, looking old, proud of being old, and yet remaining handsome, the pretty old lady was so beloved by all the pretty girls. They adored her. They called her a "dear old thing." They insisted upon trying their new bonnets, shawls, scarfs, and similar feminine fal-lals, upon her. They made her the fashion, and dressed up to her. They never made her spiteful presents of fleecy hosiery, to guard against a rheumatism with which she was not afflicted; or entreated her to tie her face up when she had no toothache; or bawled in her ear on the erroneous assumption that she was deaf—as girls will do, in pure malice, when age forgets its privileges, and apes the levity and sprightliness of youth. Above all, they trusted her with love-secrets—I must mention that; though a spinster, the pretty old lady was always addressed as Mistress. She was great in love matters—a complete letter writer, without its verbosity; as prudent as Pamela, as tender as Amelia, as judicious as Hooker, as dignified as Sir Charles Grandison. She could scent a Lovelace at an immense distance, old Tom Jones mend his ways, reward the constancy of an uncle Toby, and reform a Capt. Booth, I warrant the perverse Widow and Sir Roger de Coverly would have been brought together, had the pretty old lady known the parties and been consulted. She was conscientious and severe, but not intolerant and implacable. She did not consider every man in love a "wretch," or every woman in love a "silly thing." She was pitiful to love, for she had known it. She could tell a tale of love as moving as any to her. Its hero died at Walcheren.

Where shall I find pretty old ladies now-a-days? Where are they gone—those gentle, kindly, yet dignified, antiquated dames, married and single?

My young friend Adolescens comes and tells me that I am wrong, and that there are as many good old ladies now as of yore. It may be so: it may be, that we think those pleasant companionships lost because the years are gone in which we enjoyed them, and that we imagine there are no more old ladies, because those we loved are dead.

THE CARE OF THE EYES.—Until one begins to feel the effect of impaired vision, he can hardly estimate the value of eye-sight, and consequently, from ignorance or carelessness, he is apt to neglect a few simple precautions, by the observance of which his sight might be preserved. We are aware that the columns of a newspaper do not afford the space, nor is an editor qualified to treat scientifically of the injuries which accrue to the organs of vision; but certainly the knights of the editorial craft ought to have some practical experience upon artificial light, more of which they consume than falls to the lot of other men.

Let us, then, give our readers a few hints upon the preservation of sight, which we deduce from our own experience, and if we are incorrect, our medical friends, and particularly opticians, are welcome to our columns, to correct our errors. We are not about to interfere with those who have resorted to spectacles, for the optician alone can benefit them; but there are multitudes who, perhaps, ought to wear spectacles, but will not, either from their inconvenience, or from an idea that theroby they confess that time has taken too strong hold upon them. Such ask, whether they can see better than they now do without the use of glasses. To the most of these we answer, yes, provided you will follow these simple directions.

First, never use a writing-desk or table with your face toward a window. In such case the rays of light come directly upon the pupils of the eyes, and causing an unnatural contraction thereof, soon permanently injures the sight. Next, when your table or desk is near a window, sit so that your face turns from, not toward, the window while you are writing. If your face is toward the window, the oblique rays strike your eye, injure it nearly as much as the direct rays when you sit in front of the window. It is best always to sit or stand while reading or writing with the window behind you; and next to that, with the light coming over your left side; then the light illumines the paper or book, and does not shine abruptly upon the eye-ball.

The same remarks are applicable to artificial light. We are often asked what is the best light; gas, candles, oil, or camphene. Our answer is, it immaterial which, provided the light of either be strong enough, and did not flicker. A gas fish tail burner should never be used for reading or writing, because there is a constant oscillation or flickering of the flame. Candles, unless they have self-consuming wicks, which do not require snuffing, should not be used. We need scarcely say that all wicks which crust over, and thus diminish the light, are good for nothing; and the same is true of compounds of the nature of camphene, unless the wicks are properly trimmed of all their gumary deposit after standing twenty-four hours.

But whatever the artificial light used, let it strike the paper or book which you are using, whenever you can, from over the left shoulder. This can always be done with gas, for that light is strong enough, and so is the light from camphene, oil, etc, provided it comes through a circular burner like the Argand. But the light, whatever it be, should always be protected from the air in the room by a glass chimney, so that the light may be steady. [Boston Herald.

ACCIDENT AND LOSS OF LIFE.—An accident occurred on last Saturday, about eighty miles below this city, which resulted in the loss of three men. At the point designated, the steamer National, bound for this port, met the steamer Columbus going down. A yawl, containing Capt. Carlisle, a well known pilot, and several others, put off from the Columbus for the purpose of putting Capt. C. on the National, he having gone down for the purpose of looking at the river. The engines of the National were stopped, and the yawl in approaching the steamer, went in front of the wheel, which was turning by the force of the current. Capt. C. sprang upon the guards of the boat, but the yawl containing the others, was caught in the wheel and upset. Two men were drowned and another so badly injured that he died on the passage up. One of the pilots of the Columbus, who was in the yawl, swam ashore. The unfortunate men who were lost were deck hands on the Columbus. [St. Louis Republican, 24.

Two Hours In a Miracle Circle.

The editor of the New York Leader gives his experience in spiritual manifestations. We suspect that he has a design of serving somebody as the editor of the California Pioneer served Judge Edmonds, and therefore we shall receive his story with due caution and allowance. However, it will be found interesting in its way.

We confess to a "hard-hoort of unbelief" as regards the supernatural origin of the phenomena witnessed in the so-called "spiritual circles" in this city and elsewhere; and yet we are totally unable to account, on any known principle of physics, for the "manifestations" which we saw, felt and heard, in the private dwelling of a gentleman of this city, and in the presence of intimate personal friends, a few evenings ago. That trick or collusion should be resorted to by the gentlemen there assembled—individuals of character and standing in the community, and many of them personally unknown to each other, is in the highest degree improbable; and even had any members of the party been disposed to practice imposition, it is difficult to conceive how they could have done so without detection. We shall offer no theory nor hypothesis for the purpose of explaining what, to us, is inexplicable, but will merely state a few facts, leaving our readers to draw their own conclusions.

Twenty persons were present at the meeting of the "circle" to which we allude. Previously to taking our seats at the "manifestation" board, the tables—common kitchen tables of various sizes, arranged lengthwise in the middle of the room—were carefully inspected. The floor, too, which was covered with an elegant Brussels carpet, was suspiciously examined, and after the unbelievers had been thoroughly satisfied that there was neither trap-doors, concealed wires, nor any other mechanical means of working miracles in the apartment, we took our seats, side by side, at the tables, with a "medium" at each extremity of the range. The mediums, it should be remarked, were not professional operators, but gentlemen holding respectable positions in society.

We had been seated about ten minutes, when one of the party announced that he was "touched." One of the mediums, under what seemed to be spasmodic impulse, seized a pencil lying on the table, and wrote in a blank copy-book open before him, "Put your hand under the table." This was done, and a "cold grasp" reported. The same person, a young man who had been introduced to the circle for the first time that evening, was then told to hold a watch under the table. He did so, and soon exclaimed, in great excitement, that it had been forcibly wrested from him. Shortly afterward, the writer of this article, who was seated by the side of an intimate friend, and opposite to an old acquaintance, was "touched." Something like the paw of a large dog passed up the outside of one leg, and down the inside of the other, and we could distinctly hear the brushing of a substance against the casimere. We forthwith kicked out toward all points of the compass, but encountered nothing save "the entrenchant air." Our hand was then ordered under the table, and was immediately struck on the back part by some heavy soft substance. A moment later, a small, cold, double-fist was placed in our open palm, and the watch which had been "spirited" away a few moments before, was deposited there. As the fingers of the mysterious hand unclosed, in the act of depositing the watch, we partially grasped them, but they were quickly withdrawn.

The next performance was a series of touches and pinchings, which made several of the company squirm. A handkerchief and pocket-book were subsequently carried off in the same manner as the watch; and one young gentleman had a long and apparently violent struggle for the possession of a glove with the unknown powers that were carooling among our legs. Finally, the visible prevailed over the invisible, and the young man jerked the glove from beneath him, when there appeared, upon the end opposite to the one he held, an imprint of the digits with which his own had been tussling under the table. At this time some anxiety being exhibited by the owner of the pocket-book as to the fate of its contents, the lights were ordered to the floor, and this article was found unopened and in good condition on the carpet. An opportunity was thus afforded for a second examination of the floor, etc; but no evidences of mechanical agency could be discovered.

Our knees and shins were now brushed repeatedly by what seemed at one time to be a wing, and at another a paw or hand; and a noise, as of the collision of substance with substance, could be heard at the moment of contact. While these "games" were in progress, hands were, from time to time, ordered under the "miracle board," and letters and pictures placed in them, and drawn to the surface. Some of the letters were very ably worded, and in one of them, containing eight pages of manuscript, our own thoughts were replied to. We were not "touched" for some minutes, and were wishing for another demonstration, when the letter came up. It was a bitterly satirical effusion, purporting to come from a defunct English actor, and contained a caustic sneer at our anxiety to be "pinched under the table."

About this time, a package some ten inches square was thrust with violence over the edge of the table. It was directed to a gentleman present, and, on opening it, a very clever oil painting, signed "William Hogarth," appeared. Its style would have been pronounced by any artist a very clever imitation of the art of the great caricaturist, and a well-known painter present declared it was "Hogarth all over." Three small sketches in water-colors then came up, one of which, purporting to be a "Gainsborough," fell to our lot. It is now in our possession, and is a very pretty little affair, but not a "Gainsborough," unless he has altered his style very materially in the Spirit-land. The Spiritual Express from below suspended its deliveries at this juncture, and several letters were shied from the walls, and dropped from the ceiling. They were all well written, and all in divers hands, the chirography of no two of them being alike. Fancy inks would seem to be in vogue among the invisibles; for some of the letters were written in red ink, other in blue and black, and occasionally two or three colors were merged in a single word.

Rare Ben Johnson was the presiding genius of the circle. He was the first to address the party by letter, and his "good-bye," written by one of the mediums, and verified by a fac-simile of the jovial old dramatist's signature, closed the amusements of the evening.

Before leaving, the company were shown two well-executed oil paintings, one said to be by Rembrandt, the other a portrait of Ben Johnson; which had been transmitted to the circle on former occasions; also a pen-and-ink portrait of Rembrandt, evidently by a master-hand. Those works of art, if got up for the occasion, must be rather expensive jokes. They are given indiscriminatingly to strangers and regular members of the circle, and the exhibitions are entirely gratuitous, and are accompanied by the hospitalities which gentlemen are accustomed to tender to their invited guests.

We might go on to mention many other marvels which we saw, and a still greater number, infinitely more astounding, which were solemnly vouchsafed for by two of our personal friends, who had visited the circle before; but we prefer to rest here. Probably, a less credulous person than ourself, in all that relates to the (so-called) supernatural, does not exist; we have, therefore, merely stated a few simple facts, leaving to our readers the task of framing marvels to account for them.

FROM KEY WEST.—On Tuesday 20th, the pilot boat Champion, of Key West, fell in with an hermaphodite brig in the Gulf, twenty miles S.S.W. from Sand Key Light, abandoned, and towed her into port. From appearances on board of her, it was believed that she was a clayer, which had landed her slaves on the coast of Cuba and then abandoned by her crew.

A brig, name unknown, was towed into Key West by wreckers on the 25th, which had been ashore on Collins' Patches.

The schooner J. H. Brayton parted her moorings on Sunday, April 8th, and went ashore near the fort, (Taylor) and was so much damaged that she had to be hauled out on the ways and a part of her cotton taken out.

ALABAMA AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD.—The company have started a tri-weekly train of cars on the Alabama and Mississippi Road, leaving Selma in the morning for Harrell's across Roads, a point 14 miles from Marion and 18 miles from Uniontown, and returning in the evening. This gives facilities to many planters who now have their cotton at different points on the Cahawba river, awaiting a rise, as well as many others who have not as yet carried their crops to market. It also affords a convenience to persons who wish to go to Marion, Greensborough, or any other place west. [Montgomery Mail.

U. S. COMMISSIONER'S COURTS—Examination of the Postmaster.—The examination of Mr. Wm. G. Kendall, postmaster of this city, upon the charge preferred against him by Mr. David P. Blair, the special agent of the Post-Office Department, viz: embezzling a letter containing $600, which was sent by a house in Memphis, Tenn., to the house of Wills, Rawlins & Co., in this city Mr. Blair and Attorney General Morse appeared for the prosecution, and Mr Kendall appeared with Messrs Randall Hunt and J. P. Benjamin for counsel. Mr. Kendall comforted himself coolly and good-humoredly, affecting to consider the whole proceeding a farce.

Wm Milton, of Memphis, Tenn., sworn—Eight five dollar bills on the Northern Bank of Mississippi were identified by this witness as a portion of the $600 sent to Wills, Rawlins & Co., and insured by him in Memphis, on the 13th June, 1854; identified them by his stamp on each of them; two of them had the stamps still clear—the others had these partially erased or scratched off. Was afterwards called upon to pay the money, which he was informed by officials of Wills, Rawlins, & Co., and post-office certificate, had never reached New Orleans.

C. H. Ayers, of Carrollton, Miss., sworn—This witness examined the eight notes, by a record of their dates, numbers and letters, which he made before they first passed from his hands. He got them on the 17th September, 1853, in a letter from New Orleans, signed by Marshall Hanson, requesting him to pay the money to a certain person, whom he never found. As the notes had stamps partially scratched off, and came from a person he had no knowledge of, himself and his brother thought it suspicious. A friend, Mr J. D. McLemore, asked if he might inform Judge Mills, the President, or head man of the Northern Bank, of the circumstance. Witness consented. Judge Mills afterwards wrote to witness for the notes, and they were sent to him, a record of them being first taken. On or about the 12th or 14th of February, 1855, witness got a second letter signed Marshall Hanson, requesting him to mail back the money, which he did; but not having the notes, sent a draft for the amount on Wright, Davenport & Co. Witness informed Judge Mills that he had a second letter from Marshall Hanson, after which he got a letter from Blair, the mail agent. Never had any correspondence with McGibbeney or Whitman, and knew nothing of them.

Mr. Morse here produced some letters of Kendall's to be compared with those signed Marshall Hanson.

Mr. Kendall, glancing over these letters, said they might be forgeries, the same as the other two, (signed Hanson.)

Mr. Morse said that if the gentleman could not identify his own handwriting he would introduce witnesses who could.

C. W. Cammack, Paying Teller of Citizens' Bank, sworn. Was familiar with Kendall's writing and signature. [A bundle of five letters, all signed Kendall, handed to witness.] After a hurried glance, would pronounce them to be Kendall's. Himself, Mr. Forbes, if not Kendall's, were a very good imitation of his writing—would pronounce them the same under other circumstances. Certain letters corresponded precisely, the capital D's in particular. The letters generally appeared to be in the same handwriting; but he might be mistaken.

Mademoiselle sworn.—Is paying teller of the Canal Bank, and familiar with Kendall's writing. Thinks the letters are very much alike—would pay money to Kendall's order in the handwriting of any of the letters.

Mr. Forbes' sworn.—Is paying teller in the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank. Had examined the letters carefully; would think the handwriting the same, though a difference was apparent; certain capitals were entirely alike, and the a's in both writings looked like o's. The general difference was not as great as he had seen in the same person's writing, done at different times.

Rufus Delbear sworn.—Discovered a striking resemblance in the letters. The general style, or movement of the hand, was the same, and certain letters identical. Had no doubt they were all written by the same hand.

George Weldon sworn.—Was dismissed from the post-office about the 28th of February; not there now. Knows Kendall's handwriting; and believes all the letters to be his. Hearing that Ayers had sent a draft on Wright, Davenport & Co., to Marshall Hanson's order, witness went to the U. S. Commissioner, and got out a warrant and an officer, to be stationed at Wright, Davenport & Co.'s in order to seize whoever should present the draft. Ayers' letter to Hanson never came to the office, though witness kept watch for it. While thus watching for it, a letter came addressed to Marshall Hanson, from Cincinnati. Witness took it, and, accompanied by a post-office clerk as a witness, went to the kitchen of the City Hotel, where he opened the envelope by steaming it; read the letter; took it to McDowell, Mills & Co.'s, one of which firm ordered a clerk to copy it; a new envelope was then put upon the original, the marks imitated or counterfeited as nearly as possible, and a Cincinnati post-office stamp put on with printing materials at the Bulletin job-office; it was then put back in the post-office; witness watched it all day; no one came for it; but next morning it had disappeared. [The copy of the letter was here produced and read. Marshall Hanson, March 24th, 1855, inquires of some Cincinnati publishing house on what terms they will print a bogus newspaper of certain dimensions—to be printed there, but dated as at New Orleans—the articles to be highly personal about various parties in New Orleans, but not true. On the back of the sheet, the publishers answer, that they are not in want of such a job, but if Hanson will establish his veracity, and secure them against damage, they won't refuse it these hard times, and wind up by telling him to send along the "copy" and the money. Signed "L. & P."—this being the nearest the letter contains to the publishers names.] This letter of Hanson's looked like Kendall's, and he could swear to it. Ayers' letter to Hanson was entered on the way-bill with two other letters; the latter being receipted here, but the former not. The witness stated, at the request of Mr. Morse, that his motives in this business were entirely of an official character.

David P. Blair sworn.—Is the special agent of the Post-Office Department. The letter which Ayers' mailed to Hanson, passed through the Vicksburg post-office on the 8th of March; the way-bill shows that it was received in New Orleans, though never receipted. Witness took from the post-office here, during the clerk his receipt for them, three letters addressed to Marshall Hanson, which were advertised on the 15th of April—long after the probable time of their arrival here. He opened them, read them, and closed them again. One was from Hoama, Louisiana, and the others from Lafayette county, Tenn.—there being no such county, though there is a Fayette county. The letter from Houma was a trap-letter sent there by McDowell, Mills & Co.'s clerk (W. G. Betterton) to be sent back here; and this clerk has since furnished witness a copy of the letter.

Counsel wishing to have the Fayette letters read, Mr. Blair did not wish to open them again; said they were in the possession of the Court, who might do as he pleased with them. Mr. Hunt made some remarks about the singularity of these samples, after witness had privately opened the letters.

Mr. Blair then broke open the letters, remarking significantly, that he never expected to be prosecuted for it by any such person as Mr. Marshall Hanson, and proceeded to read them. The first letter, dated January 10th, 1855, purports to be from Hanson's wife, stating that she had received all he sent her—wanted him to give up roving and come home, to stay awhile anyhow—had been to Holly Springs to see sis, and helped her come—doesn't like the trip—signed "your own dear Lucy." The other, dated April 1st, mentions receiving a hank check—wants him to come home—don't know where he is—talks mysteriously about his wild doings, and her keeping mum—thinks he ought to think more of "our darling Nelly, who is getting to be a right smart girl, and comes home from school every other Saturday, saying that her teacher, Miss Jones, is a very nice lady—signed, "your dear duck, Lucy." Witness had inquired, both at Holly Springs and Lagrange, and in vain, for any persons named Hanson, or a school teacher named Miss Jones. Witness was perfectly satisfied the letters were bogus, written to create the belief that Hanson was really existing personage; and thinks they were written by the same individual who personated Hanson. Did not consider these letters as necessary in evidence—there was plenty of evidense besides. Had no personal feeling whatever against Kendall; but knew him to be an inefficient Postmaster, and had so reported him at Washington.

G. W. Adams sworn.—While at Cooper's Well, Miss., in August last, witness received a letter from Marshall Hanson, in New Orleans, inclosing forty dollars of the stamped bills on the Northern Bank of Mississippi, which he was requested to pay over to some invalid who was soon to reach the Well but never appeared. Kept the letter and notes in his trunk till some time in October, when he got another letter from Hanson, asking him to return the money, or his check for it; upon which he sent back the notes. Knew Kendall for many years in Mississippi; but never heard of such a person as Marshall Hanson before. As near as witness could recollect, the writing in those letters was the same as that of the letters in court.

Mr. Serra sworn.—Is a bank clerk, and familiar with manuscripts. Thinks all the letters written by the same hand, but cannot swear to it.

C. H. Manson sworn.—Is clerk at Wills, Rawlins & Co.'s. Another valuable package, which was mailed at Memphis at the same time with the missing one, came to hand, and the firm were notified of its arrival by the proper clerk in the postoffice. Of the arrival of the missing package they never received any notice.

The Attorney-General said he would rest the case here. Mr Benjamin stated that he would not introduce witnesses for the defence until this (Tuesday) evening, when he expected to prove, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the missing letter to Wills, Rawlings & Co., never reached this city. He would cross-examine the witnesses for the defence, however, at present.

Mr. Jumonville recalled.—The letters signed Kendall and those signed Hanson all look alike. Some little difference in the writing, but certain letters exactly alike. Believes the hand writing to be the same.

Mr. Forbes recalled.—The letters seem a little different, but some words are identical. [Witness was shown a number of checks, on two different banks—some signed W. G. Kendall, and others Wm. G. Kendall.] Would pronounce them all genuine, if presented at bank at 2 P. M. Did not think the signature to a certain one of the letters was genuine.

Mr. Cammack recalled.—Examined five letters signed Kendall—only one of the letters would do for him to pay a check on. Compared them with the Hanson letters—considerably puzzled—the gas-light bad. Examined the checks—if filled out by Kendall, he might pay them in bank, but if presented by a stranger wouldn't pay one of them. Said Kendall didn't write any of them—then, again, he might have done it. [The manner in which this witness inspected the letters and checks, and his mystification, afforded much amusement to Court and spectators, the prisoners and his counsel seeming to enjoy the fun best of any.]

The counsel for the defence here closed the cross-examination, and the Court adjourned to this evening. The examination lasted three hours, and the court room was crowded to suffocation with eager spectators.

QUEER FIX.—A prominent citizen of Alabama, on a visit to Mobile, on Friday last, received the following telegraphic dispatch from his family physician. "Fine boy—both doing well. Ten pounds. Yours, &c." And in a few moments the following from an individual friend. "Nice little girl at your house. All right. Yours, &c., S. P. W."

The bewildered father at last accounts, was trying to discover whether it was a boy or girl, or twins.

CROPS AT THE NORTH.—Our Northern exchanges, from Long Island to the Missouri river, assure us that there is a good prospect for an unusually large product of wheat and other crops of small grain the coming season. The news to this effect from the great Northwest is especially cheering. Spurred up by the high prices of the last year's scanty returns, the farmers out there have provided for an abundant harvest, and they are appropriating the opening spring in active plowing and sowing in order to supply as far as possible all existing and prospective deficiencies elsewhere. [N. Y. Herald.

The Boston Transcript says the Administration is engaged in removing postmasters in small towns in New Hampshire who voted the 'Know-Nothing ticket at the recent election.

MISSISSIPPI.—The Jackson Mississippian of Friday last says:

It has been four weeks since a rain has fallen in this region. The consequence is, that crops of corn, cotton and oats, are very unpromising. Unless it rains in a very short time, it will be impossible to get stands of cotton; and the corn already drooping, will wither and die. This article is selling here from a dollar to a dollar and fifty cents per bushel, and is scarcely to be had at any price. Planters who would otherwise spare small quantities to those who are needing it, are afraid to do so in view of the threatened failure of the growing crop. We are apprehensive that a season of unparalleled distress is before us.

The Ocean Springs Gazette, of Saturday, says:

We had a fine rain in these parts this week, which was extremely welcome to the parched up gardens. This is said to have been the driest season in this latitude for many years. Even April failed to bring the showers, high have been her characteristics in all other years.

Two Americans, one named McGill, were arrested as rebels, for participating in the late riots in Australia. They have, however, been discharged.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty, and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

AUCTION OF SOULS—PULPIT AND HAMMER.

In the imperial salt mines of Sowar, in Upper Hungary, "there is one thing," writes a traveler, "very remarkable—viz: a chapel which may easily contain a hundred people, cut in the rock-salt, with an altar, pulpit, sacristy, chairs and forms cut in the same rock."

Now, a church of salt—salt in its typical purity—is the Established Church of England; and yet the auctioneer will now and then usurp the place of the parson, and sometimes the pulpit will resound with the hammer of the rostrum. The custom is to be deplored; for may it not, in light and superficial minds, deprive the salt of somewhat of its orthodox savor? When souls are made a matter of auction, the change of the aforesaid immortal essences loses a trifle of its divinity. The shepherd who buys his sheep, with the not of purchase, may think he buys an undoubted right to sell them.

A few months ago certain Christian flocks were submitted to the hammer at the auction mart, and knocked down to the best Christian pastors—viz., to those happy shepherds who could best afford to offer the highest price for the chattels. No doubt the auctioneer did his best in the disposal of the goods, after the approved method of auctioneers in general.

"Gentlemen," says the man with the hammer, "the next article I have the honor to submit to your emulation is the advowson, with patronage, &c., of the rectory of Trettire and Michael Church, Herefordshire; net annual value, £250; present incumbent, seventy-four years of age. What shall we say for the rectory of Trettire and Michael? Herefordshire—splendid county, magnificent hills, that lift the thoughts of churchmen to the devotional altitude; beautiful thriving pasturage for sheep. Malvern mutton, for instance—unparalleled! Now an offer, if you please, gentlemen, for Trettire and Michael; net value, £250, gentlemen. Further, gentlemen, present incumbent is seventy-four years of age! seventy-four, gentlemen! So be quick with your biddings."

First Bidder—One thousand pounds!

Auctioneer—A thousand pounds? What! and present incumbent with one leg in the grave? Think of the county, gentlemen; the feet of the everlasting hills of Herefordshire, and mend your bidding.

Second Bidder—One thousand two hundred!

Auctioneer—And present incumbent seventy-four? Pray, gentlemen, do not forget; one leg in the grave, gentlemen! at least one leg.

Third Bidder—Fifteen hundred!

Auctioneer—Come, we're getting on. But fifteen hundred! only fifteen hundred for Trettire and Michael! Going like a drug, gentlemen, like a drug. I should be sorry to find no better devotion to the church than—thank you, sir, sixteen hundred!—no warmer enthusiasm for the Established Church, and that at the present time, when rampant Popery threatens—one thousand seven hundred! thank you—our altars and our homes—seventeen hundred and fifty! thank you—and present incumbent seventy-four—sev-en-ty-fo-ur! and, according to the course of all sublunary things, with one leg in the grave, gentlemen—a human and commercial fact you cannot too well consider, gentlemen. No advance on seventeen hundred and fifty, and one leg in the grave?

Fourth Bidder—Eighteen hundred!

Auctioneer—Thank you. But consider, gentlemen, the span of life; seventy-four, and one—

Fifth Bidder—Eighteen hundred and fifty!

Sixth Bidder—Ninety!

Auctioneer—Thank you. Eighteen hundred and ninety for Trettire and Michael! Salubrious county—seventy-four—one leg in the grave—and the best pasturage.... No advance on eighteen hundred and ninety-four? No advance? Going—going—one leg, gentlemen! I must call your attention to one leg in grave. No advance? Going—going—(hammer falls.) Advowson, with rectory of Trettire and Michael, yours; and dog cheap—sold for a song, sir, a very song.

A short pause.

Auctioneer—The next lot I shall have the honor to offer to the competition of the company is the advowson, patronage, &c., to the rectory of Llanwarme, also in the sublime and salubrious county of Herefordshire; net annual income, £350; and the present incumbent—I must be allowed to dwell on this touching circumstance—present incumbent the over-ripe and patriarchal age of eighty-four; fourscore years and four. So, gentlemen, confident in your enterprise and speculation, I do, must expect a handsome offer. Shall we say a couple of thousand pounds to begin with? Reflect, fourscore years and four!

First Bidder—Fifteen hundred.

Auctioneer—Thank you, sir, for a beginning. Fifteen hundred and eighty-four—that is, fifteen hundred for advowson of Llanwarme, a favored spot, where the tares of dissent have never shown themselves among the corn of,—thank you, fifteen hundred and fifty. No advance upon fifteen hundred and fifty; and present incumbent white-haired—patriarch—eighty-four?

Various Bidders—Sixteen hundred—and fifty—sixteen-seventy. (Long pause; hammer descends.)

Auctioneer—Advowson and rectory of Llanwarme, yours, sir. A cheap pen'worth in such a county; with such a flock; such sheep pasturage; and incumbent every day of fourscore years and four.

Another pause.

Auctioneer—The next lot, gentlemen——

But here we must break off, assuring the reader that the auctioneer, ere he quitted his rostrum, disposed of, in all, seven handsome lots to the glory and lasting profit of the Established Church of salt; and, let us hope, to the enduring advantage both of sellers and buyers.

MISSION TO JAPAN.

A meeting was held at Park street Church, Boston, on Monday evening se night, to hear a statement from Rev. Dr. Bettelheim respecting his mission to Japan.

In 1845 a meeting was held in London, by persons who were desirous of sending out a missionary to the Jews in China, and by another class of persons who wished especially to ascertain whether the North American Indians were the lost ten tribes. Dr. Bettelheim, being himself of Jewish descent, and a minister in London, was sent to China for those objects. But no door being open there to accomplish anything for the purposes of his mission, his attention was turned towards Japan. How to get there he did not know. He finally became acquainted with an American sea-captain, from Boston, who for a small consideration took him to the Loo Choo Islands. These are a group of thirty-six islands, about 500 miles from China. They form a part of the Japanese Empire. Dr. Bettelheim was set on shore by the captain, and left among those heathen. They inquired why he had come among them. He told him that his God had sent him to preach the gospel to them. For a long time they kept aloof from him, and made no suitable provision for his wants. He at first took up his abode in one of their idol temples. They afterwards procured for him a respectable private dwelling, but placed a guard of eight policemen around his house, who were not permitted to speak to him or have any intercourse with him, thus effectually to prevent all communication between him and the people. By careful and conciliating demeanor, however, he gradually gained the confidence of the guard, and finally of the people. He instructed their physicians in the science of medicine until they understood and admitted the superiority of his skill. From this he gained their attention to the great truths of Christianity, and has been blessed with what, in the circumstances, must seem to be remarkable success of his mission. He has done something to elevate the condition of woman. No Japanese woman is permitted to come into the presence of her husband without kneeling. He taught them that Jesus Christ, after his resurrection, appeared first to a woman; and he showed them by his own example what respect and kindness were due from the husband to the wife.

During the nine years that Dr. Bettelheim has been in Japan, his labors and those of his wife have been most incessant and untiring, and the results in accomplishment have been wonderful. He has made a grammar and dictionary of the Japanese language. He has translated the gospels of Luke and John into the Loo Choo dialect, and the four Gospels, the Acts, and the Epistle to the Romans into Japanese. He has gathered a congregation of between forty and fifty individuals, and baptized four persons in the name of the Trinity.

We had supposed that Japan was the only nation that remained closed against the gospel; but it appears that even this has not been so. God moves in a mysterious way to perform his wonders. He has been opening a door that we know not of, and he has done this by the agency of a son of Abraham.

Dr. Bettelheim has left a successor in charge of his mission, so that the work will not be unattended to during his absence. Dr. B. has three children whom he purposes to leave in this country to be educated. After a short sojourning, he intends to return to preach the gospel in Japan. He wishes in the meanwhile to collect funds for the purposes stated in the circular given in another column. Our Government is the first which has succeeded in forming a commercial treaty with this secluded nation, and now it seems, very providentially, to devolve on us to send them the gospel. God, without our agency, has prepared an instrumentality to our hands by which we can do this; and we need not to be told that Japan, though so long and so hopelessly hitherto enveloped in the shroud of Satan's darkness, is one of the kingdoms of this world which are to be given to the Lord and to his Christ.—Puritan Recorder.

ENTHUSIASM IN THE PULPIT.

Mr. Editor—I read an article, a few days since, in a religious journal, upon the "Decline of Enthusiasm in the Pulpit," which very much attracted my attention, and called up some thoughts which I propose to give to your readers. It is an important subject, and I read the article with great interest. This is the substance of it: The writer says he has traveled North, South, East and West, and observed this decline, particularly in rural districts. The pastors in cities, he says, have a higher order of pulpit service, and retain the charges of churches longer. This the writer attributes to the greater stimulus for the mind through the libraries, lectures and society of cities. The pastor in the country, on the contrary, though he leaves the school or college a fine scholar, and engages in the ministry with a high pulpit standard, gradually loses his habits of study among a people, that are not intellectual or literary, and he soon gives them sermons written on Saturday night, or else extemporaneous efforts, without preparation or study. Hence his people, who are really more intellectual and discriminating than he was aware of, tire of his light food, and he is dismissed or becomes discouraged so that but little good is accomplished.

I neither endorse or deny this general statement of the decline of interest in the pulpit, nor the assigned causes for the same, but allude to the subject for the sake of calling attention to the cure given by this writer for this state of things. It is this:

The pastor should live in his library, surrounded with the great authors of ancient and modern times, and profoundly study those books. This is the cure. And I would ask is this, indeed, all that is necessary to make a good minister and preacher? Is it the most important? It is all and the most important in the estimation of this writer in a religious journal. This is strange doctrine from such a source. I regard this cure as altogether defective, because the majority of preachers have not these good libraries to go to; they are "poor wise men," and can buy books only very sparingly, and their congregations have not had the forethought and liberality to furnish them. And besides, if they had these good libraries, they would be far from being enough.

I have known preachers who had excellent private libraries, and who have delighted themselves and their congregations by showing the results of their learning, but have entirely failed in accomplishing the work of a gospel minister, viz: to win souls for Christ and to fit them for heaven.

The cure, as given by this writer, appears the more defective, if one reads in connection the instruction that Christ gave to the twelve apostles as he sent them forth to preach the gospel. There is not a word said about their libraries, and being fitted with mere human lore. They were commanded to go forth and to proclaim the great truths of the gospel, the necessity of repentance, and faith in Christ, in view of man's accountability to God, and the worth of the soul, and the great danger of its being lost.

These were the themes from which the preacher caught his inspiration, and not only made the pulpit attractive, but made it the power of God unto the salvation of the hearers. Things have not so changed that the minister must now catch his main inspiration from books, rather than from his subject, from a soul on fire with it, in view of his personal responsibility, and the worth of his own and the souls of those whom he may address.

The truth is, books at best are but tools. And one might as well say that a plenty of tools will make a good carpenter, as that a plenty of books, ever so well read, will make a good preacher.

What is of vastly more importance for the preacher to have than a good library, is a good and warm heart, a deep sense of his accountability to God, strong faith in Christ, an ardent love for souls, and a thorough and constant sense that they will be lost without an interest in Christ. If he has these requisitites, coupled with good common sense and a knowledge of men and things, he will be a good preacher with but few tools or books; and without them he may have ever so many books, and know them all, and be good for nothing in the pulpit.

It is bad theology as well as unsound philosophy, to say that mere intellect and learning are the only essential necessary for the preacher. Purely intellectual preaching, where the speaker's heart is manifestly not engaged in the work, is, instead of being a blessing, a curse to any people. Books certainly have their place and the minister, with the other qualifications, may profitably use them. But to place these before a new heart, and the keeping of the heart, before the ruin of the world and the efforts to be put forth to save the lost, is not to preserve the order of Scripture or of sound philosophy.

If there is, then, but one injunction to be given to the preachers of the land, they should be urged to keep their hearts "with all diligence," for then will they cultivate their minds from principle, and most effectually, and have and exhibit that devotional feeling in the pulpit without which sermons are as "sounding brass," or "a love song of one that hath a pleasant voice," or intellectual essays as cold as polar snow and as unproductive of good.

The preacher who attends to the cultivation of his head to the neglect of his heart, may preach sermons that will be admired, but they will not be effective. A sermon that is all discussion, without appeal or application, is a monstrosity; and if it makes Christians at all, they are deformed Christians, with colossal heads but shrivelled hearts. While perhaps there are some preachers, of limited literary advantages, who incline to the extreme of substituting boisterous exhortation for calm reasoning, it must be confessed the tendency of the American pulpit, in these days, is the opposite. We have far more logical reasoners than we have successful persuaders. This is attributable to the cultivation of the head, by the injudicious use of books of a certain character, to the neglect of the heart.

Owing to this, some of the most gifted and learned preachers in our country utterly fail in making earnest and effectual appeals to their hearers. Some who attempt it are so unskillful or lukewarm they accomplish nothing, except to raise a doubt whether they really expect or desire their hearers to follow their advice, or whether they themselves appreciate the truths they have been illustrating.

Some scarcely deign to make any effort in this direction, but seem to think their duty wholly performed with the enlightenment of the intellect, while the heart remains utterly unmoved.

A preacher, to be effective in his ministrations, should introduce his subject in such a way as to lead and prepare the way for the application; and then the application, made under the influence of love, exhibited by the preacher, will, occasionally at least, cause the sinner as he retires from the house of God, instead of passing encomiums upon the preacher, to exclaim, "God be merciful to me!" That kind of preaching that finds its way to the heart is, as a general thing, the only kind that effects good; and that preacher only who is careful to keep his heart well cultivated will so preach.

The writer does not claim much originality of thought or expression in this article, but, Mr. Editor, it may not be the less valuable on that account; and if you think it merits a place in your paper, you will please give it an insertion.

LAYMAN.

Union Town, Ala.

[We do please to give it. We should like to give more of such a layman's reflections. He occupies the hearing point, and that is no mean standpoint to judge the right kind of preaching from.]—ED.

Preaching the Gospel to the Poor. Why?

The Southern Presbyterian puts forth these views on the subject:

"There is cause for the Gospel being preached to the poor, inasmuch as they are the most numerous class.

It would, of course, be a part of so splendid a plan of benevolence, to include the greatest possible number of subjects. And what would be the range, in society, to adopt for securing that object? Without hesitation, we answer, to strike low. For, the crowd jostles below; the few occupy the exalted sphere. The rule is, to be poor, the exception to be rich. There is but one sun, which shines over our heads, while the stars and satellites are numerous.

The Gospel is preached to the poor, to render its trophies the more sure and signal.

The rich, in their "life time" receive their "good things;" they have their portion here. Their eyes stand out with fatness; they have more than heart could wish." Religion, therefore, meets with no welcome from them. On the contrary, it is generally spurned and contemned. While the poor, with pinching wants and crying woes, feel the need of the comforts of the Gospel, and readily embrace its blessed promises.

And what honor is reflected upon Christianity by the fruits it gathers from so inviting a field? What condescension is involved, and what a victory won! To mould a pattern of piety from out of the ranks of the elegant and refined, seems somewhat in the course of nature. But what a miracle of grace it appears, when a shining Christian issues from the refuse of society; how the gem sparkles by the side of the surrounding rubbish!"

MOTHERS.

I think it must somewhere be written that the virtues of mothers shall occasionally be visited on their children, as well as the sins of fathers.—Dickens.

A mother, who had brought up a large family with eminent success, was once asked by a younger one what she would recommend in the case of her children, who were too carefully educated. "I think, my dear, a little wholesome neglect," she replied.

The glorified spirit of an infant is the star to guide the mother to its own blissful home.—Sigourney.

The future destiny of the child is always the work of the mother.—Bonaparte.

ADVERTISEMENT OF AN HONEST RUM-SELLER.

Friends and Neighbors—Having but just opened a commodious shop for the sale of "liquid fire," I embrace this early opportunity of informing you that on Saturday next I shall commence the business of making drunkards, paupers and beggars, for the sober, industrious and respectable portion of the community to support. I shall deal with "familiar spirits" which will excite men to deeds of riot, robbery and blood, and by so doing diminish the comforts, augment the expenses and endanger the welfare of the community. I will undertake at short notice, for a small sum, and with great expedition, to prepare victims for the asylums, the poor-houses, the prisons and the gallows. I will furnish an article which will increase the amount of fatal accidents, multiply the number of distressing cases, and render those which are harmless incurable. I shall deal in drugs which will deprive some of life, many of reason, most of property, and all of peace; which will cause the fathers to be fiends, wives widows, children orphans, and all mendicants. I will cause the rising generation to grow up in ignorance, and prove a burden and nuisance to the nation. I will cause mothers to forget their sucking infants, virgins their precious innocence. I will corrupt the ministers of religion, obstruct the progress of the gospel, defile the purity of the Church, and cause temporal, spiritual and eternal death; and if any should be so impertinent as to ask why, I have the audacity to bring such accumulated misery upon a comparatively happy people, my honest reply is, MONEY! The spirit trade is lucrative, and some professing Christians give it their cheerful countenance. I have a license, and and if I no not bring these evils upon you somebody else will. I live in a land of liberty, I have purchased the right to demolish the character, destroy the health, shorten the lives and ruin the souls of those who choose to honor me with their custom. I pledge myself to do all I have herein promised. Those who wish any of the above specified evils brought upon themselves or their dearest friends are requested to meet at my bar, where I will, for a few cents, furnish them with the certain means of doing so.

Later from California.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP PROMETHEUS.

The steamship Prometheus arrived Monday morning from San Juan, bringing California papers to the 24th ult., one week later than previously received. We are indebted to her gentlemanly purser for the following memoranda:

The steamship Prometheus, Capt Henry Churchill, left New Orleans April 29th, and arrived at San Juan May 5th; on the following day her passengers, with those from New York (760 in all) left the ship for the Pacific via the river and lake in the Company's magnificent light draught river steamers. On the night of the 8th, having received the returning Californians from the Sierra Nevada, the Prometheus left San Juan for New Orleans, and the Northern Light for New York with 350 passengers and $300,000 on freight. The Isthmus continues healthy and the river in fine boating order. Passengers, with the greatest safety and comfort, now make the transit from ocean to ocean in less than 90 hours—no scenery in the world can equal that on the San Juan river and that of Lake Nicaragua. The Prometheus arrived at the Balize in 4 days and 20 hours from San Juan.

The civil war in the interior has received a new impetus in the accession of Gen. Munoz to the revolutionary party. Among his first acts in taking command was to set aside Castillon and other leaders of the party in whose cause he had enlisted, and make himself supreme dictator. The revolutionists have the greatest confidence in his ability, and the "knowing ones" say he will succeed unless his avarice should get the better of his patriotism. He is in possession of a large and increasing force in and about the city of Leon, and is expected soon again to "shut up" the government party in Granada. It will be recollected that when they last besieged the latter city, it was nearly half destroyed. There is little hope of terminating this intestine strife until, worn out by ineffectual struggles, a third party shall appropriate to itself their rich and fertile soil. Two rich copper mines have of late been opened in Costa Rica near Nicaragua, on the Pacific side—500 tons of ore taken from one has yielded 75 per cent. of pure metal.

The contents of the papers received by this arrival, are neither very interesting nor important.

A Mrs Brady had been shot in San Francisco under circumstances which appeared rather mysterious. A respectable woman named Mrs Denny had been accused of the act and placed under arrest. She denied all knowledge of the affair and stated that she was absent from the city at the time it occurred. The shot did not prove mortal.

Mr. Theodore Bahnsen, of the firm of Correa & Bahnsen, one of the oldest commercial houses in San Francisco, while laboring under aberration of mind produced by commercial embarrassments, committed suicide on the 23d, in Yerba Buena cemetery, by blowing his brains out with a Colt's revolver. The Times and Transcript says:

Mr. Bahnsen was an old resident, having commenced his business connection in 1850, and had always maintained a high position for probity and integrity, and by this mournful act has plunged a large circle of friends and acquaintances in grief. He was a native of Denmark, of about 26 years of age.

The Herald has the following paragraphs:

A man named Elias Vreeland, a quiet, inoffensive personage, was shot and instantly killed by a number of Chilenos, at Coultersville, Mariposa county, on Saturday night last, as he was leaving a fandango house. Some twenty shots were fired at him. Mr. V. was formerly from New York.

A patriotic youth named Henry Josephs was recently placed in the Station House by his father, who was under painful apprehension that his son had joined Col. Walker's expedition. The young man, who is under nineteen years of age, managed to escape from the Station House, and secreted himself on board of Walker's vessel; but was recaptured and returned to his incarceration. The father intends that his son shall remain a prisoner until the Vesta is well at sea.

DEPLORABLE IGNORANCE.—The Tuscumbia North Alabamian states that the telegraph wires have been destroyed, both north and south of that point, by persons who imagine that they caused the drought. It was torn down between Russellville and Franklin Spring, and on Bear creek in that county, and in Lauderdale county, the previous week, several miles of the wire were carried off. The Alabamian says that "it is to be hoped that the philanthropists of the age, especially those of our own country, will turn some portion of their sympathies from the benighted heathen of foreign lands to those near home; for if there are more ignorant 'heathens' in any portion of the world than the anti-telegraphers, we never heard of them."

Powell, the Baltimore post-office clerk, who was charged with stealing letters from the office, was acquitted on the 3d inst., the jury rendering a verdict of not guilty, without leaving the box.

Foreign News by the Asia.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

The New York papers of the 8th contain full telegraphic dispatches from Halifax of the Asia's news. They will be found interesting:

HALIFAX, N. S., May 7, 1855.—The R. M. steamship Asia, Capt. Lott, from Liverpool on the afternoon of Saturday, April 28th, arrived at this port, en route for Boston, at about 10 o'clock to-night.

The Asia, on the 20th April, 7 P. M., passed steamer Baltic, off Tuskar, May 5; latitude 53 20, longitude 51 54, exchanged signals with the Robert Lewis.

The Bremen steamship Hermann sailed from Southampton for New York on the 25th April.

The latest intelligence from the Crimea only comes down to the 10th ult. from Lord Raglan, and to the 22d from the Russian commander. The bombardment still continued, but without important results.

The French exhibition has been again postponed, and it is now understood that it will open on the 10th or 15th of May.

The Vienna Conference.

The steamship Atlantic took out the news of the total failure of the Vienna Conference; since then there have been supplementary meetings of the Four Powers without any result being come to. The plenipotentiaries assembled on Tuesday afternoon of the 23d, and signed a protocol of the twelfth, or last conference. The meeting, it was agreed, should not be considered as a thirteenth conference. Another meeting of the representatives of the Four Powers was held on Thursday, the 26th, at the request of Prince Gortschakoff, when some further inadmissable propositions were made by the Russian Plenipotentiaries, and rejected on the part of France, England and Turkey.

Lord John Russell had left Vienna, but previous to leaving he had a private interview with Count Buol. M. Drouyn de L'Huys' departure from Vienna is postponed for a few days, to discuss matters with the Austrian government. One report says he had left.

The general tone of opinion in England is that war must continue for a lengthened period. The policy of the Czar Alexander is spoken of by the London Times as a new and more audacious policy than that pursued by his father, and is so regarded throughout Europe.

The Crimea.

At Sebastopol the bombardment was being continued. It is difficult to form an estimate of the real progress of the siege. A comparison of the various accounts produces the impression that the fire of the Allies is superior to that of the Russians, but the Russians return the fire steadily.

The Independence, of Brussels, has received from Vienna a dispatch alleged to be from the Crimea, stating that the Allies have suspended the bombardment. It is not stated on what day the fire ceased, but the Independence believes that the date of the dispatch is posterior to that of the last official intelligence, namely—April the 22d.

The detailed reports from the Crimea are substantially as follows: From daybreak of the 9th up to the morning of the 14th the bombardment and cannonade had continued day and night, each of the fire hundred guns firing one hundred and twenty rounds daily. When evening comes on the fire is not much reduced. Although the Mamelon Tower is silenced and some of the Round Tower guns dismounted, yet the Redan and Gardeu batteries still keep up a heavy fire.

No sign of an immediate assault. During the night of the 14th, the French dislodged a rifle ambuscade in front of the Malakoff Tower. A terrible battle between a Russian sortie and the French raged during the night, perhaps the most sanguinary since Inkermann. April 17.—A dispatch to the French Government says the fire of the French batteries maintains its superiority. The French have taken the Russian ambuscades in front of the Malakoff Tower, and have added them to the French lines, and have also crowned a ravine which runs along the fortifications of the city, where the Russians formerly kept their reserves; they have also sprung a mine before the Flagstaff battery, at a distance of fifty metres, thereby opening a new parallel, which has been successfully joined to the others. From the 12th to the 14th, the French loss was only 300. The situation of affairs was considered satisfactory to the French.

April 19.—The French Minister of War learns that the besiegers were still advancing and were consolidating their position. On the night of the 18th the Russians made a strong sortie, but were promptly repulsed. Prince Gortschakoff's account of the same date says the besiegers' fire on the 16th, 17th and 18th, was less violent. Our batteries replied successfully. On the night of the 18th, one of our battalions made a sortie to destroy the enemy's most advanced works. Our object was fully attained. Moreover, the loss of the garrison the past few days has been less.

The latest dispatch from Gortschakoff is also dated April 22d. It states that after twelve days' bombardment the fire of the Allies had become weak, and caused little damage.

The telegraph is now complete from London to the Crimea, except a few miles between Bucharest and Ruschuk, but the British Government keeps the exclusive use of it.

Russia.

The Grand Dukes Michael and Nicholas have again set out for the Crimea.

Menschikoff is not dead.

The St. Petersburg Journal publishes an Imperial rescript, expressing the Emperor's satisfaction with Meoschikoff's conduct, with the hope that he would be soon restored to health, and bestowing on him and his descendants a palace at St. Petersburg.

Turkey.

Mehemet Ali, the Sultan's brother-in-law, had been arrested and sent to Sinope, for being troublesome.

The Baltic.

The blockade of Libau is announced from the 17th, and of all the ports to the entrance of Riga, from the 19th of April.

Great Britain.

In Parliament much energetic questioning of the Ministers had taken place on the various subjects respecting the war, the scope of all the questions being to hasten matters. Sir George Grey stated that authority was given to the Governors of the American provinces to enlist men for the regular army, not for the foreign legion, inasmuch as all the colonists were British subjects.

The Roebuck Committee continued its sessions. The Duke of Newcastle had been examined, and the evidence tended to exculpate himself.

Notices had been given of a motion for a decimal coinage, and to invite a Congress to establish a uniform decimal system throughout the world.

Some notice has been excited by the report that an American squadron is to make demonstrations against Cuba. It is doubted whether a war between the United States and Spain would much complicate present European politics.

France.

It is still reported, but is considered doubtful, that Napoleon will command the allied armies. It is officially announced that his departure for the Crimea is postponed for a short time.

The late Minister Dnoce was buried at the expense of the State.

General Forey is commandant of Oran, in Algeria.

Belgium.

The new Minister has declared his intention to adhere to the principles of free trade. Marshal Santa Cruz, the Bolivian Envoy, has taken leave of the King.

Spain.

Some advantages are granted to foreign import trade, and consular forms are simplified.

Italy.

The Sardinian Ministry has resigned. The cause for doing so was not known. General Durando had been appointed to form a new government.

The English ship Cressus, from Genoa for the Crimea, with Sardinian troops on board, had been burned. No lives were lost.

Prussia and Austria.

Berlin correspondence says it hardly admits of doubt, that an approximation has recently taken place between the Austrian and Prussian Courts, which bodes no good to the Western Powers. Baron Usedom, with a whole staff, would go to Gallicia May 2d, but probably only to review the army. He is reported to have stated that the Austrian army could, under no circumstances, be ready to take the field before August.

India and China.

The overland mail has been telegraphed. Shanghae dates March 9, Bombay April 3. Persia openly avows her adhesion to Russia.

Trade in India dull and money scarce.

The Chinese insurgents have evacuated Shanghae.

A Russian frigate has been lost near Japan.

The Living age was wrecked on the Pratas.

The ratification of the American treaty with Japan was concluded at Simoda, February 21st.

U. S. COMMISSIONER'S COURT.—Examination of the Postmaster, concluded.—The court opened at 8 o'clock on Saturday evening, for the purpose of having the arguments of counsel in the matter of the Post-office robberies charged to Mr. Kendall. Mr. Morse opened the case for the prosecution; Messrs. Benjamin and Hunt followed for the defence; and then came a rejoinder from Mr. Morse. It was after 11 o'clock when he got through—the hours having been consumed in the speeches. The court room was crowded to the last with absorbed, and at times amused and delighted spectators, including a large representation of the legal profession, who were determined not to miss the rare forensic combat which the nature of the case and the fame of the respective counsellors had justly led them to anticipate.

Previous to the argument, Mr. Benjamin put on file a statement from Mr. Graham, to the effect that one of the missing letters to his house had come to hand, it having been misdirected to New York instead of New Orleans, by the person who wrote it.

Mr. Morse commenced by ridiculing the current idea, that Government would lend itself to a conspiracy against one of its most responsible servants, for the gratification of the malice of one or more persons. No conspiracy had been developed in this case, other than that of the defence against the mail agent McGlibboney, which had signally failed. He contended, with numerous citations of authorities, that circumstantial evidence—which alone had to be relied on in this case—was often better than direct testimony, and, when in any way convincing, should be left to the discretion of the jurors. He proceeded to argue, that there was no evidence that the Memphis mail (coming to the city, other than the absence of the way-bill and office record; that this mysterious Marshal Hanson sent the stolen notes to parties in Mississippi, in order to get other money back without discount, and to avoid the danger of presenting them, marked as they were, to any one in the city; that the Hanson letters were shown by indubitable evidence to have been written by Kendall; in short, that this mysterious personage, Hanson, was no other than Wm. T. Kendall, the prosecution having seemed to submit the writing to any one entertaining the least enmity toward Kendall. The dates and movements of the different Hanson letters, with attendant circumstances, were dwelt upon, and the stratagem of the defense, in puzzling witnesses with genuine and counterfeit samples of Kendall's writing, denounced. Finally, Mr. Morse contended that a clear case had been made out, and asked the Commissioner to commit the accused for trial.

Mr. Benjamin, after arguing points of law applicable to the case, contended that there was no evidence whatever that the letter to Wills, Rawlins & Co. had ever left the Memphis post-office, though deposited in that office. He proceeded to show how utterly insane it would be for a gentleman of Mr. Kendall's position to engage in such a business as that developed by the Hanson letters, and denounced the Government for taking this prosecution from the hands of its proper officer, Mr. Moise, as well as the Attorney General of Louisiana, for so seriously countenancing the base suspicions which had been heaped upon Mr. Kendall. Mr. B. next endeavored to demonstrate, by inference, that Marshal Hanson was no other than the mail agent McGlibboney, a bully, a thief-catcher, a secret spy of the post-office. The learned counsellor denounced in a withering manner, the secret detective system of the post-office, as well as the men engaged under that system, saying he would rather be a stevedore on the levee than a secret mail agent. He made out such a case against McGlibboney, by comparing the dates of that individual's presence in the city with the dates of the Hanson letters, his hostility to Kendall, his opportunity and ability of robbing the mails, contrasted with Kendall's lack of opportunity and inability, etc., etc., that numerous intelligent auditors in our hearing gave themselves up to the conviction that the Commissioner would most certainly discharge the accused. Mr. Benjamin concluded with an eloquent and pathetic appeal to the Court to consider Mr. Kendall's humiliating and most distressing position. An immediate discharge was due to him; but no discharge or other atonement could ever heal the wounds inflicted upon his soul by this most unjust and calumnious prosecution. The breath of calumny upon the character of a gentleman was like rust upon polished steel—the rust might be rubbed off, and the steel made bright as before, but the corroding influence of that rust would penetrate beneath the surface, and there remain, a blight forever. This speech was altogether masterly, and will certainly redound to the learned counsellor's fame, whatever may be the issue of the case.

Mr Hunt followed with expressions of diffidence in undertaking to glean the field so ably traversed over by his colleague. His speech was less argumentative, but more forceful and discursive, and consequently more pleasing to the auditory than that of his predecessor. If we may so speak, he put gore upon the spurs of Mr. Benjamin's argument—accusing McGlibboney—denouncing the secret spy system—and dealing Mr. Morse some hard raps, for daring to compare handwritings, after having been unable to distinguish an imitation from a piece of his own handwriting. Mr. H. spoke of a book presented to him by his brother, in which the name had been written by that brother, with such semblance to his own writing that he was unable to tell whether he wrote it himself or not. He likened the Attorney General, in his severity of the Hanson letters, to Malvolio, in Shakspeare's "Twelfth Night," where that ludicrous character reads the letter left in his path by the roguish Maria, who, in order to punish him for his conceit, writes a love declaration in imitation of her mistress, Olivia's hand, and with her mistress' signature:

"By my life, this is my lady's hand; these be her very C's, her U's, and her T's; and thus makes she her great P's. It is in contempt of question her hand."

Maria, in concocting this epistle, makes use of the expression, "on a forgotten matter we can hardly make distinction of our hands." Mr. Hunt dwelt upon the force of this, as applicable to letters written months ago, and concluded his expose of the manuscript business, by defending warmly the legitimacy of his course in testing witnesses with mixed samples of Kendall's writing, genuine and fictitious, against which the Attorney General had raised such an outcry. Mr. H. dwelt forcibly upon the fact that the great mass of the post-office robberies had taken place on the route via Chattanooga and Montgomery; that McGlibboney was postmaster at Montgomery, and in order to avert suspicion from that office, was removed at his own request, and appointed secret mail agent, so that he might come to New Orleans and listen the robberies upon Mr. Kendall, and that, upon arriving here, he conceived a violent hatred of Mr. Kendall, because that gentleman spurned his society with the natural repugnance which every gentleman feels for a blackguard, and persecuted him to the death because, by communicating his true character to the Department at Washington, as he felt it his duty to do, he had occasioned his removal from office. Mr. Hunt launched a flood of sarcasm upon all secret mail agents, and upon the Attorney General, for asserting that those agents were as honorable gentlemen as any in the court-room; and concluded by taking up Mr. Benjamin's simile of the rust and the polished steel, but asserting, differently from Mr. B., that after the rust was rubbed off, the steel would be not only as bright externally, but as sound internally, as it had ever been before.

Mr. Morse, in his rejoinder, showed himself not in the least disconcerted by the ponderous assaults of his opponents. He stated that so far from feeling ashamed of his position in this cause, he would with pride defend the meanest negro, if he had right on his side. He vigorously defended McGlibboney and all other secret mail agents, saying it would be a pretty state of affairs, if robberies were to be perpetually going on in the post-office, and the Department to have no power to ferret out the offenders. In again going over the history of the Hanson letters, he alluded particularly to the fact, that Kendall's first knowledge that he was suspected as Hanson, was derived from Col. Seymour, about the 10th or 14th March. In some of these, appears two letters in the post-office, directed to Marshall Hanson, by Mrs. Lucy Hanson, from some fictitious county in Tennessee, one of them being post-marked in Lafayette county, and dated April 1st; the other dated as far back as January, but not post-marked at all—yet both letters appearing together, after just such a length of time, as would probably Kendall be write them and post them up the country to be returned here, for the purpose of proving that there was really such a person as Marshall Hanson in existence—Mr. Blair having ascertained, by a searching inquiry, that there was no such person as Mrs. Hanson in that part of the country from which the letters purported to have come. Mr. Morse concluded by again declaring that the charge against Mr. K. was positively proven, and asking that he be committed for trial.

Mr. Lusher stated that the great importance of the case would render it necessary for him to give his decision at length; and he would therefore adjourn the Court to Tuesday evening, at five o'clock, when he would have his decision written out.

On Tuesday evening Commissioner Lusher read his decision in the case, committing W. T. Kendall for trial before the Circuit Court of the United States for this District, holding him to bail for his appearance in $10,000.

The little village of Watermelon, in Tatnall county, Ga., was entirely consumed by fire on Sunday, the 6th inst., including the post-office and all its contents.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1855.

Interesting to Planters.—We have made arrangements with a gentleman, of judicious observation and science, for supplying an agricultural column. It will take considerable range, including matters of interest to the agriculturist, rather than strictly agricultural. Of this good calling are many of our members and oldest patrons, and if any of our colleges or correspondence should have the effect of enabling them to improve the quantity and quality of their crops, without deteriorating their lands, the end will be worth the means.

Orphans' Fair.—The Protestant ladies of New Orleans held one of the best conducted fairs it has ever been our pleasure to attend, on last Thursday and Friday evenings, in Odd Fellows' Hall. Object, the Orphans' Home. Between two and three thousand dollars were realised.

Celebration.—The Sabbath school celebration of the Marcan street (M. E. Church) Sabbath School will take place in the church next Thursday evening. Liberal arrangements have been made.

New Books.—On our table are several, and some we take a liking to, prima facie. Next week we will notice them fully. They are contributions through those extensive book and stationery houses, J. B. Steel, 60 Camp street, and T. L. White, 103 Canal street.

Home Circle.—Quick after its predecessor, and more than redeeming all its promise, is the second number. Here is just what the friends and families of the Church, South, have been asking for. Send $2 to Stevenson & Owen, Nashville, and order it to your wife, daughter, sister, friend, or yourself.

Gold in Letters.—A number of our subscribers are sending in gold to pay their subscriptions. It comes as safely as paper. All, therefore, who cannot obtain small bills, of the right kind, will please forward us the gold. Enclose it in a small piece of paper, and seal it to the inside of the letter. We will risk its reaching us.

Three Red Men.

Yes, three of them, real Flat-heads, paid us a visit Tuesday morning. Mr. Mase, a talented and energetic gentleman, and member of the Christian (Campbellite) Church, brought them with him from Washington Territory, in the neighborhood of Puget Sound. They arrived by the Prometheus. Mr. Mase contemplates planting a colony near the upper line of that fine territory, and in connection with it a mission. These youths are brought here to be educated, to see what Christian civilization is, to get a concrete impression of it, and take it back to their countrymen. At home, as is generally the case with heathens, they see only the most degraded specimens of Christian civilization—deserting sailors, discharged soldiers, and ex-servants of the Hudson Bay Company.

This hindrance and this remedy is now attracting the attention of our Missionary Society in connection with the China mission. It is economical and wise.

Their names are Hearco, Lieblo, and Quisata. But Yankee practicalness spoils all this poetry of sound, by dubbing them respectively, Tom, Bill and Jack. They are sensible youths, notwithstanding the barbarous compression their head-pieces have undergone.

This flattening is a religious rite. Perhaps phrenologists would find something here to the advantage of their theories; for it elevates the bump of veneration enormously.

Between the ages of four and nine months it is done, mechanically, of course. A topper is produced which passes off. The mothers doubtless encourage it, for it must make quiet babes: two boards strapped back and front of the brain, serving the narcotic purpose of catnip and paregoric.

Instead of flattening their heads on top, as we had supposed, it is the reverse. A breadth is imparted to the intellectual expression and an openness to the countenance.

Mr. Mase represents the tribes as friendly, progressive, and disposed also to cultivate friendship with the white man, his arts of peace and his religion.

The natives are pleased with our big town, and ships, and clothing stores. But they never have heard it thundered that Mr. M. is trying to prepare them for it. Fortunately, they have come in a dry time.

Good Meeting Articles.—A correspondent writes:

"These articles from 'Watchman' are excellent, and ought to be put up in tracts or something of that kind. I wish every one of your subscribers would read them carefully."

A hypocrite knows sin, hates it and forsakes it.

The Strife of Sects.

We hope for the time, the good time, when Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim. But it is not yet.

Politicians have been trying to turn the Methodist Episcopal Church against the "American," or Know-Nothing party. As its membership is greater than any other in the United States, the stake was worth playing for, and the lowest of the demagogues tried their hand at it. But they found, to their chagrin, that Methodists were not in the market.

The scarecrow was, that when "Sam" was done with the Romanists, he would begin to demolish others, and the Methodist Church was chalked for the next victim of religious persecution. If that be so, replied the Methodist Press, we advise every pantalooned member to join the Know-Nothings, to be posted up as to their plans, and frustrate their aims.

At this party movement we were indignant, but had no right to feel surprised. Party ethics are liberal.

The last form the thing has taken does surprise us. The press—a press of a sister Church, the next in number to our own, and nobly engaged in evangelising the land—tries to turn the Know-Nothings against the Methodists! The opportunity of catching a popular breeze was rather tempting, and a feeble sense of propriety and charity yielded before it.

We hesitate not to pronounce it the lowest piece of demagogueism and narrow-minded bigotry that has yet transpired. See the case as stated under the caption, "The Baptists Anti-American."

Mr. Ferguson, in our opinion, has dignified the affair beyond its deserts, and, we fear, in some general remarks, done injustice to the large-minded and highly honorable portion of the Baptist Church, by visiting on them, indiscriminately, the offence of an obscure and local organ. But he has shown, at a single brush, and effectually, how a counter-charge can be filed.

Is there a doubt, in theory, that a Church used to constitutions and written laws develops better citizens than one without any government?

But why this vain jangling? We reply for ourselves and our correspondent, it is forced upon us. Methodists don't know their rights—are slaves—anti-republican! This libel comes without the palliation of ignorance from Judge Chilton's paper. The Supreme Court he now honors with his ability and integrity was honored before him by Collier, Ormond and Goldthwait, than which Alabama has never known an abler or purer bench. Might Judge Chilton's predecessors not be allowed to know what right, and law, and reason were? Might they not be allowed to be patriots and sound republicans, too? Yet they were Methodists.

It is stuff—all stuff, this de captandum cry about this or that church government being the most republican, and trying to proselyte on the level of a red-mouth demagogue. Produce your creeds, your godly practice and influence, your success in saving souls, your apostolic claims and virtues.

Some people seem to take Jefferson's Manual for a Church model, instead of the New Testament; the infidel of Monticello for their expounder of ecclesiastical law, rather than Paul.

Give unto Cæsar the things that be long to him; but don't rob Christ's Church of its purity, its independency, its glory for incense upon an earthly shrine.

FOOTPRINTS.

NO. I.

"OUR PREACHER."

Footprints on the dreary road are very encouraging. "Footprints on the sands of time" speak lessons to the soul, and bid us "take heart again."

"Our preacher" left impressions on the minds of his little flock that have been felt and will be for years. One loves to think of him, one loves to know that there have been beings so pure and holy as he, so simple, yet "wise unto salvation." How fathers and mothers flocked to hear him tell them of Heaven! Oh! that dear old church—the moss-covered roof—the old pulpit and hard seats! The place was hallowed. We little children always lowered our whispering voices within its walls, and our hearts beat with joy when Uncle Foust—for our mothers bade us call the minister uncle—came in, his happy, pleasant countenance lighted with a smile; and a hearty shake of the hand, with "howd'ye do sister," and "howdy daughter." Yes! it was always a great moment when we saw him on his old roan horse, with his well worn saddle-bags, riding to our homes. In the country farm-houses the preacher is ever treated to the best, and ours deserved it. Often did he take the wee-wee ones on his knee, and tell them how he used to fight the Indians, that they might have peaceful homes.

"Our preacher" was a jewel, indeed; he has done a good work; but fame has never sounded it in clarion tones, though we have felt the influence of his holy, simple, truthful, godlike sermons. He has left his footprints behind him, and our children and our children's children will profit by them. Yes, away off, far removed from the world's sinfulness, will those tracks be found, in many a prosperous home, guiding its inmates in the way of righteousness and truth. Does any for a time go astray, a glimpse of these footprints is like the revelation of a pole star to a lost and benighted traveler, restoring his chart and leading him to his home again.

Ah! these impressions, these footprints, are to the world invaluable. They guide us amid all the complexities of life's pathway, and point us to the realms of bliss. Blessings upon the memory of "our preacher" who left them!

THE BAPTISTS, ANTI-AMERICAN.

Mr. Editor—For the sake of our common Protestant Christianity, I would forbear the following expose of the Baptists in this country, if I were not persuaded that the forbearance would be a greater sin than the publication of this article.

The grievance is this: The Southwestern Baptist, a so called religious journal of that sect, published in Tuskeegee, Ala., and edited by elder Sam'l Henderson, puts forth in a late number four columns on the anti-republican and anti-American tendencies of Episcopal Methodism! This appeared as an extract from the Western Watchman, but appearing without note or comment of modification, or apology, the Methodists in and about Tuskeegee felt grieved and insulted, but disposed to seek an disclaimer on the part of the Baptists of Alabama, at least, through this acknowledged organ. The Rev. E. J. Hamill addressed to Mr. Henderson a calm and dignified statement of the outline polity, endorsed by three of the worthy brethren of his charge. But Mr. Henderson has nothing to take back, but reaffirms, "boldly," all that is false and offensive in the article. So that the issue is fairly made—viz: That the Methodist Episcopal Church, in its government, is alien to and inimical to the Republic of the United States; while the Baptist Church is not only the great moral substratum on which rests our civil institutions, but its democracy glows like the fires of pure "firmamentum," and warms the Republic into a white heat—leaves no residuum, nor emits a particle of smoke! Now if the editor had said that the Methodists were heretics in doctrine, disobedient to gospel law, we would have replied. But then that is the battle ground on which we have encountered all your champions and laid them low. But this is a new field and a new fight; for it is not the theology of Methodism which is attacked, but its patriotism. A man may call me a fanatic, a hypocrite in religion, and I, for Christ's sake, may turn the other cheek; but when he attempts to attaint of treason to my country's government, before heaven and earth, for myself and my Church, I proclaim him a legitimate child of him who is the "father of lies!" But, not to waste time nor space, I now propose to end or heighten the interest of this discussion, by proclaiming that both history and facts, existing facts, warn the people of these United States to have an eye on the doings, sayings and tendencies of the sects claiming Baptist affinities. For, having no form of church government of their own, is it not the most natural thing in the world that they "despise governments?" And this is the more to be apprehended, because of their being regular descendants (ecclesiastically) of Munzer, Stuhner, Storick, &c. "These men taught that among Christians, who had the precepts of the gospel to direct and the Spirit to guide them, the office of magistracy was not only unnecessary, but an unlawful encroachment on their spiritual liberty; that the distinctions occasioned by birth, rank, wealth should be abolished; that all Christians, throwing their possessions into one stock, should live together in that state of equality which becomes members of the same family; that, as neither the laws of nature nor the precepts of the New Testament had prohibited polygamy, they should use the same liberty as the patriarchs in this respect." (See Buck.) Now, I guess Elder Henderson will surely admit that if the oft repeated quotation,

"We are no republicans, and never intend to be."
[John Wesley.

is an antecedent showing the tendencies of Methodism, the above is equally conclusive as to what the American people are to apprehend from the pure democracy of the Baptist Sects!

The Elder, in his reply to Brother Hamill, raises two inquiries, and these are the texts from which he eliminates his yard of balderdash—he will permit me to repeat them with a slight change:

1st. Is the anarchical, mobocratic feature of the Baptist Churches a legitimate subject of newspaper discussion?

2d. Is church polity, as an element in the formation of political character, of sufficient importance to merit the attention of politicians and statesmen?

Like the Elder, I will say nothing of the piety and the doctrines of the Baptist people, only to wish one purer and the other truer. But it is with the error into which they have fallen in pretending they have any church government at all that I have to do; or if they have any, it is the great embodiment of anarchy, and therefore dangerous to civil liberty and the maintenance and perpetuation of constitutional democracy. This feature of the Baptist Churches "is of foreign birth, a transplant" from Holland; has yet plenty of offshoots, who glory still in the monstrous errors of their original; such as the Menonites, who, according to Benedict, (a Baptist historian,) had in the United States, in 1824, some 200 churches, and "one article of their faith is, never to bear arms." Fine supporters of republicanism, these! But the best specimen is the Mormons, who claim to be the only true church, the saints par excellence; claim the world and all its riches; glory in polignmy; have had several brushes at arms against "the powers that be," one of these of very recent date, with Uncle Sam's own troops!

Now to the second question. And right here let us agree, if we can, as to what American Republicanism is—or rather, Democracy.

Elder H. appeals to Noah Webster for the definition of words. Why not seek to learn from Dan'l Webster the definition of the thing itself? To these words and their meanings I have no objection, but they do not fully cover the ground; for ours is a democracy or government by the people, under a written constitution, which constitution is as clearly expressed as the autocrat of Russia. The Elder will please let me try my hand at definition. The written constitution, made by delegates chosen by the qualified electors of the States, and ratified by the same, is the supreme law of the land. This supreme law or instrument of power hath its exponents of its prerogatives in the Executive, the Legislative and the Judicial Departments. In the first of these we have presidents and governors, chosen by the people; in the second, legislators; and in the third, judges. The legislators make the laws; the judge decide questions of law; and the executive execute the laws in obedience to the will of the other two; but all these act in subordination to the constitution. Now, attention the whole! Has the Baptist Church, so called, anything like this above ground? Is there any such thing as the Baptist Church? I know there are thousands of independent congregations, but what bond of union, connectional tie, have they? Where is its written constitution, defining rights, powers and prerogatives, and duties of its ministers and members? I know of none, unless it can be found in their speech and practice—to wit: Article 1.—Baptism by immersion. Art. II.—Close communion. By-Laws—1. Be very bigoted. 2. Be very exclusive. But how unlike all this is to the Government of the United States! Where is its executive, its legislature, its judiciary? I doubt not some of my Baptist friends are getting hot as they read along here, for, say they, have not Brother Graves and Brother Sturgis, and others, of late, been preaching that the United States Government was modelled after the government of the Baptist Church? And surely they know. Very well, we shall see. Brother Graves plays at brag, and offers to bet largely, sometimes, in the way of proffered rewards. I here therefore, that I shall not be severely censured if I offer a reward of one thousand dollars for the original document or a well authenticated copy of the same. That is to say, if the convention that framed the constitution worked by a pattern, which pattern was the written constitution of the Baptist Church, it was before that convention, either in a printed book or manuscript. Where is the precious relic? I'm sure if I got it, Barnum will give me ten thousand dollars for it!

Now, gentle reader, that you may assure yourself on these points, ask the first intelligent Baptist preacher you meet, what powers have your associations and conventions over the churches? And he will answer you, none; that they are only advisory councils of the churches in certain bounds. Then, am I not fully vindicated in saying that the Baptist Churches present to the eye of the statesman a wide spread anarchy? "Anarchy—Want of government; a state of society where there is no law or supreme power, or where the laws are not efficient, and individuals do what they please with impunity; political confusion." Was there ever anything more descriptive of the case in hand?

In conclusion, what has Americanism to hope for from a Church with such antecedents as Munzer and his crowd of marauders? with such living offshoots as the Menonites and the Mormons? with such abhorrence of written constitutions that, as a great Church, it has none? After an existence of more than 200 years, they still have none. And now that the din of Fourierism, Communism, &c., is heard in all our borders, is it not right that we shall inquire who is on the side of good, well defined, well understood civil government? Is it not a pity that Elder Henderson did not know that he lived in a glass house, and therefore it was naughty to throw stones? I hope he will patch his own panes awhile, and let his neighbors alone. Let me assure him and all his sympathizers, if they think they can demolish Methodism, I hope they will declare war in due form, not cry peace, brother, and all that, when the malice of the old serpent is in the heart. For the present, I forbear, hoping that, for the sake of the Christian name, we will not be compelled to give them one long, loud, general thrashing. Very respectfully,

F. G. Ferguson.

Wearing Concealed Weapons.

A law passed by the last Louisiana Legislature has been much and favorably noticed by the press. It declares that whosoever shall carry a weapon or weapons concealed on or about his person, such as pistols, bowie-knives, dirks, or any other dangerous weapon, shall be liable to prosecution by indictment, and on conviction, for the first offence, shall be fined not less than one hundred and fifty dollars, nor more than five hundred dollars, or imprisoment for one month; and for the second offence, not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, or imprisoned in the parish prison at the discretion of the court, not to exceed three months.

The Governor of California has urged upon its legislature a similar enactment to prevent crime. It is a life preserving law, in the double sense of preserving the object and subject of these mortal assaults, originating in a hasty spirit of anger.

Parents cannot be too careful of their sons in this particular. When they begin to think themselves men, a dirk or a pistol about the person helps their conceptions mightily. Thus armed against themselves and others, they sally forth to the places of public resort, seeking for offences in order to resent them; courting, rather than avoiding danger, in strong consciousness of being armed against it.

Their weapons, like their money, have a tendency to provoke a needless use. A bullet is a tame affair unless fired at somebody. The presence of deadly instruments chafes their heroism. They become boisterous, insulting, overbearing. In an evil time the dark, irreparable deed is done, and the error of a moment is the sorrow of a life.

"Lead us not into temptation" is a wise and humble recognition of human frailty. A hair trigger is an imminent temptation. Under excitement men have done what, a moment after, they would give the world to undo. How fortunate, then, for life and limb, peace, character and fortune, the absence of facilities for mischief.

Serpents must coil before striking. Their fangs and poisonous secretions are carefully laid away, and require time for excitement. They lie on the defensive against their enemies only. But the hotblood goes half-cocked for murder among his fellow-beings. With hand upon the dirk-spring he jostles the crowd; prepared to maim or slay, by the first intention.

Society ought to protect itself against such evils.

UNHAPPY HOME TRAINING.

"Make Sal Do It."

Such was the expression of a flaxen-haired girl of about ten summers, when requested by her mother to take her little babe brother from the cradle and nurse him. And the mother, seeing her petted one so averse to her commands, called Sal from her other duties to nurse the babe. I could not but reflect that that mother had done her child a serious injury, and had failed to teach her one of the most important lessons which it is necessary for children to learn—obedience—instant obedience.

This is not a solitary case, but is there not in almost every family a like training going on? Master Henry must call Dick from the garden to saddle his horse, though he has nothing to do but wait for Dick to put the riding equipage upon Selim.

Miss Kate must have Molly from the farm one day in each week to do up her fine dresses for Sunday, whether father makes corn or not. And it will not do for the girls to cook, that would ruin their complexions and soil their fair hands; and, as they have no servants, Ma must do the cooking—yes, that mother that has toiled and delved for them from their infancy up, must still be their slave, must toil on till she brings herself to the grave, and all for what? Why, that the girls may fix up and watch for the b'hoys, and dress for company, and go to dinings, dances, fishing parties, &c.

And thus the children of this generation are generally brought up in effeminacy, relying almost wholly on others for their comforts and necessities; and when they are thrown out on the broad world to battle for themselves, what a flood of difficulties do they have to encounter, and how many have sunk under the wave in despair, in poverty, and it may be in disgrace; and all because they had never been taught to rely upon themselves, because they were ignorant of the simple duties of life—because they had been raised in idleness, when they should have been taught habits of industry.

Mr. Dan Dandy marries Miss Fanny Fashionable. Dan is the son of a country farmer, was raised on the farm until he was about eighteen years old. However, he had not learned to work; had spent most of his time in going to school at the cross-roads, or in hunting and fishing; but as he increased in years his rising genius aspired to higher callings, and through the influence of father and friends he is placed in the store of Mr. Tape, at the neighboring village. He has been in the employ of various merchants and shopmen since, and now, at the end of three years, he is an adept in all the quirks and peculiarities of dandyism; smokes cigars, drinks, tods, swears, dances, flirts with the girls and reads obscene and vulgar novels, and has finally closed his career of single blessedness by fixing his destiny with Miss Fashionable for life.

Miss Fanny is the daughter of Phineas Flint, Esq., attorney at law, &c. Mr. Flint is a man of large notions and small means. His daughter Fanny is a beauty, and consequently has been much doated upon by her parents. She has been through a regular course at Mr. Pomposity's boarding-school; she has imbibed a smattering of all the arts and sciences and ologies, made a speech at the last examination which was selected for her from a newspaper by Mr. Pomposity, and received the applause of all the audience and many bouquets, and finally she graduated with the highest honors, and came home to adorn the family circle, and look out for a suitable match. Dan made suit immediately, and such was his sauvity of manners and fastidiousness in dress, that he succeeded in captivating Miss Fanny, and she became Mrs. Dandy.

After marriage Mr. Dandy set up for himself, as he concluded his salary as a clerk was entirely too limited to sustain a gentleman with a family. Not being able to buy, he rented a dwelling and store, and bought goods on the credit of his father. But instead of realising all that happiness so fondly anticipated, it was the beginning of sorrows.

Mrs. Dandy was ignorant of all her household duties; the bread burned to a coal, and Mr. Dandy was disgusted at the coffee. Mrs. Dandy became indignant and discouraged, and burst into tears, and finally told Mr. Dandy if he was so hard to please he might get some one else to cook for him. Mr. Dandy left abruptly, and called at the grocery, and did not leave until he was rolled off to the store, beastly drunk.

Difficulties increased daily. Mr. Dandy made a confirmed drunkard, and Mrs. Dandy died in a few years, they said, broken-hearted.

Old Mr. Dandy was ruined by going Dan's security, and is going down to the grave in sorrow and poverty.

And what has been the cause of all this misery and ruin? Why, old Mr. Dandy did not learn Dan to work, and battle against the trials and difficulties of life.

Fanny's parents trained her only to admire the gewgaws of this vain world, when they should have taught her there was a solid reality in life. And such, no doubt, has been the sad history of many fond and ardent ones who looked to a bright future, but whose sun has set behind a dark cloud, because in their early training they were not taught the maxim of a very eminent man, who did much for his fellow-beings: "Ask not others to do that for you which you can do for yourself."

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

MY CIRCUIT.

Ala. Conf., May 4, 1855.

Mr. Editor—I am inclined to give you some account of my field of labor this year. It is generally known among the preachers as "a good circuit," "a first rate appointment." Now, I imagine you would like to know something about such a work.

First appointment: This is in a village of several hundred inhabitants, distinguished for industry, intelligence and morality. The church edifice, although a neat one, needs some repairing and enlarging, and the pastor has talked to the members about it, but they say that the building up of their schools has taxed them so heavily that the improving the church must be delayed awhile, and then it shall be attended to. Hope the fulfillment of this promise will soon take place. We have some hundred or more members in communion, and some of them are active and zealous members of the body of Christ. They love prayers and class meetings, and are "ready for every good word and work." Others are not so active; attend preaching, possess many good traits, and manifest some love for Christ; but cannot say, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." The pastor and leaders are encouraging these members to become more attentive to the means of religious culture. Some signs of improvement. This appointment has a good Sabbath school, many pupils, but the whole membership of the Church not fully aroused to the importance of this great means of advancing Christ's Kingdom. The school is prospering, and will likely get a stronger hold upon the members.

The next appointment is also in a village, a very small place. The church edifice here needs repairing. The pastor has talked to some of the members, but nothing is done yet. Perhaps he has not talked enough; feels like he will say something more. They have not had leaders, but some prospect of getting them soon. A good Sabbath school at this place; its interests increasing; a large bible class formed recently. Hope to have many seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord during the year.

Next appointment: Very neat house of worship, fifty members, and most of them active and devoted; class and prayer meetings well attended, and considerable attention bestowed upon the well-being of their souls. Pretty good Sabbath school, which promises to do much good.

Next appointment: The house of worship needs some repairing, and the people intend doing it, so they say, and I believe it. About forty members, most of them prompt, and characterized for humility and faithfulness; "some old women good enough to go to heaven;" among the number, the mother of one of the missionaries to California. Sabbath school here also.

The next appointment is a new one; the people are building a house of worship. I preach in the grove, and the people receive the word gladly. Prospect for a large ingathering of souls.

At the next appointment we have a new house, but no members; several members from other appointments attend regularly, and we have a Sabbath school, and hope soon to organize a society.

The above is a succinct acount of "my circuit." I like it, Mr. Editor; never had one I did not; and I hope I shall always like "my circuit."

Obadiah.

White Plains, Ala., May 1, 1855.

We have had a long, cold and dreary winter, until near the middle of April. We have had a drouth through this country of near eleven months. Many wells and springs that never failed before have been dry for months. Many families, even up here among mountain creeks and springs, have been hauling water since last summer. But this is not all. We have been visited with more winter sickness than has ever been witnessed in this country; and it still continues. While I am now writing, there is an unusual procession forming in our village. Besides being visited a month or so back, by the severest storm this country has seen for years, prostrating the timber by hundreds and thousands, destroying stock, property, and even human life, we now have famine itself staring us in the face. True, a majority of the people have on hand what provisions will do them, by being economical, until the new crop comes in, but a large number of families not only will be, but actually are in the greatest extremities for bread; while others are in sufferance.

And as an evidence of the truth of the above, cases of meat and corn stealing are becoming of nearly daily occurrence, and that, too, by men who have families to provide for; or, in other words, by white men. Rumor says there was a family in adjoining county, all of whom died a week or so since, not from hunger directly, but by remaining out of provisions so long that when they had come, brought them, soon after satisfying their appetite, they all died. Whether this be correct or not, I cannot say; but it being the family of a widow lady, under all the circumstances, it is at least possible. I have seen, myself, several men out bread hunting, who said they had not had any for their families for several days, and did not know where nor how to get any. Everything depends here upon the coming crop, the prospect of which looks discouraging; and if this should fail, famine will be the inevitable result.

And what is still more reading to the feelings of a pastor of the Church of God, under these circumstances, is, that while these providences are being seen and felt, the people and churches seem not to learn wisdom; they seem not to "lay it to heart," but are as prayerless and spiritually dead as though all was well. But we are trying to break up the "fallow ground," and prepare it for the showers of heavenly grace, and hope, before it is too late, to receive a "refreshing season from the presence of the Lord," both upon our hearts and our parched fields.

All things are now at work to produce your future welfare. "All things are for your sake."

BOARD OF HEALTH.

The Board of Health are proceeding, with commendable rapidity, in the discharge of their important trusts confided to their care. Considering the circumstances under which they have labored, they merit much praise for their promptitude and energy, instead of the censure a portion of the Mississippi press has, we do not, as thoughtlessly as unjustly, lavished upon them. We will give a brief sketch of what has been done, in general terms.

The Quarantine Station on the Mississippi river is situate about seventy-three miles below the city, on the right bank. The negotiations for the purchase of the grounds have not been positively consummated, but a committee of the Board, fully empowered to arrange the matter, have probably settled this. We have heard the site selected spoken as peculiarly excellent and eligible. The price asked for the grounds is $7,000—not an extravagant price certainly.

The Board have elected Dr. H. D. Bulkley Resident Physician at the Quarantine Station, a most excellent appointment. The law fixes his salary at $5,000. A Treasurer has yet to be chosen. We presume that functionary will charge the duties of Treasurer and Secretary. The Board should be judiciously economical to a degree, without being "penny wise, pound foolish," which usually ends in the most wasteful extravagance.

We have heard of no election of President of the Board, whose duty it is to remain in the city, except when superintending the various quarantine stations of the State, it being made "his duty to visit them as often as the Board of Health shall deem necessary." Capt. Charles Labuzan has been elected Secretary and Treasurer of the Board. Here is another good election. He will keep his office in the city, some place to be hereafter designated.

Dr. Richards has been elected Resident Physician to the Quarantine Station on the Atchafalaya river, two miles below "Pilot Station," at the north of Wax Bayou, with a salary of $2400 per annum.

In addition to the appointment of fashionable officers, and the purchase above referred to, two steamboats have been bought—one to ply the station on the river below the city, with the necessary buildings are erected, and the other to attend the Atchafalaya Station. They will proceed immediately to their respective points of destination. Plans, elevations, specifications and terms for the erection of the new quarantine establishment have been prepared, and contracts will be entered into at an early day. For the present, however, in order to be prepared to meet the possible contingency of the approach of sickness, the Board intend doing, as soon as practicable, a portion of the buildings contemplated in their plans. These will be prepared with the utmost dispatch, and it is confidently expected they will supply the requirements of the pending season. The improvements will consist of the Marine Hospital, physician's residence, offices, fences, etc. The season is too far advanced to admit of anything but shell work. Consequently will have to be postponed until next fall, winter and spring, should there be any serious sickness which we do not apprehend.

The Board will have an office in which to transact business before the 20th inst. The City Council has hitherto neglected to provide them in this respect. It is now under consideration whether they shall have a room assigned them in the basement of the City Hall. We understand the Board do not consider any of the basement fit, or proper; and if better arrangement is effected, will provide themselves elsewhere. Our worshipful "Fathers" should see to this, and while not being at gnats of economy, not swallow camels of extravagance.

The public should not expect too much of the Board of Health this summer. The Quarantine system cannot have a fair trial for another year, owing to patent and obvious causes. When the buildings are erected, and all else prepared, it will be time to pass judgment, not before. We shall watch and note the operations of the Board and the results of the system with undisguised interest. [Daily Crescent.

Education in Louisiana—Louisiana College.

We are glad to learn that this institution is now in a most promising condition, and gives bright token of future usefulness, as the following extracts from the proceedings of the Council of Jefferson City sufficience. After a long sleep, old Jefferson College has been resuscitated, although under a different name. We hope the institution may long and uninterrupted career of prosperity, which it can hardly fail to enjoy under the management of the present excellent Board of Trustees, among whom we notice the names of Gov. Roman, Declouet, F. Duques, Esq., Mr. Labarre, J. D. Hewes, Esq., and Mr. C. Fortier. That accomplished scholar, Dupau, is President, and he is ably assisted in all of the departments.

The subjoined are the proceedings of the Council of Jefferson City above referred to. The preamble and ordinance will, and ought to, excite general attention, and imitation. The plan proposed strikes us as simple and calculated to lead to good results:

Mr. Dugue offered the following preamble and ordinance, which were seconded by Mr. Beauvais, and adopted, viz:

Whereas, at the suggestion of many patriotic citizens the beautiful grounds and magnificent buildings of the parish of St. James, formerly known as the Jefferson College, but, for many years deserted and abandoned, have been recently purchased by means of subscription or otherwise, and again appropriated to their original destination, under the name of the Louisiana College, with every prospect of success; said institution having been inaugurated at the last session of the Legislature, numbering already upwards of one hundred and fifty students, under the management of Trustees and institution of able and distinguished professors.

And whereas, it is highly desirable that such an institution, which, by the thorough character and soundness of its course of studies, would dispense us from sending our youth abroad in quest of a good classical education, should be established and maintained within the State upon a liberal and permanent foundation.

And whereas, All well directed efforts, made with a view of obtaining a result so devoutly to be wished, deserve the countenance and support of every friend of education, not only in his individual capacity, but also as a member of the corporation to which he belongs, and of the community in which he lives:

Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the Mayor, Aldermen and Inhabitants of the city of Jefferson, as a token of their hearty concurrence in the object in view, that the Comptroller and Treasurer of this corporation be, and they are hereby directed, to set apart yearly, out of the moneys in the city treasury, not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient, not exceeding $310, to be applied to the maintenance and education, in the Louisiana College aforesaid, of one student, to be selected or otherwise provided from among the children of the citizens of the city not under thirteen years nor above seventeen years of age. The selection to be made from among the pupils of our public schools, by the qualified voters of the city, through the ballot box, at the next general election for Mayor, Aldermen and officers of this corporation, provided that the time allowed to the pupil so selected to obtain his diploma at the Louisiana College, shall not exceed five years from the date of his admission thereto.

Resolved, further, that the Mayor be, and he is hereby requested, to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the several municipal and parochial corporations of the State, respectfully asking their kind consideration of the same and co-operation, by adopting respectively resolutions to the same effect, if conformable to their views.

Who is Miss Nightingale?—This question is thus answered by an English paper:

Miss Florence Nightingale is the youngest daughter and presumptive co-heiress of William Shore Nightingale, of Embley Park, Hampshire, and the Lea Hurst, Derbyshire, England. She is, moreover, a young lady of singular attainments, both natural and acquired. In a knowledge of the ancient languages, and of the higher branches of mathematics, in general art, science and literature, her attainments are extraordinary. Those in scarcely any modern language which she does not understand, and fluently speaks French, German and Italian as fluently as her native English. She has visited and studied the institutions of Europe, and has ascended the Nile to the first cataract. Young, (about the age of the Queen,) beautiful, feminine, rich and popular, she holds a powerful and persuasive influence over all with whom she comes in contact. Her friends and acquaintances are of all classes and persuasions, but her happiest place is at home, in the exercise of a large band of accomplished sisters, and in simple obedience to her admiring parents.

Deaths.

Mrs. MARTHA ANN WEST died of measles, in St. Helena parish, La., on the 12th of March, 1855, in the 24th year of her age.

Mrs West joined the M. E. Church when about eighteen years of age. She was always one of those doubting Christians whose light never shines brightly, but from the time she first united with the people of God her heart was evidently set upon leading a holy life. It was not until she came to her dying bed that her doubts were dispelled, and her mind became clear as to her acceptance with God. In the midst of her struggles with the king of terrors she claimed the victory. While passing the cold Jordan of death she gave her anxious mother to understand that her hopes were bright and her prospects clear for Heaven. Let her seven brothers and four surviving sisters, with her father and mother, meet her in glory. Though she was first to break the family circle here, yet she is the first to commence it in Heaven.

N.

DIED—Near Minden, La., in the 56th year of his age, RHODAM ATKINS GREENE, native of Milledgeville, Ga. He was for thirty years a member of the M. E. Church, useful and exemplary in his sphere.

During the past year, under the pressure of accumulated cares and anxieties, his constitution, naturally frail, began to give way; yet, Job-like, his confidence in God was unshaken to the last. His mental and bodily powers gradually waned until, on the 26th of February last the lamp of life went out in the gloom of death. But the consolation of his family and friends in this sad bereavement is, that this lamp will be relumed in the glory of immortal light and life. A. GREENE.

Col. WILLIAM FLY was born in Northampton county, N. C., on the 11th of September, 1794. In 1796 his father, John Fly, emigrated to Middle Tennessee, and settled in Williamson county. A few years afterward he removed to Maury county, where the family remained for many years. In 1810 he was united in marriage with Mary Mitchell, daughter of Andrew Mitchell. About the year 1822 he was converted, and joined the M. E. Church, of which he lived and died a member. In 1833 he removed to the State of Mississippi, and settled in Yalobusha county. In 1836 he removed to Madison county. In 1853 he emigrated to Texas and settled in Panola county.

In the month of January, 1855, he was attacked with flux. From the beginning of his illness he believed he would not recover. He expressed entire resignation to the will of God; said repeatedly he was not afraid to die; that his trust was in the merits of Christ. He expressed an earnest desire to see all his children once more; but that could not be, as but two of them were near him at the time. His mind was undoubted to the last. He viewed death calmly, and spoke of it frequently. On one occasion, raising his hands, he exclaimed with solemn delight, "The great ocean of eternity!" His youngest son asked him if he feared to embark on it. He replied, "No, I fear it not; Christ is the captain that commands the vessel; he will moor it safely in the harbor." In the evening of the 28th of February he seemed to be better, and conversed freely. About midnight he fell into a pendeful slumber, and slept quietly until about 3 o'clock in the morning, Meroh 1st, when, without a struggle, he ceased to breathe.

My father was a man of remarkable energy of character. In contending with the stern realities of life he manifested a degree of self-reliant confidence and fixedness of purpose that is rarely equaled. But few have possessed the power of command in a great degree. To those under his authority his word was law. To his children and servants his approbation was the highest reward of merit. His memory is embalmed in the hearts of the wife of his youth and nine children, for whom he toiled with ceaseless care for more than forty years. He had many conflicts in life, but, thanks to God, his end was peace. The victory was complete, by faith in Jesus Christ.

A. T. M. FLY.

Natchez, Miss., May 10, 1855.

DIED—In Talladega county, Ala., April 13, 1855, Miss VIRGINIA A. M., daughter of Charles and Cheriby T. Carter, about sixteen years of age.

She was the object of esteem and affection to all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance. But it was in the home circle that her gentle manners showed to such an extent as to make her the centre of attraction, in consequence of which her death was a sad bereavement to the family. Although young and beautiful, she was not like too many, vain and gay, putting far off the evil day. Her thoughts were early directed to the one thing needful, and at the Alexandria camp meeting, in 1852, she joined the M. E. Church and took her position on the Lord's side. Her profession was not marred by willful departures from the right way; neverthe loss she often felt that coldness that steals upon the spirit and robs it of its joy. During the early part of her illness she complained of doubts and fears, but in answer to prayer God revealed his face, and she was enabled to shout his high praises. Often while friends were singing would she respond to such sentiments as expressed her feelings and prospects, and exhort those around to meet her in heaven.

"When blooming youth is snatched away
By death's resistless hand,
Our hearts the mournful tribute pay
Which pity must demand."

MAINE LAW IN MISSISSIPPI.—The Brandon Republican says:

"Rev. Henry T. Lewis has been entertaining our citizens during the last week with a series of lectures on his favorite subject in temperance reform and the provisions of the Maine law. As a public lecturer, Mr. Lewis certainly possesses high qualifications to entertain and instruct popular assemblies."

SAD CASUALTY.—The bereaved parent in the item below, we presume, is the late Presiding Elder of the Yazoo District, and a distinguished member of the Mississippi Conference. He has our sincere condolence:

"Two little boys, Eddie and James Walton, sons of Rev. James Walton, were drowned whilst bathing at Bowles' Ferry a few days ago."

QUARANTINE PROGRESS.

The Board of Health have so far progressed in their labors that they now only await the issuance of the Governor's proclamation, specifying the infected ports, to carry the quarantine law into immediate effect. Two steamboats, of sufficient capacity to meet all possible immediate contingencies, have been purchased, repaired, fitted up in perfect order, and are ready to start at a moment's notice for their respective destinations along the banks of the Mississippi and Atchefalaya. It is expected that the proclamation referred to will be promulgated by Thursday.

These steamboats are, as will be obvious to our readers, only intended as temporary expedients to guard against the introduction of pestilential disease until necessary buildings can be erected. As there has been no time in which to erect suitable hospital buildings since the passage of the law, the only alternative left the Board of Health was to provide such floating hospitals as the nature of the circumstances would admit of. Their prompt action in the premises is worthy all praise. The boat intended for the Mississippi station, seventy-three miles below the city, will accommodate, by a little crowding, some four hundred patients. We do not, however, anticipate that her capacity will be thus severely tested, as at least one or more of the buildings on shore will be ready for the reception of the sick in a very brief period—at all events before the sickness can assume a general or alarming shape.

The boat intended for the Atchafalaya station is capable of accommodating, comfortably, one hundred patients, a larger number than ever will, in all probability, accumulate at that point at any one time. So, it will be seen that the Board of Health have endeavored to provide safeguards against the introduction of epidemic diseases at two of the most dangerous approaches to New Orleans, which, if they suffice to protect the city will also protect the great valley of the Southwest within the range of the Yellow Fever.

A SECOND EARTHQUAKE AT BROUSSA.—Among the details of the Asia's foreign news we find the following account of another earthquake at Urousse, which was so nearly destroyed a few months ago, by a similar catastrophe:

BROUSSA, April 11.—Yesterday evening, shortly before 5 o'clock, two or three violent shocks of an earthquake were felt here, and caused universal terror among the inhabitants. Every one called to mind the fearful scenes which had occured hardly a month since, and was struck with the apprehension of the coming calamity, unhappily often too fully realized. In five minutes from that time every public monument and building in Urousse was a heap of ruins.

Complete details of the catastrophe are still wanting; but it may be said, in brief, that the city is destroyed—fire having devoured what relics the earthquake had left. Among other notable monuments that have perished in the magnificent mosque of Ouloa Djami, the pride of the city. Two minarets of the edifice were overthrown in the former earthquake, and the cupola cracked. It is now wrecked from top to bottom, leaving nothing but a pile of crumbled stones, amidst which the celebrated turbes of the first Sultans are buried.

All the other mosques have experienced a like fate. No stone-built house in Urousse has resisted the terrible shocks. Enormous masses of earth and rock were detached from the flanks of the mountain, above the upper streets of the place, and rolled down upon the Jews' quarter, whose destruction they completed.

As to the wooden houses, which escaped with less damage from the earthquake, they have been destroyed almost totally by a conflagration. The flames broke forth at many points simultaneously, about 9 o'clock, and are still raging. The scene is awful. The Bezaar, and the whole quarter of the city around it, presents nothing but heaps of smouldering ashes. The European quarter has suffered least. The houses of the Franks are built in the plain, and have in many instances, withstood the shock. But what misery is around us on every side! If the Government does not afford assistance promptly and energetically, hundreds of families who are left destitute of food, shelter or clothing, must perish miserably.

NOON.—The earthquake still rages; the night has been fearful. Shocks of earthquake have not ceased to be felt, and are still recurring. More than 160 have been counted, of greater or less violence. The population seem paralyzed with terror, and are plunged into a state of indescribable stupor. The number of victims it is impossible to reckon. Who, indeed, can give an account of them?

News has arrived that the village of Tikindji, situated about a league from Broussa, has been totally destroyed. Several hamlets and farm houses in the vicinity are also reported to have been wrecked by the convulsion.

The Kann Relief Expedition.

The third expedition from New York to the Arctic regions is now nearly in readiness to sail on its benevolent mission. The two vessels purchased for the purpose have not yet been named, but have been strengthened and otherwise prepared for the Northern service. The largest is known as the bark Eringo, registering 321 tons, and was purchased for $17,000. Her consort is a propeller of 250 tons, which cost $30,000, and will arrive here from Philadelphia in a day or two. The former is now receiving her provisions and stores, and will be completed this week. Both are expected to sail by the 1st proximo, steering direct for the coast of Greenland, and continuing Northward to Smith's Sound.

The original expedition from this city, under Dr. Kane, fitted out under the auspices of our generous townsman, Henry Grinnell, Esq., consisted of the Advance and Rescue, sailed on its Northern voyage in the year 1850, and returned the year following. Not despairing of ultimate success, the Advance was again dispatched, under the command of Dr. Kane, in 1853, and it is for her relief that the present expedition is fitting out. The Advance is the property of Mr. Grinnell, and her crew and officers, numbering sixteen men, are still under his pay. In the expedition now noticed, the entire expense is borne by the Government.

The protracted absence of Dr. Kane affords no conclusive evidence of danger or misfortune; but being left entirely alone in his icy solitude by the return, within the last few months, of the numerous expeditions sent in search of Sir John Franklin, any needful assistance, to be of avail, must be dispatched at once. Congress, therefore, appropriated $150,000 (which will probably exceed the amount required) and authorized the Secretary of the Navy "to dispatch a suitable naval or other steamer, and if necessary, a tender, to the Arctic seas, for the purpose of rescuing or affording relief to the intrepid American navigator." The Congressional resolutions conferring this authority, provide "that such steamer and tender shall be officered and manned by volunteers from the Navy, and others who may declare their willingness to be so engaged."

We yesterday visited the Naval station at Brooklyn, and were pleased to learn that the Secretary of the Navy and officers of the yard are disposed to fit out the expedition in the best possible manner, and take a deep interest in its progress and success. The orders are that it shall be amply provided with two years' rations and which, with the extras, will suffice for a cruise of fully three years. The provisions in preparation consist chiefly of "pemmican," or concentrated meat, besides soups, Borden's patent meat biscuit, lime juice (anti-scorbutic) pickles, etc. The supplies will include some thing like 20,000 pounds of dried meats and soups, and 15,000 pounds of preserved vegetables. The provisions for officers and sailors will be of the same quality. The "pemmican" is the same article with which the Kane Expedition was provided, and a sample reserved for examination, after being kept for two years in the warm climate was recently examined, and found, to be as sweet and nutricious as when put up.

The quantity of beef required for this expedition was 4000 pounds (rump pieces) which, upon being divested of fatty portions, were cut into thin steaks, taken to a malt-kiln and thoroughly dried. By this process its weight was reduced to 1300 pounds. It was then chopped fine by the apparatus employed by sausage-makers, kneaded up with 1000 pounds good lard, with a small addition of sugar and currants. Then being hermetically sealed in tin cases, it is in shipping order.

The vessel will also take out a large supply of clothing adapted to a Northern climate. Among other things, 500 pairs of stockings have been provided. In traveling on foot, it is customary to wear three pairs at a time, and cover the whole with canvas boots. The two vessels will carry out 300 tons of Pittston, Pa., anthracite coal, for the use of the propellers and for ordinary consumption. Should more be needed, abundant supplies can be obtained at Disco, on the coast of Greenland, where Inglefield, the English navigator, found it to exist in abundance, it being only necessary to dig it from the shore.

We were shown in the shops at the Navy Yard, 70 ice anchors, of different sizes, to be used in anchoring the vessels, or warping up through the lanes of ice. They are little else than angular hook, to be sunk in holes drilled in the ice. Some weigh as much as 70 or 80 pounds, but the majority are of about 15 pounds weight. In addition, there are ten sledges, four of which are about eleven feet in length, to be drawn by dogs or with ropes. They are sharp at each end, after the pattern adopted by the British Admiralty, and are shod with iron. In excursions over the ice, they will be manned by an officer and six men.

The bark, as fitted for sea, is worthy of examination. Without, the hull is covered with 2½ inch planking, and armed with iron from the bows to the main chains. Forward she is completely sheathed, from the bulwarks to the keel. Within, timbers, knees and kelsons, have been introduced, to effectually protect her from collision with icebergs, or from lateral pressure. The bows, especially, are filled with timbers, and divided off into a water-tight compartment. The rudder is so arranged that it can be instantly unshipped, and triced up under the stern. The vessel is also furnished with four pumps; so that every possible precaution seems to have been taken to insure her safety. The officers' quarters are completely lined with cork, to absorb moisture, and the seamen are well provided for, in a house on deck; or, should they prefer, they have snug quarters below. The bark is a fine new vessel, having made only two trips to Rio, and is a fast sailer.

The number of men going out on this expedition will be forty-seven, including four officers to each vessel. Contrary to anticipations, not the least difficulty is experienced in procuring men, and of the best quality. Many good seamen are out of employ from the return of recent Government vessels, and the inactive state of the shipping business, and the expedition will be supplied with a personnel of rare excellence. Only two have been accepted from those who went out on former expeditions, though several have offered. As fast as accepted, they are put on board the receiving ship North Carolina. Only one officer and the physicians remain to be selected, though none have as yet been formally appointed. The list now stands as follows:

Lieut. H. J. Hartstene, formerly commander of the steamship Illinois, to command the expedition.

Lieut. Chas. C. Simms, to command the tender.

Passed Midshipmen—Watson Smith, William S. Lovell, Joseph P. Iffe, and first Assistant Engineer, Harman Newell.

One of the surgeons is a younger son of Judge Kane, of Philadelphia, Dr John K. Kane, who joins in the search for his brother. Mr. Lovell was one of the officers in the expedition under Lieut. De Haven. [N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

SPONGING IT.—The last dodge, says the Cincinnati Enquirer, we have heard in evading the State Liquor Law, occurred yesterday at one of our fashionable drinking saloons. An individual walked up to the counter and demanded a dime bottle of brandy. Now, the rule is to charge fifteen cents, unless an empty bottle is furnished in return for the bottle received; and, as the consumer had only a dime on the counter, the extra five cents was demanded.

"I don't want the bottle," said he, "draw the cork."

"The liquor can't be drank on the premises," replied the barkeeper.

"I ain't going to drink it on the premises, rejoined the other, and the barkeeper, supposing that he had some vessel to pour it into, drew the cork, when the gunfleman quietly pulled out a sponge from his pocket, and pouring the liquor into it; then, taking his coat, commenced leisurely sucking it.

"You see," said he, nodding complicently to the astonished barkeeper, "I ain't going contrary to this rule, for the law says the stuff shan't be drunk on the premises."

The bystanders came to the conclusion that the stranger would make an appropriate Governor of Illinois, being decidedly the greatest sucker of them all.

The Vicksburg Whig, of Saturday last, says:

In this immediate region it has been so long since we have had any rain—except a few drops a few nights since, that serious apprehensions are felt in relation to the crops. The dust in this city and neighborhood is becoming insupportable; vegetation of all kinds—especially in gardens—is failing, and cisterns are all becoming as dry as powder horns. We hear of slight rains in some neighborhoods, and in the upper end of this county, we are informed, there was a tolerable good rain a few nights since.

The Spirits—Astounding Facts.

MR. EDITOR: The following occurrences recently transpired under the observation of the writer, and in this immediate vicinity. The narration which I am about to make will, I am aware, be utterly incredible to many people, and yet it is entirely and actually true. Of the perfect accuracy of the incidents here related, testimony the most ample and conclusive can be produced.

A circle of eight or nine friends was formed for the purpose of witnessing the spiritual manifestations with Mr. D. D. Home as the medium. The table, a pretty heavy one, was repeatedly lifted to quite a distance from the floor, and hung suspended in the air about as high as our heads, swaying to and fro. This was in a well lighted room—the gas-burner being near the party, and could by no possibility have been done by any trick or physical agency on the part of the circle.

Later in the evening, when the party were preparing to retire, and after some of the party had gone from the room, the Spirits requested us to wait; and those that remained were permitted to see the most remarkable part of that evening's proceedings. The gas-light had been turned down, but sufficient light remained in the room to render ourselves, and most objects, quite visible, and the hands of the party, which rested on the table, could be distinctly seen.

The Spirits asked: "How many hands are there on the table?"

There were six of us in the party, and the answer, after counting, was "Twelve."

Reply: "There are thirteen."

And there, sure enough, on that side of the table which was vacant, and opposite to the medium and to the party, appeared a thirteenth hand! It faded as we gazed, but presently up it came again, a hand and an arm, gleaming and apparently self-luminous; and it slowly moved forward toward the centre of the table! To make sure that we were not deceived, and were laboring under no hallucination, we then counted our own hands, which were all resting in sight upon the table. There was, however, an arm and a hand, the arm extending back to the elbow and there fading imperceptibly. We all saw it, and spoke of it, to assure each other of the reality of the thing. It had the color and appearance of silver, but with this difference: it seemed to be, to a certain extent, self-luminous, it emitted a faint but perceptible light. Presently it vanished, but we were soon permitted to see not only the same thing again, but the process of its formation. It began at the elbow, and formed rapidly and steadily until the arm and hand again rested on the table before us.

It was so plainly seen that it readily observed it to be a left hand. I inquired: "Can you write with that hand, in plain sight?"

Answer: (by raps) "Perhaps."

A sheet of paper and a pencil were placed by the centre of the table, the hand receding meanwhile from view. In a moment it came up again, (always appearing from the vacant side of the table) and slowly moved forward to the paper, which it grasped and drew back to the edge, and there shocked and rattled it for some minutes, but failed to write any thing legible. It then disappeared, and the next moment the bell was taken from beneath the table, carried from the circle some six feet toward the centre of the room, and there rung by invisible means, and so distinctly that persons in another room, beyond an intervening hall or passage-way, plainly heard it. Presently it was brought back and dropped upon the table; and this while each of us sat quietly, without moving the hand again appeared, was seen to take the bell from the table, and place it in the hands first of one and then another of the party.

At length it was placed in mine; but, slipping my hand over the bell, I grasped the hand that held it, desiring some more tangible knowledge of it than that afforded by sight. It was a real hand—it had knuckles, fingers and finger-nails; and, what was yet more curious (if possible) it was soft and warm; feeling much like the hand of an infant in every respect but that of size. But the most singular part of this queer, and to me strange, occurrence is yet to be told; the hand melted in my grasp! dissolved, dissipated, became annihilated, so far as the sense of feeling extended. It subsequently reappeared on the table and again vanished, after a statement (by the raps) to the effect that this hand had been produced by a near relative of some of those in the circle, who had been in the interior life a number of years.

This question was then spelled out: "Would you like to see the hand of a colored person?"

In a moment more there appeared a rather dull-looking, gray hand, somewhat shadowy, and not quite so clearly defined as the first, but it was unmistakably there, and its gray hue could be clearly seen.

But this account grows lengthy, and must close. Occurrences yet more astounding than any here related remain untold. Perhaps in another chapter I may give some of them, and also a glance at one theory concerning the philosophy of the production of these startling realities. FACT.

The above we find copied into the Spiritual Telegraph, a paper which gathers all the paragraphs, communications, etc., of novelty among those who are familiar with spiritualism. The editor of the Telegraph endorses the article in the following manner:

"We are intimately acquainted with the author of the above letter, which we extract from the Hartford Times, and can assure our readers that he is a most acute observer and reliable witness."

THE SPEED OF RAILWAY CARS.—Many of the accidents which happen to persons attempting to cross railroads are the result of ignorance of the velocity of the iron horse when fairly under way. A writer in the Hartford Courant gives some interesting facts which it may be well to bear in mind:

It seems almost incredible that as we glide smoothly along the elegantly furnished car moves nearly twice its own length in a second of time—about seventy-four feet. At this velocity we find that the locomotive driving-wheels, six feet in diameter, make four revolutions per second. It is no idle piston-rod that traverses the cylinder thus eight times per second.

If a man with a horse and carriage upon an unimportant public road in a country-town approach and cross the track at a speed of six miles per hour, which would be crossing rapidly, an express train approaching at the moment would move toward him two hundred and fifty-seven feet, while he was in the act of crossing a distance barely sufficient to clear the horse and vehicle. If the horse was moving at a rate no faster than a walk, as the track is usually crossed, the train would move toward him, while in the act of crossing, more than five hundred feet. This fact accounts for the many accidents at such points. The person driving thinks he may cross because the train is a few rods distant.

How compares the highest speed of the train with the velocity of sound? When the whistle is opened at the eighty rod "whistle-post" the train will advance nearly one hundred feet before the sound of the whistle traverses the distance to and is heard at the crossing. The velocity exceeds the flight on many of our birds. Dr. J. L. Comstock, the well-known author of several physiological works, informed the writer that he was recently passing through Western New York when the train actually "ran down" and killed a common hawk. The train was stopped, and the game so rarely captured was secured.

GUNNERY AT SEBASTOPOL.—A recent letter from the Crimea says:

The Russians sometimes use very heavy charges of powder, and propel their shot with extraordinary force. As an instance of this I may mention that day before yesterday a 68-pound shot from the Redan passed right through the parapet of our battery where it was from 18 in 20 feet thick, and struck down, but did not kill, a gunner inside of the work. They have some excellent artillery men, and their practice with 32-pounders is very good; but their shell firing is indifferent; principally owing to their bad fuses. It might be supposed that, with all our advanced mechanical skill, we should have the best fuses in the world; but the fact is that great complaints have been made respecting some of the articles of that kind supplied to our gunners. We have, I am told, fuses made in 1705 and 1804; but, old as these are, they are better than the fuses of 1853 and 1854.

THE ARKANSAS COLD MANIA.—A letter from a gentleman in Springfield, Mo., dated the 30th ult., says: Yesterday, fifteen or twenty of our citizens started for Neosho, where they are to join a company of near one thousand persons, all bound for the Wichita mountains, about four hundred miles from this place, and up the Arkansas river. Seven persons, residents of the county of Newton, have recently returned, some of whom are said to have realized three thousand dollars in fifty days' digging and washing. Quite an excitement prevails here, and an other company is to go out as soon as the guides and pilots assemble. [St. Louis Republican, 8th.

Female Genius and Power.

Margaret Fuller Ossoli is, reminds an exchange, universally acknowledged to have been one of the most remarkable women that have ever lived. She possessed a natural grasp of mind truly amazing, to which was added the highest culture. During her residence in Europe, she was regarded as a prodigy of mental power. About the year 1841 she published a work which would alone have made her famous. It was entitled "Woman in the Nineteenth Century." The edition was soon exhausted, and extravagant eulogiums were pronounced upon it by the critics of two hemispheres. The editor of the Christian Examiner used the following language in regard to it:

Of the general spirit of the essay we can, and we must, speak with sincere and hearty approbation. There is a noble and stirring eloquence in many of the passages, that no susceptible person can fail to be affected by. Great, lustrous thoughts break out from the pages, finely uttered. The pervading sentiment is humane, gentle, sympathetic. Miss Fuller says, in one place: "I wish women to live, first, for God's sake; and she seems to be possessed by the reverential, devout feeling indicated by this remark. She casts a deserved contempt on the miserable trifling so often exhibited by men in their conversation and deportment with women, a custom that depreciates and openly insults their character. For our own part, we have often wondered at their patient toleration of the indignity implied so palpably in this sort of hearing. Mere topics of flippant discourse are perpetually introduced in society for their entertainment, as if they were capable of comprehending nothing else. She urges in respectful terms their rights, both in property, and, as mothers, to their children, suggesting some worthy thoughts for law makers. She would have woman respectably employed. She would elevate the purposes of their lives, and, by dignifying their position and character, restore the ancient chivalrous respect paid them by every manly heart. Her notions do not seem ultra nor extravagant. She does not ask that woman may be thrust into man's sphere, but that she may have a right and honorable sphere of her own, whether as a sister, daughter, mother, or "old maid." And, for ourselves, we admire the noble appeals, near the close of the work, in which she rebukes vice, and entreats for it a wise but prompt consideration. She has discussed a delicate topic delicately and learnedly; without prudish folly, without timidity, in a true woman should. No tongue shall dare to cavil at her. She is too evidently above all small criticism in this quarter, to put out of its conclave. What she has said needed to be said, and, if the age has any discernity, needs, we firmly believe, to be repeated, felt, and noted upon. The "Nineteenth Century" has a mission to woman, as well as she to the "Nineteenth Century."

This work has been out of print for several years, and only occasionally could a single copy be found. We learn that a new edition, very much enlarged from her unpublished manuscripts, edited by her brother, Rev. A. B. Fuller, and Hon Horace Greeley, is now in the press of Messrs. Jewett & Co., New York. It will be read with uncommon interest by thousands on both sides of the Atlantic.

LOUISIANA.—The Alexandria Democrat, of the 9th, says in regard to the drouth:

The drouth continues, and no change appears probable. The sky presents the same unvarying aspect—cloudless and brass-like. There are dark days ahead of our planters, and gloomy forebodings fill the breasts of all. Nothing short of a general long continued rain will save the crops, especially that of corn; and in view of the fact that every large sum out will be required to make up the deficiency of last year, the present prospect of a second and more general famine is most serious indeed.

The Concordia Intelligencer states that a few drops of rain had fallen somewhere in that section of country recently, and that a day or two of chilly weather had been experienced.

The Bayou Sara Chronicle, of Saturday, says:

"At the present writing there is not the least indication of rain. Dust in abundance. In some parts of the country the wells and springs have almost been exhausted, and planters have to drive their stock six or seven miles in order that they may procure water. Cotton that is up has not suffered for want of rain, but the corn crop needs it badly. The cane crop is suffering material injury from the drouth.

The Bastrop Times informs us that Dr. Silvers had been tried for the murder of a man named Edwards, and acquitted. The Times has the following paragraph:

On Monday last, while a party of gentlemen were bear hunting in the cane, some ten miles above this town, Mr. Richard Cooley, who had shot a bear and was in a cane thicket looking for its body, Mr. John J. Johnson, supposing he saw the bear moving, fired an ounce ball, from a shot gun, and shot Mr Cooley through the abdomen. He was immediately taken home, a distance of four or five miles, and died of the wound after lingering thirty hours. He leaves a wife and child to mourn his untimely death. Mr. Johnson and Mr. Conley were related in some way by marriage.

The Farmerville Enquirer states that unless rain falls soon no boats will be able to go up higher than the mouth of the Arbenne. The Enquirer also states that a child was recently born in that place, "one side of which was black, one of its eyes, one-half of its nose, mouth, chin, and in fact one-half of it, as near as ink can be drawn, was black, and it lived three weeks."

The Shreveport Gazette says:

Notwithstanding the dry weather, the crops look well. There is now a prospect of rain. On Tuesday night there was a thunder cloud west, and there must have been a heavy rain.

The Natchitoches Chronicle of a recent date has the following:

The fatal effects of this protracted dry season are plainly visible in every plantation in our parish, and justify the most gloomy forebodings as to the future. This unnatural state of things, superadded to the continued low water, gives to the people of Northern Louisiana, or at least the Red River country, the utmost depression of feelings. We speak truly when we say that in portions of this and the adjoining parishes, actual want and destitution prevail. Among many poor families, there exists a want of the necessaries of life, arising from the suspension of navigation, and consequent general scarcity of supplies, while the drought has cut off vegetation to such an extent, that these people are deprived of much which might afford them relief in these "hard times."

KANSAS.—The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun writes as follows under date of the 7th inst.:

Gov. Reeder is here to receive instructions and money for carrying into effect several liberal acts of the late Congress for military post-roads and other improvements in the territory. When he returns he will take with him his family, which is demanding as a pre-[illegible] has no doubt of his ability to maintain his authority and preserve law and order in the territory, notwithstanding the threats of some of his opponents, on the Missouri border, to eject him by force.

The new election which Gov. Reader has ordered on the 22d will not probably be attended with any disturbance or irregularities. The Missourians have no motive to interfere in that election, because they have already secured a majority in the Legislature, independently of the vacancies to be filled at the coming election.

If no sectional difficulties had occurred, the territory of Kansas would have been settled with a degree of rapidity parallelled only in the instances of California, and with a much more stable and valuable population. The state of uncertainty and agitation in which it has been kept by factious combinations has deterred immigration. Many men who come there with their families for actual settlement have abandoned it. Still, the actual population is about nine thousand, exclusive of the standing exterior army of twenty thousand.

ATTEMPTED ESCAPE.—We learn from the Frankfort (Ky.) Yeoman that Ellen Graves, a female convict in the Kentucky Penitentiary, recently attempted to effect her escape from prison by the following means: She twisted the night shirts and by some means tied and gagged the other female prisoners. The female prison is a small building within the main walls; the first story of which is the office of the keeper. Not being able to get through the windows or door she cut a hole through the floor with a hatchet which she had previously secured, and forcing the lock from the door of the keeper's office below, found herself confined only by the outer walls. She then found a ladder in the yard, but was unable to raise it against the wall, and went down to one of the male prisoners, whom she found in another building, and requested him to assist her in raising it to the wall. He told her to remain there until he spied around the yard to see if any person could see them. He went immediately to one of the assistant keepers and told him the facts, and the daring woman was once after confined in the dark cell, where she will probably remain for some time.

M. de Tocqueville, replying a few weeks ago to an invitation to attend a banquet given by Americans in Paris to the memory of Washington, wrote: "There is no grander name in history; and if it was permitted me to choose a place among the great men who have left eternal memorials I would choose, without hesitation, the place of Washington, and I believe that all who can appreciate moral beauty and are capable of being esteemed of it would consent for his place. May it please God to preserve both the spirit and the works of that great man!

POWDER MILL EXPLOSION AND LOSS OF LIFE.—A dispatch of the 8th, from Rochester, New York, says:

The powder mills situated about five miles from this city, exploded at six o'clock this evening, killing five men. The shocks, three in number, were distinctly felt here. This is the fourth time these mills have been blown up in five years. The buildings around them were blown to atoms. The property was owned by Messrs. J. Conkey & Co.

Unique Quotations.

The conscience is the most elastic material in the world—to-day you cannot stretch it over a mole-hill, to-morrow it makes a mountain.... Some people seem born with the temperament and tastes of genius without its creative powers.... Life is a sleep in which we dream the most of the commencement and at the close—the middle part absorbs us too much for dreams.... The love of man is a beautiful and wanton butterfly; but not the butterfly which is the emblem of the soul.... The policy of fear keeps many virtues. Sin might not be odious if we did not tremble at the consequences even of appearance.... Error is sometimes sweet; but there is no anguish like an error on which we feel ashamed.... Friendship is the wine of existence, but love is the dram-drinking.... Intellect, Genius, Fame—these have an immortal youth and imperishable beauty of their own.... The inscriptions that youth writes upon the tablets of an imaginative mind are indeed, never wholly obliterated; they are as an invisible writing, which gradually becomes clear in the light and warmth.... Honor is to justice as the flower to the plant, its effervescence, its bloom, its consummation.... If the collision of minds alone does each mind discover what is its proper product; left to ourselves, our talents become but intellectual eccentricities.... Love, in its first dim and imperfect shape, is but imagination concentrated on one object; it is a genius of the heart, resembling that of the intellect; it appeals to, it stirs up, it wakes the sentiments and sympathies that lie most latent in our nature.... As the sun upon the dial, Genius gives to the human heart both its lights and its shadows.... There is a great difference between first fancy and first love.... The Baton Rouge Advocate says:

No go! It made another ineffectual attempt last night to rain. It went through with all the usual preliminaries—it lowered a little, it lightened a little, it thundered a little, and it rained a little—imperceptibly. If it rained at all it was but "a few sad drops wept" by the disconsolate weather-clerk at the total failure of the whole affair. Try again—better late than never.

The Comet has the following:

The planters east of us, in this parish, say that they may make something out of their crops if we have rain before this week is over. If not, all hope for the future is lost in the parching drought from which the whole country is suffering.

From the Opelousas Patriot of the 5th we cut the following paragraphs:

Since our last issue we have had several good showers of rain. The dust has been laid, and vegetation to a considerable extent benefited. The rains, however, have been partial, as we have heard from several quarters of the parish where they had none. In other sections they have had much more than we had. The weather is warm with slight indications of more rain. The water in the Courtableau is again receding, and boats will in a few days more be unable to reach Washington.

The cotton planters living on Bayou Boeuf, despairing of a rise in that stream, are now hauling their cotton to the junction of the Grand Coteau, where it is being boxed on flats to Washington; and some of the sugar planters near the junction are talking of hauling their sugar.

We find the following in the Vermillionville Echo:

On Friday, 27th April last, Mr. Edouard Brasseux of this parish put an end to his life by hanging himself in his yard. With his life ends, necessarily, the law suit which was pending before the District Court, between him and his wife for a separation of bed and board.

The author of the last fire on the premises of Mr. Cormier in this town, is no other than a mulatto boy eight or ten years old, living at his house. Last Monday the boy attempted to burn down the kitchen and was discovered, and admitted that he had burned the cribs. He does not give the reason for such conduct, or rather he gives so many that his motives are unknown.

SUICIDE AT LITTLE ROCK.—The Little Rock (Ark.) Democrat of the 8th inst., says:

On Saturday last our city was thrown into the deepest gloom by the death of young David J. Walker, son of Dr. James H. Walker, of Hempstead county. His body was found on the river bank in the rear of the State House. He had a discharged pistol in his hand. An inquest was held over the body, and the verdict was that he came to his death from a pistol in his own hands.

Mr. Walker was a young man of the highest promise. Amiable in his disposition, temperate in his habits, and industrious in his application to the legal profession, he had the fairest prospects of success. With an affectionate father, a host of friends, and wealth almost unlimited, he seemed to want nothing to complete his earthly happiness. His death spread a deep sadness over our community.

Col. J. H. Wheeler, United States Minister to Nicaragua, presented his credentials to the acting President of the republic, Jose Maria Estrada, on the 7th ult., when the usual official expressions of good feeling between the States were exchanged. Gen. Corral was elected President of Nicaragua, but will not immediately assume the duties of the office. The revolutionists still held Leon, and it was thought that Col. Walker would soon arrive with a party to aid Castillon. The Congressmat on the 5th of April.

Perilous Adventure with a Tiger.

T. B. Buckingham, in his "Autobiography," relates an extraordinary adventure he once had with a tiger in India. He had gone to dine some seven or eight miles from Bombay; and having an appointment at home in the morning, and the night being remarkably fine, with a brilliant moonlight, he declined the invitation of his host and hostess to remain with them over night, but set out at ten o'clock, in his palanquin, on his return to Bombay.

"A great portion of the way," he says, "lay over a level plain of some extent; and while we were in the midst of this, the bearers, of whom there were eight; four to carry and for a relay, with two mussauljees, or lantern-bearers, who carry their lights in the moonlight as well as in the dark, from matter of etiquette which it is thought disrespectful to omit; in short, the whole party of ten in an instant disappeared, scattering in all directions, and each running at his utmost speed. I was perfectly astonished at this sudden halt, and wholly unable to conjecture its cause, and all my calling and remonstrating was in vain. In casting my eyes behind the palanquin, however, I saw, to my horror and dismay, a huge tiger in full career toward me, with his tail almost perpendicular, and with a grunt that indicated too distinctly the intense satisfaction with which he anticipated a savory morsel for his hunger. There was not a moment to lose, or to deliberate. To get out of the palanquin and try to escape would be running into the jaws of certain death. To remain within it was the only alternative.

"The palanquin is an oblong chest or box, about six feet deep, two feet broad and two feet high. It has four short legs for resting it on the ground, three or four inches only above the soil. Its bottom and sides are flat, and its top is gently convex to carry off the rain. By a pole projecting from the centre of each end the bearers carry it on their shoulders, and the passenger has stretched on a thin mattress on an open cane bottom, like a couch or bed, with a pillow beneath his head. The mode of entering and leaving the palanquin is through a square opening on either side, which, when the sun or rain requires it, may be closed by a sliding door. This is usually composed of Venetian blinds, to allow light and air, in a wooden frame, and may be fastened, if desired, by a small brass hook and eye. Every thing about the palanquin, however, is made as light as possible, to lessen the labor of the bearers; and there is no part of the panneling or sides more than half an inch thick, if so much. All I could do, therefore, was in the shortest possible space of time to close the two sliding doors, and lie along on my back. I had often heard that if you suspended your breath, and put on the semblance of being dead, the most ferocious of wild beasts will leave you. I attempted this, by holding my breath as long as possible, and remaining as still as a recumbent statue. But I found it of no avail.

"The doors were hardly closed before the tiger was alongside, and his smelling and snorting were horrible. He first butted one of the sides with his head, and, as there was no resistance on the other, the palanquin went over on its beam-ends, and lay perfectly flat, with the open bottom presented to the tiger's view. Through this and the mattress, heated, no doubt, by my lying on it, the odor of the living man came out stronger than through the wood, and the smelling and smelling were repeated with increased strength. I certainly expected every moment that, with a powerful blow of one of his paws, he would break in some part of the palanquin, and drag me out for his devouring. But another butting of his head against the palanquin rolled it over on its convex top, and then it rocked to and fro like a cradle. All this while I was obliged, of course, to turn my body with the evolutions of the palanquin itself; and every time I moved I dreaded lest it should provoke some fresh aggression. The beast, however, wanting sagacity, did not use his powerful paw as I expected, and, giving it up in despair, set up a hideous howl of disappointment, and slinked off in the direction from whence he came.

"I rejoiced, as may be well imagined, at the cessation of all sound and smell to indicate his presence, but it was a full quarter of an hour before I had courage to open a side door, and put my head out to see whether he was gone or not. Happily, he had entirely disappeared, and I was instantly relieved. The next course to be considered was whether I was to get out and walk to Bombay, a distance of four miles, now near midnight, or whether I should again close my doors and remain where I was. I deemed this the safest plan, and remained accordingly; when, about half an hour after midnight, all my bearers returned, with several peons, or foot soldiers, and muskets, pistols, lances and cabres, enough to kill a dozen tigers; but these were too late to be of any use."

CAUGHT A TARTAR.—At a New Year's ball given at Hyde's Hotel, Sudbury, Vermont, a few years since, a young gent being more marked in his attentions to the red-nosed god than, perhaps, a strict construction of the rules of propriety would authorise, as the night progressed, began to feel certain symptoms of weariness in the region of the knees. Feeling a strong inclination to doze a little, he let himself into the first room he came to, and was too oblivious of the flight of time and sense to observe that it was the ladies' dressing-room. Not being at all particular, he accommodated himself to a promiscuous pile of cloaks, shawls, bonnets, muffs, tippets, etc., and was just on the point of closing his eyes to the vanity of this world, when the door burst open, and in rushed two damsels who had just been doing a cotillion.

While arranging curls, and other bewitcheries, the following conversation ensued:

"Oh, Tempy, don't. I look miserable! I declare, my face is burning up."

Tempy, "Why, ae, Sase; you look beautiful I heard Will Stokes say he never saw you look so pretty."

Susa, "Oh, pshaw! Temp, how can you? But you're such a case; you have nearly killed Fred Wilkins (our hero). He has not been in the ball-room since you danced with Jack Stevens. Temp, you ought to do something with the poor fellow; suspense is dreadful, you know."

Tempy, "Heigh-ho! I never gave the fool much encouragement; but he has got beautiful eyes. But, then, they do say he drinks. Mary Grubbs told me to-night that his breath smelt of gin. Ba! he can't love me and gin too."

Just here, Fred raised himself on his elbow, and, with a drunken leer, opened his mouth and spoke as follows: "Gals, did ya hear (hic) arry Berry (hic) but Moll Grubbs (hic) say I was drunk (hic) hay?"

Two screams, a rustling of silks, a slam of the door, and all was silent.

PREPARING FOR THE MAINE LAW.—Last week several respectable citizens of Goshen, N. Y., in view of the prohibitory law going into effect, decided to lay in a stock of good liquor for family use. A man in the neighborhood undertook to supply them with a choice article, which he represented as having been stored away ten years. A few days after, one of the purchasers thought he would try the article, when, to his astonishment, he found he had been "sold" most unmercifully—the liquor being the worst kind of trash, worth about 40 cents a gallon. An indignation meeting was immediately called, and the unfortunate purchasers waited en masse upon the seller, whom they compelled to refund the money and collect the liquor. Not content with this, he was sentenced to swallow a pint of the trash, which sentence was immediately carried into execution. He was seized and thrown upon his back, a funnel was inserted in his mouth, and a full pint soon found its way down his throat, to the great satisfaction of those who administered the dose.

When Dr. Rush was a young man, he was invited to dine in company with Robert Morris, a man celebrated for the part he took in the American Revolution. It so happened that the company had waited some time for Mr. Morris, who, on his appearance, apologized for detaining them, by saying he had been engaged in reading a sermon of a clergyman who had just gone to England to receive orders.

"Well, Mr. Morris," said the Doctor, "how did you like the sermon? I have heard it highly extolled."

"Why, Doctor," said he, "I did not like it at all. It's too smooth and tame for me."

"Mr. Morris," replied the Doctor, "what sort of a sermon do you like?"

"I like, sir," replied Mr. Morris, "that kind of a sermon which drives a man into the corner of a pew, and makes him think the devil's after him."

—Private letters from St. Petersburgh, received by important mercantile houses state confidently that the Russian war party has completely got the upper hand, and that Alexander II's throne would not be worthy a week's purchase if he were to attempt to thwart the current of national feeling. The rich nobles, who in their hearts long for peace, and will be the greatest sufferers by the war, are compelled to enroll the popular cry. They offer large contributions, in the hope of averting a sweeping 40 coloreen property tax, amounting to confiscation.

—At the last sitting of the Paris Academy of Sciences, Mr. Halphen exhibited the large diamond called the "Star of the South," which was found in Brazil, and of which he is the owner. It weighs 254 carats, but it is rumored that it will lose half its weight when it undergoes the process of cutting. Mr. Halphen values this diamond at five millions of francs. When cut, it is to be placed in the great exhibition of the palace of industry.

—As a gardener at St. Anne, Lewes, England, was cutting firewood on an old chopping block, gold coins began to drop out of it; and on examining the place they came from, he took out 40 guineas of the reign of Charles II, James II, and William III. The block was once a portion of a house in St. Anne, and for years had been lying in an open yard. The treasure was kept in by putty.

—A British private, in a letter relative to the battle of Inkermann, printed in the London Times, gives the following incident:—

"In the heat of the battle a young Russian officer made himself very conspicuous, and appeared indifferent to danger. He was young, tall, handsome, and indeed beautiful. Twice I had my rifle raised to shoot him, but my heart smote me, and I turned it in another direction. In an hour I saw him again, but oh, how changed! His cheeks which had been flushed with the heat of the strife, were now deadly pale. He lay, or half reclined, on the edge of a hillock, and held the miniature likeness of a pretty young lady in his hand, which had been tied to his neck by a small gold chain. His eyes were fixed upon it, but they were fixed in death. I cannot tell you what my feelings were; indeed, I cannot venture—it would unman me."

Jack Tars at Balaklava much disliked carrying up provisions to the camp on their backs—which at one time all were obliged to do; and there is a very good story told of one who was overtaken by a general officer on the road. Jack was dressed in an old soldier's red coat, and had a bag of buiscuit upon his back, when the general made up at the point of the road, where it was very narrow. The general called out, "Soldier allow me to pass you." Jack—"I am not a soldier." General—"Well sailor." Jack—"I am not a sailor." General—"Well then, what are you?" Jack—"I am a commissariat mule." The general laughed heartily, and gave Jack half a crown.

FROM THE RIO GRANDE.—We have received dates from Brownsville to the 28th ult., but there was no news of importance. From the Flag we clip the following paragraphs:

From beyond the frontier we have no advices. In Matamoros the rumor is current that there is to be another revolution on this line before a great while; but this is only rumor—certainly the peaceful department of the exiles how here give no coloring of truth to the report.

Gen. Woll, since he has re-assumed command in Matamoros, has, we learn, promulgated an order removing the duty on lumber, and by several other popular acts so pleased some of the citizens that they resolved to give him a complimentary ball. The ball was given on Sunday evening last, but is said to have been no near a failure that the ire of the General became greatly inflated. He is said to have insulted and expelled several persons from the room, two of whom he humanely allowed ten minutes in which to place themselves in Texas. It is said that one of these gentlemen made as good time in running this bank as the General himself once did in swiming it.

There is a law on this frontier of Mexico making horse-stealing punishable by death, and a day or two since an unfortunate lad was undergoing the penalty in Matamoros. In a moment he was arrested, the proof established, and he led out and shot with but little ceremony. This seems, to one unaccustomed to such scenes, a rather summary proceeding; but if there ever was an excuse for it, surely it is here, where, from the great numbers of these vagabonds, no one's property is safe for a single night. Though perhaps not so humane, it is far more efficacious than our own system.

The Flag publishes a letter from Saltillo complaining of the disposition which has been made of certain property belonging to Dr. Prime, who was murdered near that place in December last. The writer states that the property has in effect been divided among the authorities.

MISSISSIPPI.—We find the following paragraph in the Jackson Flag of the Union, of Friday last:

The dwelling-house of Mr. Haywood Foote, of Cayuga, in this county, was burnt on the 3d inst. The fire originated in the kitchen. Mrs. Chevis, sister of Mr. Foote, and Mrs. Johnston, who were on a visit at the time of the fire, narrowly escaped with their lives. W. W. Leggett was seriously hurt by having a beam fall on him from the second story. The loss of property is estimated at about $2500.

The Port Gibson Herald, of the same date, says:

The cars have resumed their regular trips, the engine having been repaired. We hope to see no more interruption to the working of the road.

In this connection we would refer our readers to the report of President Spencer to the stockholders of the road. All things considered, we think the showing made by the President is a remarkably good one, and should at once put stock in the road up to something like a reasonable price. In spite of all the croaking and the apparent determination of many—some of them stockholders—that the road should not pay here, it is a fact that, with a short crop, high prices for provisions, when everybody is economising, and when money is almost as scarce as hopeful friends of the road, it is paying ten per cent interest on the capital invested.

SHIPWRECK, AND LOSS OF LIFE.—The bark Clara Windsor arrived at New York on the 7th inst., from Port-au-Prince, having on board two men picked up from the wreck of the bark John Clark. The Tribune says:

The men stated that they were all that were left out of seven men that sailed in the above schooner from New York on the 2d day of March bound to Jacmel; that on the 7th March, 9 P. M., a squall struck the schooner from W. N. W., and threw her on her beam-ends, and was an hour before they succeeded in cutting away the weather-rigging, when the mainmast and foremast went close by the deck; then she righted; but the hatches had burst, and she was full of water. They were left without food or water, but on the next day obtained a keg of crackers that were wet with salt water; after which they got a bucket of vinegar, some shark-liver oil and some candy pheme. The latter made them stupid and feel as if they were on fire.

The fifth day after the catastrophe, captain, mate, steward, and two man died, and they, the two remaining men, had nothing to eat for eight days previous to being taken off. Those that died went crazy previous to death. They also state that they saw two different vessels, one of which, a fishing schooner, came close to them, so that they could see the man at the helm, and they hallooed to them. The vessel hove-to, and came close up under their lee, and after surveying them put their helm hard up and bore away without offering any assistance. All were living at that time, and but for it being before daylight, could have read her name, as her letters then were indistinctly visible. The weather was good, and nothing to hinder them from saving all hands. The names of the two saved are Robert McKay, (captain's son,) and Charles Lowell.

We find the following paragraphs in the Mobile papers of Saturday last:

MURDER.—The body of a man by the name of Mills, was yesterday discovered by the mail carrier, on the Telegraph road, about four miles from the city. When found, he was a few yards from the road, whither he had apparently been dragged. On his head were two wounds, evidently inflicted by some sharp instrument like a hatchet. From all the circumstances, it is evident that this murder was committed with a view to robbery. The deceased had come to the city with a flatboat load of lumber, which he had disposed of, and was on his return home, when the diabolical act was perpetrated. He was seen towards sunset on Wednesday walking along the road, carrying a carpet-bag.—When found, this, together with his hat, shoes and stockings, was missing.

THE NEW YORK HERALD'S CALIFORNIA BUGBEAR.—A San Francisco correspondent of the Panama Star says:

Considerable merriment has been evinced by "Patriot's" letter to the New York Herald, in reference to the movements at a disunion party in this State. The matter did not wholly emanate from the fruitful brain of a scribbler, something very like it actually took place, at the head of which stood Mr. Speaker Stow, but rank and file becoming alarmed at the gigantic proportions of the undertaking and smelling treason, they deserted their leaders and the matter dropped. No fear can exist of such a movement ever gaining a permanent hold in California, where the population consists of such a mixed "conglomeration" of cadipodean interests.

AN IMMENSE BREAKWATER.—The Chicago and Rock Island Railroad Company are preparing to erect a vast breakwater in the Mississippi, just above and adjoining the great center pier on which will swing the draw on the railroad bridge. This breakwater will require about 500,000 feet of lumber, and 13,000 yards of rock for its construction. It is intended for the great draw to rest upon when swung around; the upper end of it for a house to be built upon for the draw-keeper to reside in, and for an ice-breaker and breakwater. Its huge dimensions will defy the storm and floods.

THE SECOND KINNEY EXPEDITION.—We have every reason to believe that the proceedings to stop the second Kinney expedition, recently undertaken in New York, had their origin here, and were based by the Government on the representations of the Nicaragua and other Central American Ministers, backed by such evidence as the United States law officers in New York City have gathered there.—[Washington Star.

EARTHQUAKE AT CAIRO.—A letter from a friend at Cairo informs us that two shocks of an earthquake were felt in that city about half-past ten o'clock on the night of the 30th. The interval between the shocks was about five minutes. Their duration was about five seconds each, the vibratory motion being sensibly felt, and the rumbling sound distinctly heard. These shocks, we believe, were not felt in St. Louis.

Heavy rains have fallen between Sandoval and Cairo, and the farmers are greatly gratified, as they insure an abundant crop of corn, wheat, &c. [St. Louis Republican, 4th.

KINGS GOING TO THE CRIMEA.—A letter from Turin in the Eco d'Italia, says that Victor Emanuel, King of Sardinia, has written to the Emperor Napoleon, expressing a desire to accompany him to the Crimea. The Emperor is said to have been pleased with the idea, and readily gave his consent.

AN ANCIENT TUNNEL.—A late letter from Samos to the Newark Advertiser says that the old subterranean aqueduct, (the ancient Arethusa) discovered last autumn, between Syracuse and the Island of Ortygia, has been at length entirely reopened, and is found to be 12 feet high by 4 wide, and about an English mile in length. The tunnel, quite equal in all respects to that under the Thames, was built during the occupation of Sicily by the Greeks.

Early Days of Silas Wright.

AN INCIDENT.

A friend, who was an old acquaintance of the late Hon. Silas Wright, related to us an anecdote of that distinguished man which he received from his own lips, and as we have never seen it in print, although it may have been, we give it to our readers:

Mr. Wright left home at an early age to "seek his fortune," having by way of earthly possessions, a fine horse, saddle and bridle, a pair of saddle-bags, a small stock of clothing and five hundred dollars in money, which was in bills and was deposited in his saddle-bags. He took a western course, and in traveling one day he overtook a man with a waggon and furniture and an old span of horses, apparently emigrating. There was nothing particularly attractive at first view in the person or equipage, but upon a closer inspection, Mr. Wright discovered the daughter of the emigrant, a most beautiful young lady, evidently refined and intelligent. They journeyed on toward Geneve, chatting cosily together, when suddenly the old gentleman recollected that he wished to get his money changed at the Geneva Bank, and to enable him to reach that place before the close of bank hours, he proposed that young Wright should take his seat beside the beautiful daughter and allow him to mount Wright's horse and hasten forward. Ardent and half-smitten by the charms of the young lady, Silas gladly accepted the proposition, and leaping from his horse allowed the old man to mount and make off with all his earthly possessions, money included, without a thought.

Rapidly the hours of Thelahe went by, while these two young and gifted beings pursued their course, quite leisurely, it may be surmised, toward their journey's destination.

On arriving at Geneva, Mr. Wright drove up to the principal tavern, left the lady, but then for the first time a shade of anxiety crossed his mind for the safety of his fine horse and his money. He went to all the other public houses, but could hear of no such men as he described; he beat up to the quarters of the cashier of the bank, and learned to his additional concern, that such a man had called at the bank and endeavored to get some money changed, which he declined doing as the notes he presented were counterfeit! Our future statesman then came to the conclusion that he had made a crooked start in life. About fifty dollars worth of old furniture, a dilapidated wagon and a span of worn out horses, for a new wardrobe, fine horse, and five hundred dollars! Aye! but then there was the pretty daughter—but her he could not keep as personal property without her own consent, and without money he hardly wanted a wife. He was at his wit's end, and had just concluded to make the best of a bad bargain, when the old man made his appearance with horse and money all safe. It turned out that the money which the cashier had thought to be counterfeit, was not so, and the mistake had given the old man the trouble to go some distance to find an acquaintence who might vouch for his respectability in case of trouble, and this occasioned his mysterious absence. In the sequel, the beautiful daughter became afterward the wife of the future statesman. [Detroit Advertiser.

A SAGACIOUS EAGLE.—A man in Connecticut shot an eagle of the largest kind. The bird fell to the ground, and, being only wounded, the man carried him home alive. He took good care of him, and he soon got well. He became quite attached to the family in which he was adopted, and, though he was permitted to have his liberty, and often flew to a considerable distance from the house, he always came back again. It was his custom to take his station in the door-yard in front of the house, and if any well dressed person came through the yard to the house, the eagle would sit still and make no objections; but if a ragged person came into the door-yard, he would fly at him, seizing his clothes with one claw, and holding on to the grass with the other. In this way he would make him a prisoner. The owner of the house was often called upon to release people who had been captured by this eagle. It is a curious fact that the bird never attacked people, however ragged they might be, if they approached the house by the back-door. It was only when they attempted to enter through the front door that he assailed them.

He had some other curious habits, as, for instance: instead of going out every day in order to get his breakfast, dinner and supper, his custom was, about once a week, to make a hearty meal, which lasted him for six or seven days. His common food was the king-bird. He would some times ostch ten of these birds in the course of a few hours. The eagle must have been very dextrous to have done it, by the way, for the king-bird is surprisingly quick in his motions, and does not make any thing of the task of catching bees by wholesale, as they are going into their hive. I watched one last summer for half an hour, as he was making his breakfast at the expense of the bees belonging to the friend at whose house I was visiting; and it amused me not a little, although I could not help pitying the poor bees, to see the dexterity with which he made prisoners of these poor little fellows.

We have always regarded common soda water as a deleterious concoction. The following statement of Dr. Doremus confirms the correctness of our opinion:

SODA WATER.—In an article recently published in the American Medical Monthly, Dr. Doremus makes some interesting statements relative to the existence of poisonous substances in soda water. He says that the test of several gallons, obtained from different sources, showed the presence of one and a half grains of carbonate of copper to every quart of fluid. This deleterious product was the result of the corrosion of the copper condenser, when the water containing the carbonic and sulphuric acids found in soda which had been standing in it several days. When the tin with which the condensers are usually lined is in good condition, of course, there can be no corrosion, but after use for some time the tin wears away and the copper is exposed. Carbonate of lead also, derived probably from the lead pipes used in conveying the waters to the jet, was found in most of the waters examined. Dr. Doremus says that the use of soda water some times, though rarely, produces sickness, vomiting, and attacks like cholera, and he recommends condensers of iron, stone, block tin, or gutta percha, as substitutes for those commonly in use, whose imperfect tinning or corrosion from long use renders them dangerous to health and life.

A GOOD RECOMMENDATION.—"Please, sir, dont you want a cabin boy?"

"I do want a cabin boy, my lad, but what's that to you? A little chap like you ain't fit for the berth."

"Oh, sir, I'm real strong. I can do a great deal of work, if I ain't so very old."

"But what are you here for? You don't look like a city boy. Run away from home, hey?"

"Oh, no indeed sir, my father died, and my mother is very poor, and I want to do something to help her. She let me come."

"Well, sonny, where are your letters of recommendation. Can't take any boy without those."

Here was a damper. Willie had never thought of its being necessary to have letters from his minister or his teachers, or from some proper person, to prove to strangers that he was an honest, good boy. Now what should he do. He stood in deep thought, the captain meanwhile curiously watching the workings of his expressive face, at length he put his hand into his bosom, and drew out his little Bible, and without one word put it into the captain's hand. The captain opened to the blank leaf and read:

"WILLIE GRAHAM,

Presented as a reward for regular and punctual attendance at Sabbath School, and for his blameless conduct there and elsewhere. From his Sunday School Teacher."

Capt. McLeod was not a pious man, but he could not consider the case before him with a heart unmoved. The little fatherless child, standing humbly before him, referring him to the testimony of his Sunday School teacher, as it was given in his little Bible, touched a tender spot in the breast of the noble seaman, and clapping Willie heartily on the shoulder, said:

"You are the boy for me; you shall sail with me, and if you are as good a lad as I think you are, your pockets shan't be empty when you go back to your good mother."

The American party triumphed at a recent municipal election in Petersburgh, Va. The same town gave Pierce a majority of between two and three hundred for the Presidency.

THE WAY SOLDIERS FIGHT.—The following is an extract from the letter of a private soldier:

"So, Ben wents to know more of the way we actually fight. I suppose he has half a wish to experience it, if not too dangerous. Well, this for him. Our first experience of the enemy was any thing but pleasant, being round shot and shell, which quickly took the life of many a brave fellow, and consequently heated the blood of the living, who, after asking permisson, flung away their great coats and rushed on to the fight, ours being the only regiment that day that fought with the red coat fully exposed to view; on advantage, I think, for our great gray coats are too much like the Russian to be easily detected from them in foggy mornings. Now, Ben, came the work. When the hill up which we ascended was surmounted, a long line of skirmishers (Russians) were seen. One volley and cheer, and then the bayonets, which, for Ben's information, the Russians seldom waits for; if he does, our firelock is brought to that position most ready for use, called the "charge," and first parrying, if required, our enemy's thrust, is driven to the socket through any part of the body we can reach, the upper part the better.

Does not that seem dreadful to you at home? And, no doubt, so it is, and ourseld be no that ounces it But, in hattie our feelings are different. The pession to kill and destroy is raised within us; our blood boils for revenge for the comrade that a minute before you have seen ripped open with a shell, or, porchenoe, whose brains are bespattered on your person. It is then the domon of war is within you, and the work of death is but as sport; for fear goes from you, and but one idea fixes itself in your brain, and that is that there are enemies in front, and your mission is to destroy; and how the British "missionaries" (no encer intended) did their work at Inkormann; tell me not I boast if I confide it to history to tell.

On returning to camp you first ask yourself "Am I safe?" and then you wonder how you escaped. You next look round your tent and, as was the case in mine, saw three poor fellows with handages on different parts of their person, with merely "Isee, Jack, you are winged;" or, "Tom, the Ruse hee spolled your countenance," and "How did it heppen!" and no more is thought of the matter. Another glance round shows that our number is deficient of two. A little inquiry determines their fate. One was ripped open by a shell, and the other was stretched at full length; and, with the exclemation, "Poor fellows! they were good soldiers," the matter dropped.

Every one sets to work to boil a cup of coffee, drinks, rolls his blanket round his head, and sleeps, without dreaming that but a mile or so from him lie 10,000 beings that he has assisted in destroying. Such is all a soldier thinks of a bloody fight. In quiet hours after they sit and talk of the event, but not as if it were the extraordinary thing that is ushered throughout the world.

"THE WEST END."—Most persons think that the reason why the west end of London is more fashionable than the east, is nothing more than the topographical configuration of the capital. But the Academy of Sciences at Paris, in its last sitting, pronounced this opinion to be a delusion. In the first place, it appears that it is not only at London, but at Paris, Vienna, Berlin, Turin, St. Petersburg, and almost every other capital in Europe—at Liege, Caen, Montpelier, Toulouse, and several other large towns, wherever, in fact, there are not great local obstacles, the tendency of the wealthier inhabitants to group themselves to the west is almost as strongly marked as in the "great metropolis." In the second place, at Pompeii and other ancient towns, the same thing may be noticed; and in the third place, where the local figuration of the town necessitates an increase in a different direction, the moment the obsteole ceases, house spread directly toward the west. This last fact may, it is stated, be particularly observed at Rome, and, to a certain extent, at Edinburgh.

When, then, all cities and towns have their best districts in the west, it is pretty clear that the cause of it must be some general law entirely distinct from local situation. What is that law? "It arises from the atmospheric pressure," answere the Academy of Sciences. "When," it continues, "the barometric column rises, smoke and pernicious emanations rapidly evaporate in space. In the contrary case we see that smoke and pernicious vapors remain in apartments and on the surface of the soil. Now, every one knows that of all winds, that which causes the greatest ascension of the barometric column is that of the east, and that which lowers it most is the west. When the latter blows, it has the inconvenience of carrying with it to the eastern parts of a town all the deleterious gases which it meets in its passage over the western parts. It results from that that the inhabitants of the eastern part of the town have to support, not only their own smoke and miasma, but those of the western part of the town, brought to them by the west winds. When on the contrary, the east wind blows, it purifies the air by causing to ascend the pernicious emanations which it can not drive to the west. Consequently, the inhabitants of the west receive pure air from whatever part of the horizon it may arrive; and it may be added that, as the western winds are those which most frequently prevail, they are the first to receive the pure air, and as it arrives from the country."

After thus explaining why the western parts are the best, the Academy makes these recommendations: 1, That persons who have the liberty of choice, and especially those of delicate health, should reside in western parts of towns. 2, That all establishments from which emanate pernicious vapors and gases should be placed to the east. 3, That in building a house in a town, and even in the country, the kitchens and other dependencies from which pernicious emanations may arise should be placed to the east.

The members of the Academy who have announced the preceding discovery, and made the preceding recommendations, are Messrs. Pelouze, Pouillet, Boussingault and Elie de Beaumont—all of them of European reputation as savants.

NUMBERING OF SHIPPING.—The British Government has introduced a new regulation in regard to shipe which appears to be a good one. According to the Merchant Shipping Act, after the 1st of May every British ship is to have a distinct number assigned to her, by which she may be known and recognized, irrespective of her name, or other description. The series of numbers will begin with one, and proceed in regular arithmetical progression; a number once appropriated will never be applied to any other British ship. The allocation of those numbers will be under the control of the Commissioners of Customs, who are to allot a certain series to every British Registrer throughout the empire. Thus, to the port of London, may be allotted the series from 1 to 1000; to Liverpool, 1000 to 2000.

A BENEVOLENT MAN.—There were one hundred letters dropped into the post-office in Alexandria, (Va.,) during the month of April, upon which the postage was not pre-paid—so the postmaster could not put them in the mail. This fact coming to the knowledge of Mr. T. A. Stoutenburg, of Alexandria, he went to the postmaster and peid the postage on the letters and so had them sent to their destination. He deserves, and will receive one hundred thanks.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and gate well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be. A. H. MCLEAN, Rutherford county, Tenn.

DEATH OF THE YOUNG WIFE.

BY W. JASPER BLACKBURN.

The spring day broke in [illegible] loveliness; and as the glorious
[illegible] rolled in majesty from the far
[illegible] its unmeasured space, his silvery sheens
[illegible] the utmost western hills; and the while [illegible] seas, and rivers, and brooks, and birds, and mystic
[illegible]-wind, and Nature's countless vocal
[illegible] and instrumental choirs chimed together
[illegible] in song harmonious of praise
[illegible] for life and light and beauty.

And
[illegible] happy morn, upon a bed of [illegible] and pain, lay prostrate a young
[illegible] wife; the Lethean waves gathered
[illegible] about her feet, and Death's cold dew bathed
[illegible] low, lovely and beautiful even [illegible] now, and sheet her silken
[illegible] long a pallid hue, mingled with faint
[illegible] flats, the hectic flush of death; and as [illegible] withered hand methood the stricken ones
[illegible] the death-couch, her calm, speaking eye
[illegible] it was "the last of earth." But serene
[illegible] was, as one who slumbers in pleasant dreams.
[illegible] had for her calm soul no terrors,
[illegible] life's busy walks she had thought of death;
[illegible] prepared to die; though fain would she [illegible] have lingered a time on earth, for she [illegible] many friends, and a husband fond and [illegible], whose grief o'er her dying bed was such [illegible] earn could ne'er relieve; and as [illegible] these weeping ones she looked, to look
[illegible] now, the waves of regret passed o'er
[illegible] virgin bosom, but remained not,
[illegible] within rested a hope, more holy [illegible] more than earth could give or claim.

Then she
[illegible] sway with a low murmur,
[illegible] smile of peace clustering about her
[illegible] features—for she had told all whom [illegible] she loved on earth to meet her in God's [illegible] home, whither to her Death's chilly
[illegible] oped'op the way.

And thus to die is [illegible] and happy hoon. This young wife's glad [illegible] passed from earth as a sparkling
[illegible] drop is exhaled from the virgin spray
[illegible] the kissing sunbeam; and as released
[illegible] the redeemed soul wafted on to its [illegible] ation above, its course was as a
[illegible] of light from the fountain of purity,
[illegible] diating upon the unseen atome
[illegible] peace—and angels, and all the holy [illegible] dants of God's throne, met it on its [illegible] joy way, and gave it cheer, and rejoiced much
[illegible] one so pure had been born from earth to Heaven.

"Weep not for her"—she rests now
[illegible] good evening's cold dew," where erst and for [illegible] where the pure become more pure—and [illegible] more pure, the happier.

[illegible]ell, 1855.

DEVOTEDNESS TO CHRIST.

We make a few extracts, that will be welcome to our readers in advance of the receipt of Bishop Pierce's sermon commemorating the late Bishop Capers.

My acquaintance with our dear departed father (I ought to call him father) began while I was but a boy, and he was in the meridian of his strength, and the blaze of a renown such as few attain. The impressions made upon me then by his humble manner, unaffected conversation, and his unwearied labors, were fully justified by the familiarity of intercourse in after years. He seemed to me to be dead to the world, its gains and honors, and alive only to the glory of God and the salvation of souls. While his name was upon every tongue, and crowds were waiting from appointment to appointment, and the whole country was in a fever of curiosity and admiration, he seemed to shrink from fame, and the exultation by which a common mind and a common heart would have been lifted up, in his case was lost in an overwhelming sense of the responsibility of position entailed. He was one of the very few men I have known who was not injured by his piety and preaching by great popularity.

To seek popularity as an object, in a minister, is a crime; to bear it meekly when it comes unsought, is a virtue of rarest grace.

This virtue characterized, distinguished William Capers in the freshness of his youth, the glory of his noon, and in the mellow radiance of his sanctified old age. He was clothed with humility. It was his beauty and his strength. The praise even of the unduly oppressed him. Courted and caressed by the rich, the great, the mighty in the land, he shrunk from their embrace, lest he might seem to others to be seeking great things for himself. His faith was never hindered by seeking the honor of men, his fidelity never compromised by the adulation of the Church or the world. Who ever heard him tell of the mighty works he had done—the great sermons he had preached—the wondrous revivals he had carried on? Who ever saw in his air the conceit of success, or detected in his language the self-exultation of a praiseworthy deed? He was not the hero of his narratives, nor did he talk to make the simple wonder or the vain admire. Like Paul, whose visit to the third heaven was kept a secret for fourteen years, and revealed at last only to vindicate his apostleship, he said but little of his rich experience, save in the retirement of private life, to the ear of intimate companionship. Astonishingly fluent, he talked much, but always well. He never forfeited in private the reputation he had made in public. Cheerful without levity, and easy without familiarity, he never degraded the minister into the trifler, nor reproached the gaiety of his profession by foolish talking and jesting, which are not convenient. As a man, his nature was alive and gushing with generous impulses; kind, affectionate, full of sympathy, he rejoiced with them that rejoiced and wept with them that wept. In his family, gentle without weakness, and firm without improper indulgence. * * *

I have heard him when the consolations of the gospel distilled from his tongue as honey from the rock, and the message of salvation came down like the angelic song upon the shepherds of Bethlehem. Anon I have seen him clothe himself with terrible majesty, as when a prophet proclaimed the vengeance of the Almighty, and then the thunder of the violated law pealed from his lips like the trump of doom, and the pallid, awestruck assembly told that the preacher had power with God and prevailed with men. For the mourner in Zion, the grief-stricken, the bowed, the desolate, he had the tongue of the learned and the heart of a seraph. Oh! the pathos of his sympathy, how touching and tender! It was a heeling oil, a soothing balsam; beneath its magic charm desolation bloomed and tears were turned to rapture. Many a wayworn pilgrim, weary with life's heavy burdens, faint, yet pursuing with faltering steps, felt his hopes revive and his courage grow strong while this "old man eloquent" discoursed of providence, and grace, and heaven—of the cross, the mercy seat, and the crown of life. These were the themes on which he loved to dwell; they were the rejoicing of his heart and the staple of his ministry. But the harp is broken and all its music gone. The pleasant voice is hushed, and he who played so well upon that wondrous instrument, the human tongue, lies low in cold obstruction and dumb forgetfulness. Bishop Capers is no more. His place at the council board of the Church he loved is empty. The pulpit shall know him no more forever. The grave's dark eclipse rests upon that beaming face, and that venerable form, that moved among us but a little while ago, shrouded, coffined, buried, sleeps in death—thank God, in Jesus too—awaiting the descent of the judgment angel and the revelation of the Son of Man. * * *

In the history of our honored, beloved brother, there is no vice to deplore and no error to lament. I say not that he was perfect, but I do say a world of such men would liken earth to heaven. I say not that he had no infirmities, no human frailties; but I do say that his self-sacrificing spirit, his humble, holy, useful labors, his unwearied zeal, and his spotless example, are to his descendants a noble patrimony, and to the Church a priceless heritage. Alive, he was a demonstration of the power and truth of Christianity; being dead, he yet speaketh, proclaiming to all that God is faithful. He left all and followed Christ, but never lacked any good thing. Counting all things but loss that he might win Christ, God gave him friends and fame, honor and usefulness. A messenger of God, his visits were blessings. The country admired him, and the Church loved him. His death fell like a shadow on many a hearthstone, and his native State became a valley of weeping. Cities struggled for the honor of his burial, and Methodism, in mourning, repeats his funeral, to prolong her grief and consecrate his memory. Oh! brethren, we have lost a friend, a brother, an advocate, an example, a benefactor. Earth is growing poorer. There is now less faith, less zeal, less love in the world. The righteous are perishing, the good are taken away. Oh! ye venerable fathers of the Church, cotemporaries and fellow-laborers of the ascended Capers, your ranks are broken. The friends of your youth are gone, and, relics of a generation well nigh past, ye still linger among us. God bless you! we love you much, but we cannot keep you much longer. Your sands are running low, your change is at hand. You, venerable sir,* are almost the only bond that binds the preacher and his congregation to the pioneers of Methodism in this broad country. That bond, frotted and worn by three-score years and ten, is well nigh threadless, attenuated, and ready to break. But God is with you. The raven hair, the ruddy cheek, the vigorous arm, the enduring strength, are gone, all gone; but your religion, too, thank God, is left you. Leaning upon that staff, you are waiting your summons. Heaven bless you with a smiling sunset, a pleasing night and a glorious morn. And you, hoary veterans of the cross, one and all, heroes of a glorious strife, remnants of an army slain and yet victorious, if we survive when ye are gone, how bereaved and solitary our lot! But ye are going; the wrinkled brow, the furrowed cheek, the halting step, respond, yes, we are going. Pray for us while you live, and bless us when you die.

And you, brethren, middle-aged and young, let us imitate the example, catch the spirit of our glorified brother and fellow-laborer. He felt himself a debtor to the wise and the unwise. The white man, the Indian and the Negro all shared his counsel, his labors, his sympathy, and his prayers. The white fields are yet ungathered, and the strongest reapers are falling. The mournful event we commemorate cries, go work to-day in the Lord's vineyard. This is our duty, and ought to be our only business. We are here, as officers and ministers of our branch of the Church, to inaugurate our great missionary and publishing interests under new auspices. But the cold shadow of death falls darkly upon our council chamber. Its presence is a warning. We have home interests we may not live to supervise; there are plans of usefulness we may not help to execute; for we, too, are passing away. What we do must be done quickly. Let us live unto the Lord; let us live unto the Lord more than ever; let us be more prompt, self-denying and laborious. Let us be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as we know that our labor is not in vain in the Lord. What we lay out he will repay. Amid our toil, inconveniences and trials, he is our consolation. "We are the Lord's." If we live till our physical powers decay, the dim eye may still read our titles clear; on Jesus' bosom we may still lean the hoary head, and in death's sad struggle feel our kind Preserver near. God will not love us less because "the strong men bow themselves and" "the keepers of the house tremble." His love endureth forever. His claim is undeniable, his title indisputable. The grave's effacing fingers cannot mutilate the handwriting. Time's ponderous wheel, as it grinds the world to dust, on its march to judgment, cannot destroy the record. "A book of remembrance is written before Him," safe beyond the desolations of earth and the triumphs of the sepulchre. Heeding the solemn providence which bids us weep a brother deceased, let us go forth bearing precious seed, sowing beside all waters—we shall rest, and stand in our lot at the end of the days. "Whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's." Living and dying, dead and buried, we are His, His when heaven and earth are fled and gone, His in the New Jerusalem, forever and forever.

LETTER FROM PENSACOLA.

A briefly comprehensive description of the present condition of Pensacola may not be altogether uninteresting to the readers of the Advocate. This is one of the oldest cities in the United States, and possesses natural advantages superior to any point on the Gulf for an extensive port. The beautiful bay, protected from the turbulence of the Gulf during storms by St. Rosa's Island, which stretches across its entrance, simply leaving an inlet, deep and safe, for vessels of largest draught, affords one of the most excellent harbors in the world. The largest vessels can come immediately up to our wharves. The city is remarkable for its health, having no local cause for sickness. Around, in nearly every quarter of the suburbs, are springs of pure water, sending their limpid currents through and around the city, affording abundant supply for all purposes. From twenty to twenty-five feet, water may be reached in any part of the place. My own well is almost within a stone's throw of the beach, and supplies me with a sufficiency of fresh water for family purposes—heavy draughts being required every evening to water the garden. A back of the city there is a gradual elevation, forming an amphitheatre. In the centre of the arc there is the highest elevation, from which the eye can not one glance sweep over the beautiful prospect which the city and bay present. Take your stand with me here for awhile, and I'll point out all that occurs to me of interest. Where we stand you see the marke of the old fort occupied by Jackson when encamped here. Back of us, for more than fifty miles, a poor pine barren stretches, thinly settled by very poor people. No city in the world, perhaps, has so poor and desolate a back country. To the left of us you see the tall trees skirting the head of the bay, at the distance of eight or ten miles. There Escambia river empties into a bay of the same name, which forms an arm of the main body of Pensacola Bay. In the neighborhood of the mouth of the river are several which, with others upon the rivers tributary to our bay, furnish the lumber which is our only article of export. Recently one of these mills has been burned down; a calamity which has materially frustrated the enterprise of a gentleman who has done as much as any one, perhaps, to augment the commerce of the place. The misfortune, however, which would have crushed an ordinary spirit, only served to discover the philosophic cast of a mind which will never despair. May God yet prosper him.

Turning your eye, now, from the extreme left to the extreme right, you see the smoke rising from the about eight miles distant. Here, besides a permanent wharf around the water edge of the yard, of granite, and a huge dry dock, lately completed, you have all the works and appurtenances necessary to a navy yard. The number of workmen engaged at the various shops and upon the buildings going up, indicate a profuse expenditure of Uncle Sam's money; yet even more liberal appropriations would only put the yard on a footing with those of less present importance farther north, and accelerate the completion of works necessary to its proper efficiency. Here, in one of the beautiful buildings erected for the officers, resided last year Rev. C. W. Thomas, a Methodist preacher, lately appointed chaplain in the navy. His influence was greatly promotive of the cause to which he is devoted; and many were the hours spent by your humble servant, in company with brother Watt Harris, at his hospitable house. He is now in the Jamestown, at sea; his little family in Georgia. The year, spent partly in association with two such spirits, is a bright spot in the past of a checkered life. Outside the walls two villages have grown up, Warrington and Woolsey; and just upon the boundary separating them stands the Methodist Church, a little office for the preacher by the side of it. Here brother Harris was stationed last year, and was instrumental in bringing many to Christ. Brother T. S. Abernathy, Jr., has charge this year, and thus far has been successful in winning all hearts to himself and many to the cross. An Odd Fellows' Lodge, Masonic Lodge, and an organization of the Sons of Temperance, all prospering, are valuable auxiliaries to the Church in promoting the cause of virtue and good morals.

Return now to the city of Pensacola, which nestles down below us upon the water's edge, and you may easily perceive that the commerce of the place is limited, by seeing only two wharves extending into the bay, and but few small vessels reposing here and there upon its tranquil bosom. Near the wharf, to the right, and fronting the green common, so neatly inclosed and shaded, you see the

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH,

A plain building, badly proportioned, painted the color of brown stone. The congregation is usually good, mostly women, as is generally the case in Catholic churches. The most are Spanish Creoles, among whom you find the usual varieties of human character. There are some sweet-spirited, humble followers of Jesus who worship here, who would often worship with other Christians but for the restrictive rules of the Church. Others are the incarnation of intolerance and bigotry, legitimate offsprings of an unholy creed. Nearer to us, and to the left, you see a slender spire pointing high above the surrounding buildings. That is the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Under the ministry of the present pastor's predecessor the congregation was principally built up; but care and severe study induced mental derangement, and those who had been converted through his ministry had the mortification of seeing him a complete wreck. The present pastor, Rev. J. P. Sparrow, has occupied important positions in his Church in other States, and though advanced in life, is as active and laborious as many of fewer years. He wins upon the community, and by a straight-forward, consistent course, will consolidate the Presbyterian interest here. May he be blest in his labors. The Church has a bell, the clear, loud tone of which makes our beautiful Sabbath mornings musical, and soothes the nerves of those who are subjected to the rattling of another, not much superior to an ordinary cow bell. To the right of the Presbyterian Church, on the same street, you see a spreading China tree. That overshadows one side of the

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Previous to the present pastor this Church has been served by ministers who have left an envinble name among the people of all denominations. If after your humble servant's labors have ceased his name is mentioned as kindly as are those of his predecessors, his reward will be a rich one. About twelve months since there was a gracious work in this Church, and for a time it seemed that the current of depravity, herring to destruction many noble souls, was turned back. But twelve months are gone, and some who shook and wept under the power of the Word and Spirit are deeper in their sins than before. Several were converted who are now efficient, consistant members of the Church, whilst some who professed to receive the anointing of the Spirit, find their delight among the frolicking sons and daughters of pleasure. My heart bled to see some of them lately, at a public pick-nick, in the whirl and excitement of the dance, apparently "glorying in their shame." But more saddening was it to hear older members of the Church justifying the conscience-searing practice as innocent and harmless. God deliver the Churches from such witnesses for Jesus! The church is small, of neat appearance inside, but lacks a parsonage on that beautiful lot by the side of it, owned by the trustees. We are raising money liberally for missionary and other benevolent purposes, and are gradually prospering. Beyond the Methodist, near the water's edge, you see a cupola, surmounted by a cross. That is the cupula of the

EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

A neat brick building. Since the death of Rev. Mr. Flower, in 1853, it has been without a pastor. This excellent man, who served the congregation but a few months, was cut off by yellow fever, followed by his wife, then his child, and finally his servant. An entire family laid away within a month, after so short a residence! The poetry have recently called Rev. Dr. Scott, who has accepted, and will enter upon his duties soon. He has once been pastor of the Church; is said to be, "after the most straightest sect," a Churchman; though none the less acceptable to the majority of his congregation on that account. May he come full of faith and the Holy Ghost, and prophecy unto the dry bones in this valley, for they are "very dry!" Across the street, towards us, stands a plain frame building, unfinished inside. That is the

BAPTIST CHURCH.

Without a pastor. A large congregation of negroes worship here of Sunday afternoons, who are supervised by a devoted and faithful member of the Baptist Church. May he be rewarded in this life and that to come.

I have kept you here long enough, I reckon, so we will return by way of which lies out in that beautiful grove of live oak to our left, about a half a mile. You see the cross over the gate, denoting it a Roman Catholic burying ground. Upon the right, as you enter, you see the part consecrated for the dead of that communion, whilst to the left the protestants are buried. The division is not strictly regarded, however. If you will walk through, especially to the right, you will be struck at the number of epitaphs recording the names of very old persons, ranging from 85 to 100. A little more regularity would add to the appearance of the yard; yet you perceive great care and neatness about most of the graves. Upon some, the flowers, symbolizing so beautifully the mournful remembrance of bereaved ones, are hardly allowed to wither before they are replaced; and the neatness of some of the tomb stones indicates the delicacy of taste which selected them. Here I have performed the last sad services over the graves of the infant, the youth, the middle-aged and the old; the last, a few days since, a man upon whose head old age had dropped her flakes of snow, and at whose loss the hearts of the community were stricken. Long has he been a shining light here. His aged partner lingers behind, I hope, at last to have a sweet and peaceful passage from a world of cloud and darkness to one where "shines perpetual day." Here, at last, we will all be left to sleep, and here I will leave you for the present, to muse upon the solemn fact that the grave awaits us all.

THE CEMETERY,

J. H. COTTRELL.

Pensacola, Fla., May 15, 1855.

VICKSBURG AND SHREVEPORT RAILROAD.

The subjoined cheering intelligence, taken from the Shreveport Democrat, of the 10th inst., we publish with pleasure. It indicates a satisfactory state of affairs in regard to the prospects and progress of this necessary, great, and vitally important public improvement. Notwithstanding the difficulties the Directory have had to encounter—which at first seemed almost insurmountable—an arrangement has been arrived at which promises the most auspicious results at an early day. In relation to the details of this arrangement, we have already given the particulars.

But, to the article from the Shreveport Democrat:

Dr. R. G. Young, the able and indefatigable President of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad Company, reached here on Monday evening last, and remained until the next morning. We did not see him, but understand that he obtained the right of way from the planters, from one end of the road to the other, and this too, without the cost of a cent to the company. Persons owning plantations near the Mississippi river, whose land is worth from $50 to $75 per acre, freely and cheerfully gave the right of way, and signed an obligation to that effect. This is as it should be, and is an augury of certain success.

The contractors, Messrs. Pannle & Co., of Georgia, will have two hundred hands at work as soon as they can get them here from Georgia, and as soon thereafter as possible, they will have eight hundred. Sub contracts have already been let to responsible parties, and it is thought that the larger portion of the work can be let out in this way. The contractors design building the eight miles through the Red river swamp, as soon as possible, and also the part running through the Mississippi swamp, in order to connect with a line of stages. Thus the work goes bravely on.

Senator Toombs of Georgia has probably ere this left for Europe, to purchase the iron for the road. It is the intention, as soon as it arrives, to lay down on the portion of the road already graded near Vicksburg, in order to have it ready for the cars early next fall.

The greatest enthusiasm in reference to the work prevails, not only along the line, but in the city of New Orleans. The city will readily take the $100,000 of stock, promised sometime since by some of her leading citizens. If this is done, it will somewhat atone for her past indifference to the enterprise.

We are glad to learn that "the greatest enthusiasm" prevails along the line in favor of the road. We hope it will continue to prevail, and to increase, until the road is successfully completed. Nothing would or could afford us greater satisfaction. The road will be of immense advantage to the country through which it passes—will open to the hand of cultivation millions of acres of as fertile lands as the dews of heaven ever descended upon—will add vastly to the aggregate wealth of the State—will contribute largely to its revenues, now becoming inadequate to meet the expenditures of the times—and will pour upon our wharves a stream of trade that will do much towards dispelling the dullness and despondency that now reigns from one extremity of the city to the other.

Whether any stock will be taken in this city, we are unable to say. We should like much to see our wealthy men embarking in an undertaking which promises so much. But, the city, as a city, can do nothing. It can bear no more burthens. It has as much, if not more, than it can carry. The country should aid it, instead of its aiding the country. It cannot, now, afford to indulge in the luxury of enthusiasm in favor of anything, and can only hope, by the most prudent, skillful and economical management, to steer clear of the difficulties that now environ her on every hand. THE LATE EMPEROR NICHOLAS.—Dr. Mandt, the physician who attended the Czar Nicholas in his last illness, has published a circumstantial account of the closing scenes of the monarch's life. "At ten minutes past 3," says the Doctor, "he asked me, after I had mentioned the name of his father-confessor, 'Must I than die?' I answered 'Yes, Sire.' Not a muscle of his face moved, not the quickening of a pulse tion. 'How,' said he, 'can you find the courage thus to doom me to death—to tell me so to my face?'

'First,' said I, 'by so doing I fulfill a promise made to you a year and a half ago; the moment of which you then spoke to me, alas! has come; moreover, I thus fulfill a duty to the Emperor. You have several hours to live; you are in full possession of your faculties, and can direct them at your will; at least I believe so. Lastly, Sire, I love you, and this is not the moment to conceal the truth, which I am sure you can bear to hear.' His countenance became serene, and he stretched out his hand, saying 'I thank you!' Such was the Emperor.

When Bonaparte's army were lying in camp, previous to the battle of Waterloo, they bitterly complained of their rations, especially the bread. However, they put up with it as long as they could, when a few men, more daring than wolfish, went to the quarters of the attached Commissariat General, and told him: "If you don't give us better rations we will hang you!"

The astonished contractor immediately sought an interview with the Emperor, and told him what had passed.

"Did my men say that?" said Napoleon.

"They did, Sire," replied the General.

"Well, my friend, I am certainly very sorry for you," said the Emperor; for, if they said so, they will certainly do it."

The Boston Transcript says it is not improbable that the whole doings at Roxbury will be the subject of legal investigation, and that all the gentlemen who visited the Catholic School will have an opportunity to defend themselves before a jury.

Chicago still continues its wonderful career of expansion. A recent number of the Times says that every house in the city is full, and that rents have gone up to enormous rates. Since the 1st of May the increase of rents is stated to have been twenty-five, seventy-five, and even one hundred per cent, a story which seems rather fabulous, but may nevertheless be correct, as all the lines of travel leading westward are crowded with travelers and emigrants.

The sub-marine cable from Cape Katerge, in Bulgaria, to the monastery of St. George, in the Crimea, lies a length of three hundred and one miles across the bottom of the Black Sea. It was laid down on the 10th, 12th and 13th of last month.

Drs. Wm. McMillen and Wm. R. Thrall left Columbus, Ohio, on the 11th instant, with the intention of visiting Russia and entering the service of the Emperor as surgeons.

Geo. W. Foster, a printer from Harrisburg, Pa., was drowned a few days ago near Clavasend, Ohio.

LATIN.—"Because we ventered last week," says an exchange paper, "to introduce a few Latin words into a paragraph, just to make a little show of our knowledge, a cotemporary quotes Latin et ne in a most ferocious manner. He says 'Nihil fit.' Who is Nihil? Who did he fight, and what did he fight for?"

General Intelligence.

Louisiana.

The Shreveport Democrat of the 10th inst., says:

The weather is cloudy and cool; some prospect of rain (the stand of cotton is said not to be good, otherwise the crop is said to be doing well considering the drought.

The river is still receding. Small boats get along with difficulty. On Wednesday night of last week there was a heavy rain in several of the eastern counties of Texas, extending as far north as Hempstead county, Arkansas. On Wednesday night last there was another rain in the same direction, extending somewhat into this parish.

The Southwestern says:

Our planters continue their complaints in regard to the backwardness of the young cotton. It is dying for the want of rain. Corn, however, is much more promising than could be expected.

We learn from the Farmerville Enquirer that Sam had made his appearance in that town, and stayed long enough to elect a Mayor, Mr. James O. Dawson, and four Aldermen. The Enquirer has the following:

Since our last issue we have had almost all sorts of weather, dry and warm, then cloudy with every indication of rain, to last it did drop a few drops just to show us that it could rain if it wanted to, but then "it didn't want to, and we are rejoicing in clouds of dust, and now it is so cold that fire is needed morning and evenings.

We hear of very little complaint about crops. Corn looks as yet green and flourishing, and cotton little and coming on.

The Alexandria Democrat, of the 16th, says:

Rain fell on Sunday last in some portions of the parish. On Bayou Rouff we hear of a substantial shower, of a pretty general character. In the upper end of the parish, and along the river, the benefit from this source was meagre. But a few drops fell. We want a steady, powerful rain of ten or twelve hours duration, to give us good hopes for the crops. Nothing short of this will be effectual.

The river has fallen rapidly within the last few days, and the water is still receding. We have now "regular built" low water navigation, and shippers must have a bad time of it in future.

The Homer (Claiborne) Advocate says no rain has fallen in that region since the 5th of April.

MISSISSIPPI.—The city of Vicksburg was lighted with gas for the first time on Wednesday night last.

We learn from the Brandon Platform that a negro man was killed a few days ago by the cars on the railroad between that place and Jackson. It was thought he had purposely placed himself upon the track.

From the Canton Citizen we extract the following:

Since our last the clouds have made several desperate efforts to drop rain, but only partially succeeded twice—on Monday night and Wednesday morning—and then only a lazy sprinkle. Since the last demonstration referred to, the weather has been so cool, night and morning, as to render winter clothing, and even fire, necessary for comfort. In this section the corn crops are doing well, notwithstanding the drought; but the growth of the cotton plant, even where a stand is obtained, is greatly retarded in its efforts are enormously high, the times are tight, and things generally very dry, and we are all waiting, rather impatiently, for a "moving of the waters," and the "good time coming."

The whaleship Zone, at New Bedford, from Pacific Ocean, reports speaking lat. 16 45 S., lon. 34 25 W., English ship Matouka, 33 days from Liverpool for New South Wales, with 262 unmerried female passengers.

We find in the Fort Adams Item, the following paragraph:

The somewhat notorious Steely, who murdered Wm. Pitt, (in Natchez parish, La.,) and for whom a reward of $600 was offered, was captured by T. J. Blythe, on the 6th inst., near the mouth of Black River, and was taken on board the steamer W. W. Farmer to Harrisonburg. This fellow is an old offender!

The Emperor of the French made himself quite at home in England, and one of his acts there seems to be an anticipation of the destiny in which he so confidently trusts. He dated a decree at "Windsor Castle." The Prefect who received it exclaimed: "This is a la Napoleon! This is not the last of the Emperor's decrees from the British capital!" Nothing was better calculated to gratify the national feeling of the French than this Napoleon assumption. It is evidently a little mortifying to the English press, which treats it as a theatrical flourish, as it truly is, but it befits the part which the ex-policeman is in play in the great drama of his own production. There is now no doubt that his next decree will be from Constantinople. Whether he will be able soon to date another from Sebastopol is a question.

ARKANSAS.—The Van Buren Intelligencer, of the 11th, has the following:

The river—too low for navigation, and no prospect for a rise.

On Thursday, the 21 inst., Mr. Milford Gunner was brutally murdered on his own premises, in this county. He was struck on the back part of his head twice, with some sharp instrument, and stabbed in the left side. It is supposed the murder was committed by Indians. The house was entered, two trunks broken open, and one carried off with its contents.

COL. KINNEY'S SECOND ARREST.—New York, May 15.—A warrant having been issued in the United States District Court at Philadelphia for the arrest of Col Kinney, that gentleman went to Philadelphia last night.

PHILADELPHIA, May 15.—Col Kinney was brought before Judge Kane, of the United States District Court, this afternoon, and held in $4,000 security to answer the charge of violating the neutrality laws, by fitting out a vessel in this district to act against Nicaragua. It is alleged that the vessel is at this port, all ready to sail, with ammunition, stores and three hundred men. Bail in the amount named was entered by Mr Presbury, of the Girard House.

Hon. George M. Dallas appeared as counsel for Col. Kinney.

AVALANCHE IN THE PYRENNES—Sixty Persons Killed.—The inhabitants of Carejan, in the Pyrenees, on the Spanish side of the frontier, seeing some weeks ago that an avalanche of snow was about to fall, assembled in houses which they thought the least exposed to danger. Unfortunately the snow came down on those very houses leaving almost untouched several others which had been abandoned. By the fall fourteen houses and forty-four barns were completely destroyed. Seventy-two persons were buried in the ruins, and sixty of them were killed on the spot. The remaining twelve, though got out alive, were so dreadfully injured that some of them died soon after, and others were considered in a desperate state. The loss of cattle was very considerable.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.—An able article in the last number of the Westminster Review upon the Constitutions and Governments of the various countries of the Earth, says that it "is no longer England—but the North American Republic, that has become the pole-star to which, from all sides, the eye of struggling nations turns." A significant admission to come from an English source.

MISSISSIPPI CENTRAL RAILROAD.—We learn that Mr. Green, the chief engineer of this road, expresses very confidently the opinion that by the 4th of July next, the cars will be running to Holly Springs. On the 1st of January next the contractors will commence laying down the rails from Holly Springs in the direction of Oxford, and at the same time from Canton in the direction of Lexington. On the 1st day of April next, saving accidents, the Central Railroad will be in operation from Memphis to Oxford; thus bringing us within a day's travel of one of the most beautiful and flourishing villages of Mississippi. [Memphis Appeal.

The Cincinnati Gazette gives the following particulars of the recent terrible locomotive explosion near Seymour, Indiana:

The locomotive was totally blown to fragments. A piece of the boiler, weighing a ton, was thrown 178 paces, and other heavy pieces, in different directions, nearly as far. The engineer, Jefferson Harris, was thrown to the right about 200 feet, through the branches of a tree, as indicated by the fragments of his clothes hanging to the limbs. The fireman, Thomas Oalvin, was thrown 130 feet to the left, and so mangled as to be scarcely recognizable. A person sitting on the tender was badly injured. Six of the cars and their contents were thrown in different directions, and the track was torn up a considerable distance.

There are now at the Brooklyn yard fourteen vessels—war ships, store ships, etc.—namely, the North Carolina (receiving ship), frigates Congress, Sabine (new), Niagara (on the stocks), and Brandywine; steam frigate Mississippi, surveying steamer Vixen; sloop Levant (just arrived from the Mediterranean); storeships Supply, Southampton, Relief and Lexington; bark Erie, sailing for the search after Dr. Kane, in the Arctic Ocean, and the propeller City of Boston, purchased for the same expedition, but condemned as too large for that service.

LOUISIANA.—The Opelousas (La.) Patriot of Saturday last has the following paragraphs:

Since our last issue, we had a very general and refreshing rain, which did incalculable benefit to the crops. The earth was so dry however, that its effects have passed away, and we are experiencing the drouth in all of its severity. The progress of vegetation, therefore, is very slow, and the prospects of the planters still gloomy. As for navigation, we have seen—large alligators even finding it difficult to navigate the Courtableau in the neighborhood of Washington. We therefore discontinue the arrivals and departures of the boats, the Alice W Gisloe being now the only one in the trade, and she not likely to get above Port Barre hereafter.

GRAND COTEAU.—This village having been made a town with corporate authorities by the last Legislature, an election was held there on Wednesday last, for five Trustees or Councilmen, which resulted, as we are informed, in no choice. A protest has been entered against certificates being given the successful candidates, based upon charges of illegal voting and the count of a blank. It is likely the whole election will be declared null.

JOHN, ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.—The promised letter of Archbishop Hughes upon the church property law, and the statements made in the newspaper controversy growing out of it, appears in the New York papers of the 15th. The document, the most striking feature of which we take to be a complaint against the type founders, makes rather more than three columns of 8as type in the Herald, and, as it was written with the avowed intention of utterly "crushing out" Senator Brooks, we suppose there is very little left of that audacious gentleman. Here is the complaint alluded to above, which, it will be found, winds up by administering a sharp rap to certain legislative knuckles:

"It is customary throughout nearly all Christendom for a Catholic Bishop to prefix the sign of the Cross to his signature. Most of the editors just now referred to, and who have been fredricating public opinion, for the New York Express, seem to be too poor in the resources of their printing offices to possess any type which would represent the symbol of Christianity, and, as the next substitute thereto, or rather in ridicule thereof, they have adopted the symbol of the assassin—the dagger. They imagine, apparently, that this substitute will make tremendous havoc on the reputation of Archbishop Hughes. But they seem to forget that the sign of the Cross is the sign of man's redemption; that symbol in which St. Paul gloried, and the symbol which, when represented by a dagger, they are giving over to the scandal of youth, the ridicule of the infidel and the scoffer at Christianity. And yet our type founders are not surely so barren of ingenuity as not to be able to invent some thing outside of the alphabet which would give a grave and decent idea of the sign of the Cross. Every civilized nation is familiar with symbolic language. Nor are we, as a people, at all deficient in this respect, with the single exception which I have just mentioned. Outside the alphabet we have our symbolic type to represent, for instance, a section of railway, a steam engine, a tree, a house, a stray horse, or a runaway negro. In fact, we have in our printing offices symbolic type for almost every thing except the sign of the Cross. Surely it can not be that our printers are so excessively American, according to the late and improved sense of that term, that they reject the sign of the Cross, because it is symbolical a foreign religion. Alas, if all Americans were like some of our modern legislators, Christianity—the thing symbolized, as well as its type—would be foreign enough."

MISSISSIPPI.—Affray in Vicksburg.—The Vicksburg Sentinel of Saturday last has the following paragraph:

An affray occurred at the Prentiss House in this city on Thursday evening between Mr Moore and Mr Brown, clerk of the House, in which Mr. B was severely, though not dangerously wounded. An examination was had before the Mayor, which resulted in the acquittal of Mr. M.

The Vicksburg Whig says:

We made a short trip up the river a few days since, and had a very good opportunity of examining many of the crops on both sides of the river. We found the stand of cotton worse than we had anticipated, even after the long drouth. On many of the plantations a large portion of the cotton had not come up as yet, and even where it was up the stand was not very good. On every plantation the injurious effects of the drouth were very visible. The corn crop has suffered on all plantations for the want of rain, and only on a few places did we see what could be called a good prospect. There was, however, a fine rain, on Saturday night and Sunday morning last, from about thirty miles above this place to as far up as we went, about one hundred miles, and the planters were greatly cheered up and encouraged by it. More, however, is needed by this time. From Milliken's Bend, about twenty-five miles above here, down to this place, there was a moderate rain at the same time.

Mr. Levi L. Lum, charged before the U. S. District Court, at Jackson, with abstracting money from the mails, in the post-office of that city, has been acquitted on each of the indictments preferred against him.

RIVER MAILS.—The Memphis Whig is informed that the Illinois Railroad Company have received the contract for carrying a daily mail between Cairo and New Orleans, at the rate of $150,000 per annum. This Company have contracted for the building of nine of the largest first class passenger packets, with low pressure engines, which are to make the run from New Orleans to Cairo inside of three days. The company will, no doubt, put a line of good steamers on at once, to run in connection with their extensive railroad, as the travel northward by this route during the summer will be very great.

UNFORTUNATE ACCIDENT.—We learn from a passenger by the Central road, last evening, that a man by the name of Dean was accidentally shot by his brother, not far from Bloomington, yesterday morning. It appears that the two were out on a turkey hunt together, in which they made use of the usual dwell of "mocking." One attracted by the mocking of the other, and believing it to proceed from the game of which he was in search, fired and killed his brother upon the spot. [Savannah Georgian, 14th.

SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF LIFE.—The London papers have a dispatch from Memel, stating that the steamer Densig, of Densig, from Stettin, with about eighty five Belgian passengers and a crew of eight hands, in taking the bar, on the 17th ult., struck and sunk, and only two passengers were saved.

On the 13th about a bushel of Spanish pistareens, silver, tied up in bags, were found beneath the floor of an old house which was being torn down down in New York. Some newsboys and others took advantage of the discovery and filled their pockets, but the police drove them away and took possession of the remainder, which were deposited in one of the station houses. It was thought that a close inspection would prove them to be spurious, as it was known that a gang of counterfeiters had formerly occupied the place.

OLD BULLION ASSESSED FOR DAMAGES.—The Chandler suit of Birch vs Thos. H. Benton was decided on the 11th inst., in the Henry county (Mo.) Circuit Court, after a trial of four days, by the rendition of a verdict of $4000 damages for plaintiff. An appeal to the Supreme Court was taken.

On the 2d instant, at Chicago, a quarrel arose, between some Irishmen and Karl Vardiland Audiebrem, in the saloon of the latter, and one of the former, named John McCarthy, was shot dead with a pistol.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1855.

Health of the City.

Thursday we visited the Charity Hospital, to feel the pulse of the city. Through the courteous attention of Dr. Baldwin we were shown the premises, from porch to dead-house. In the latter gloomy abode were only six bodies, on the coffin-lids of which were marked, in lampblack, 15—— thousand and something.

Dr. Baldwin, whose official and professional connection with the institution affords reliable information, told us of a case of yellow fever that was treated in the hospital a fortnight ago—the only one this year. The patient died of black vomit. He was a Canadian, though six months in the South, and cook on a steamboat. After being sick, first on the boat, then at his boarding house, he was sent to the hospital on a Monday, and died the following Saturday.

We took pains to look into the matter, as exaggerated rumor had gone abroad, and our friends in the country would like to know the state of the case.

There were 519 patients in the hospital; an average number when no epidemic prevails. About half a dozen cases of cholera had been treated this spring, though there was no case in hospital on Thursday. We have heard of some cases in private practice. The largest cisterns are low, the most empty. Using bad water, or changing from rain to river water, may be the cause of this. If so, the cause will disappear with a good shower.

Quarantine goes into operation first of next month.

Our Correspondents.

We give way to them. Though we had somewhat to say, we go in company with the authors of rejected articles.

The letter from Franklin, La., might with propriety be put under Revival intelligence, though the writer sets out by stating there is no revival. Well, there are the fruits of it. It is substantial prosperity. We would that the like was going on all over the Conference.

Brother Finley lets us know exactly from what point the Macedonian cry comes.

Dr. Young, who, to the great benefit of the enterprise and the highest satisfaction of his elders and friends, has been unanimously elected President of the Shreveport and Vicksburg Railroad, writes a sadly entertaining letter.

So ready and catholic spirited a writer as Cottrell is as refreshing as the shadow of one of his live oaks.

Thank God for revival news.

THE SABBATH.—A resolution passed the Board of Aldermen of New Orleans last week, which indicates a growing respect for the Sabbath. It came from the Lower Board, giving permission to Mons. Godard to make balloon ascensions from Congo Square, but was amended by the body first named so as to exclude the Sabbath.

The open-air congregation last Sabbath evening was two or three times larger than usual. The Presiding Elder preached.

NEW ORLEANS GROCSHOPS.—The "Consolidated Association" were defeated; and that in a style which indicates future defeat—before Judge Augustin. An appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court.

A test suit of the city of New Orleans vs. John A. Straiger, for the recovery of $315 as a license for retailing spirituous liquors, was tried in the Fifth District Court, and a verdict was returned by the jury in favor of the city for the full amount claimed. This case decides about four hundred others which were pending before Judge Augustin. Besides the amount of their license, the coffee-house keepers will be mulcted in costs to a considerable extent.

Our Reform Council, we think, will soon make their measures felt. Public opinion and law are backing them up.

DR. J. BOGGS.—We had the pleasure, a month ago, of spending a Sabbath in Atlanta, Ga., and were happy to meet this estimable man and Christian minister, who resides there, like Luke, in the character of the "beloved physician." Besides the labor of a large and growing practice, Dr. B. preaches in one of the Methodist churches, and is a professor in the Atlanta Medical College, which opened on the 7th inst., with a class of over fifty students.

DR. THWEATT.—His numerous friends will read under our obituary column of his heavy bereavement. Their profound sympathy and confidence he has.

A Succession!—Bishop Whitehouse has intimated to the clergy and vestries of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Illinois that he intends to resign his office. Among other reasons for the step, he says "that he is not adapted to the present social and moral Wes"

Missions in South America.

The Methodist station in Buenos Ayres is supporting itself. It has a membership of 82; Sunday scholars, 196; pastor's salary, $1000. The pastor, Mr. Carro[illegible]es to the Board:

"Their liberality in support of the mission would, if you could know all the facts in relation to their pecuniary circumstances, excite your surprise and admiration. Their interest in behalf of the Sunday school is truly refreshing to behold; it is, indeed, such as I never witnessed in any of the most approved Churches in my own dear native land."

The Presbyterian Board are moving to establish a post in Bogota, the capital of New Grenada—a republic now open to all creeds. We trust our own operations may be advanced in this interesting quarter of the Continent. It is an open door that would have made Paul have no rest in his spirit. Are not some of our young men, in college and out of them, ready to offer themselves to the Bishop who has the initiating of this work in charge?

Decaying churches and evidences of past failure in those regions are not evil anguries. Most of the traces of mission civilization have been obliterated in many of the South American States, because they were based on a system of cruelty and wrong. Here and there are imposing and massive structures still standing, in defiance of the assaults of time and the elements, as melancholy monuments of the groans and life-blood of thousands destroyed in their innocency by a system of faith as corrupt as could be generated by the basest of human passions, mingling with the passions of the world below.

In the Roman Catholic missions of Caroni, South America, where the Franciscan monks once had twenty-two mission stations, and over 30,000 Christian Indians, as soonor did these good Christians see their holy fathers in God deserted by their civil rulers, than, filled with the memories of wrongs they had endured, they rose in their might, hurled their oppressors from power in tumult and bloodshed, and destroyed churches, monasteries and villages, leaving the ruins only to mark the location of once flourishing towns.

A Call to Prayer.

Rev. Thos. Lynch writes from Dover, Ala., May 15, and proposes a remedy for the woes of drought, more excellent than Prof. Espy's theory or Engineer Blanchards. Elijah was a man of like passions as we, and yet "the clouds of heaven hung their keys at his girdle:"

"A week or two ago you published some account of the drought, and a suggestion of a remedy (building large fires all over the country simultaneously). I wish you would urge upon the people the duty of praying for rain. We really need it very much, and there is no other means that would be so efficient. In this part of the country we have not had as much rain since last September as we often have in one week in the spring of the year. The wells and springs and branches are going dry. Unless there is a change in a few weeks, our hopes of a crop will be gone for this year.

I have looked in every paper hoping to see a suggestion of the only efficient remedy, but I have not found it."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL VISITOR.—The first number of this paper is on our table, and a beautiful little paper it is. We know of nothing better calculated to please the little folks. It is rich in engravings and rich in reading matter. Many a bright eye will sparkle and many a little heart be made happy by its visits.

Price single copy twenty-five cents. By the one hundred copies, at eighteen cents.

OUR FAST DAY.—Rev. C. J. Halberg writes from near Lake Providence, La., 17th:

"We have had an unusually severe drought this spring, which, with the failure of the grain crop last year, causes great suffering among the poor. Crops are backward now, but we are looking for better times. Our Fast Day (May 1st) was generally attended to on my circuit. We had quite a profitable season at the appointment where I met."

We see the statement in several exchanges that Dr. C. B. Parsons has resigned his ministry in Louisville, to officiate at the Independent Methodist Church of Cincinnati, at a salary of $2,500.

AGENCIES—There is a tendency to multiply them beyond a healthful point. The pastorate has great legitimate breadth of operation. The New York Observer states it as a great fact that the Presbytorian Board of Foreign Missions has dispensed wholly with the aid of collecting agents during the past year, and in spite of the almost universal decrease in the receipts of other societies, the income of the Board has actually advanced beyond any former year.

THAYER.—Rev. A. A. Jimeson, M. D., of the Independent Methodist Church of Cincinnati, has united with the Cincinnati Synod of the New School Presbyterian Church. Rev. Moses P. Jimeson, of the Wesley Chapel charge, and brother of Dr. Jimeson, last week united with the same Synod.

Dr. Sam'l Bard, of Lake Providence, La., has also been ordained a minister in the New School. The two brothers had just written books on Sanctification and the articles of religion of the M. E Church.

New Publications.

ENGLISH, PAST AND PRESENT, by Trench. Redfield: New York, 1855.

This work follows, with good preparation in taste and materials, the "Study of Words." A study worthy of a scholar and full of exciting interest; for, to use his description:

"Language is the amber in which a thousand precious thoughts have been safely embedded and preserved. It has arrested ten thousand lightning flashes of genius, which, unless thus fixed and arrested, might have been as bright, but would have also been as quickly passing and perishing as the lightning. Words convey the mental treasures of one period to the generations that follow; and laden with this their precious freight, they sail safely across gulfs of time in which empires have suffered shipwreck, and the languages of common life have sunk into oblivion."

Yet some of them have suffered shipwreck, and new ones have been launched. Trench shows the sources from which the English vocabulary has derived its main additions, the periods when these additions were most numerous, and the character of them. He gives this distinctive definition between languages living and dead: "A living language is one in which a vital, formative energy is still at work; a dead language is one in which this has ceased."

His quotations from DeQuincy greatly enrich the volume. The rapid evolution language is undergoing is astonishing. Within an ordinary sweep of memory, words are coming into and going out of use. For instance, one is surprised to discover how late an introduction the word "its" proves to be. Through the whole of our authorized version of the Bible "its" does not once occur; the work which it now performs being accomplished, as our rustics would now accomplish it, by "his" or "her" applied as freely to inanimate things as to persons, or else by "thereof," or "of it." Trench remarks that "its" occurs but three times in all Shakspeare, and he doubts whether Milton has once admitted it into Paradise Lost.

A full "index of words" is appended. We have the book through T. L. White, Canal street.

ARMAGEDDON, by Rev. S. D. Baldwin, A. M. of Tennessee Conference. Applegate, Cincinnati; Stevenson & Owen, Nashville: 1855, 8vo., pp. 480.

Our corresponhent "H. P." has something to say on it. Mr. Baldwin thinks the United States a subject of distinct and glorious prophecy, and adduces many striking coincidences. Here is one we do not remember anywhere to have seen; holding high ground for our country as the mountain of the Lord's house, "established in the top of the mountains:"—Isaiah, 2:2:

"America is the only country on earth that can by possibility lay any claim to the national capital of the globe. The researches of Lieut. Maury have demonstrated that, by wind and wave, it is down stream from our country to all the world; and that all nations must ascend to reach it. With an ocean on either hand, its power descends with celerity to every country on the sphere; and that, too, from the deepest interior of our territory."

The author, with that veteran of many wars, Rev. F. E. Pitts, has taken the stump in favor of his book. We have not studied it, but shall be forced to, such a clamor has it raised. For sale at Nashville.

Other books on hand, will be noticed next week.

TWO COLLEGES IN ALABAMA.

Oxford and Cambridge—Auburn and Greensboro'

MR. EDITOR:—Our last Conference resolved that we must have a male college in South Alabama; and to insure its excellence, if it should be built at all, required a subscription of $100,000 to begin with. It seems likely to turn out that we shall have the necessary sum given by two different places Now the location of the college at either place, to the exclusion of the other, will just be a clear loss to the cause of education in the Methodist Church of $100,000. Again, a college at either of the rival places would not meet the wants of half the Conference territory as respects eligibility, accessibility, &c, because there are other institutions more convenient. We have, then, in favor of two colleges, the wants of the country and the means with which to build them. In addition to this, it might be said that East and West Alabama are so divided, geographically and socially, that they could not be fully united in patronizing any single point; and, further, that still larger means might be raised at each point, provided a college had been located there.

Two obstructions, only, rise to this course. One, a want of power in the locating commission; the other, the supposed interests of the institution.

The first may be obviated in several ways. But, according to the terms of the subscription for one of the places, at least, there would be no difficulty, because there subscriptions are made to a Methodist college, to be located at Greensboro', &c.

As to the interests of education, there is no doubt in the mind of the writer that two colleges would succeed better than one, for both are demanded by the wants of the country, and the emulation between them would be just of that kind which would promote the interests of both. And as in the case of the English universities, we may have two noble and fraternal institutions mutually sustaining and helping each other. UNION.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

FRANKLIN, LA., May 15, 1855.

Although we are not enjoying a revival season at this time, (which we greatly regret, and for which we are praying and laboring,) there are signs of spiritual life on our work.

Since Conference we have exchanged our parsonage, which you know was inconveniently located and too small, for a comfortable residence joining our church lot. We paid one thousand dollars in cash between the two places. This sum was raised with but little effort among our friends, by a direct appeal to their Christian liberality, without the aid of the mirth-exciting appliances such as are sometimes resorted to by Churches to raise funds. We are now comfortably housed, and our successors on this delightful work provided for almost in a style to tempt a city preacher!

One of our planters, brother Joseph Night, who is a local preacher, has erected a good house for the colored people of his neighborhood to worship in, and preaches to them once every other Sabbath; and Bro. Pinkney Bethel is preparing to build a house conveniently situated in reference to his three plantations meeting together, not only for preaching, but for social worship generally. The ladies of Pattersonville connected with our Church are also moving in reference to Church improvement. Our house of worship there does not belong exclusively to us, nor is the lot eligible in point of size or location; but we must use it until we can build; so they have taken the matter in hand, and you know that failure does not attend female effort in such enterprises. They will carpet the altar, matt the aisle, and whitewash the inside of the church; purchase lamps and improve the seats. This is all the house needs to make it comfortable. We have added Centreville to the list of our regular preaching places, have a good congregation as to size, and very attentive, and we are sowing "the seed of the Kingdom" in hope. We are suffering for rain greatly in this parish, but more for grace.

N. A. CRAVENS.

ANDERSON COUNTY, TEXAS, May 5, 1855.

Let it be kept constantly before the preachers in the older Conferences that Texas, East Texas in particular, has not received her quantum of ministerial aid. The harvest is great and the laborers are few.

The Texas Conference is much better supplied with preachers than East Texas. This has grown out of the fact that most of the transfers to Texas have been to that Conference, and that has been the result, doubtless, of an impression which, though erroneous, was natural, that East Texas having been settled first, and much more densely than the West, was not so strictly a missionary field, and our good brethren, burning with missionary zeal, in a spirit of noble daring, not content to build upon others' foundation, did not cease until they found themselves front of the enemy. God bless them; and may their heaven-born prowess be equal to every emergency. More preachers would doubtless be acceptable and thankfully received by the Texas Conference, but, Mr. Editor, the call from the East is long, loud, and urgent. One of our chief standard bearers, Rev. O. Fisher, has been called to California, and another has strangely withdrawn from the connection, while several others were superannuated at the last Conference. These drafts would scarcely be felt in some older Conferences, but they are both felt and deplored here.

Mr. Editor, Texas is not only the largest, but the most fertile and inviting of any State in this confederacy, and the increasing tide of emigration promises to people it speedily with an enterprising population; and shall not the Church keep pace with the growth and improvements of the country? The Church is greatly in arrears in the part of the country in which my lot has fallen, owing mainly, I think, to the scarcity of preachers. Anderson county, for instance, has only two preachers appointed to it. One fills the Palestine station, and the other the circuit, while there is but one local preacher within its bounds.

Upon the return of the Sabbath day, however bright and lovely, the melancholy reflection that not more than from one to three pulpits are filled by Methodist preachers throughout our extensive county must cast a gloom upon the feelings.

As to class meetings, Mr. Editor, I have not heard of one being held. One reason assigned for their entire neglect in some places is, that most of the houses of worship are built for the public, and are occupied by other denominations.

But I commenced this article for the purpose of saying to the preachers of the Alabama Conference, particularly to the young men not encumbered with families, or if with families, those families small, that here is a most inviting field, on which you may try your prowess, and test the mettle of your "Jerusalem blades." Here laurels may be won that will deck the brow before an assembled universe and the Judge of all. Not, however, without much self-denial and continued toil. But who was ever immortalized by sailing on a smooth sea, or glorified by bearing arms in times of peace?

Brethren, what will bring out the latent powers of the mind and soul, and make you skillful and mighty through God to the pulling down of the strongholds of darkness?

ANSWER: Leave your Conference, that's full to overflowing, where you literally jostle one another, and launch out in obedience to your call and commission where revolution is to be achieved, where the enemy is to be met and vanquished, and eternal glory won.

R. S. FINLEY.

MARSHALL, TEXAS, May 10, 1855.

Again I have just crossed the northern part of the State of Louisiana. No rain yet. But there is still hope of a crop. There are good stands of corn, and it is looking well; but in the river and swamp parishes cotton is dying, and in the uplands west of Ouachita, and in Caddo and the eastern counties of Texas, much of the cotton planted has not come up. The country is generally healthy, even in the swamp districts. In Madison parish a negro boy went to put me in the road. I asked him if he had good health living there. "Oh, yes, Massa, I has excellent health here; I never has but juet two spells of fever in year. 'Long in the spring I has a little touch of the chills, and then in the fall I generally has a reverent 'tack of fever, and that's all; 'cept sometimes long in the winter I has a spell of the pneumonia. See I has excellent health here, Massa. I has no cause to complain." And he had the pronunciation of the last named disease as pat as any young doctor in your city. There is great scarcity of provisions everywhere through North Louisiana, and in the region between Bœuff and Mason rivers it is threatening absolute starvation. There are many families who are entirely destitute, have no bread of any kind, nor any meat. They get some game and wild cattle, and for bread they eat Bamboo root. If a thousand bushels of corn could be landed at Milliken's Bend, and hauled to Mr. Purvis's, on the Mason, and as much more sent up the Ouachita and hauled from Monroe to Bœuff river, and from these two points distributed to the poor, it would save some of them from starving to death. Your city has generously sent means to the Northern cities and feed to starving Ireland. "The Greeks are now at your door." May the Lord open the hearts of his children to send relief to the suffering poor, and sanctify this dispensation to all. C. G. Y.

RETROSPECT OF A VISIT TO PRATTVILLE, IN 1850.

At a midnight hour, when sleep refused its balmy influence to my restless mind, I arose and lighted the lamp, in order to relieve an excited imagination by putting on paper recollections of the past. My thoughts clustered around a spacious mansion, situated on a gentle elevation, looking towards that glorious orb that gilds the eastern horizon when slumbering nature is aroused to action.

At such an hour have I stood in the portico of that abode of peace, happiness and hospitality, and viewed with enraptured vision the enchantment of the scene before me. On either side a sloping lawn of emerald beauty, shaded by lofty trees, relieves the eye amid the dazzling brightness of the sun's rays as they pierce the waters of a jetting fountain, converting its sparkling drops into the brilliancy of diamonds. Surrounding these are shrubs and flowers of choice selection, and evergreens to cheer the dreariness of winter. Further on is seen a placid sheet of water, reflecting on its bosom its verdant banks, and the adjacent buildings of a flourishing village, spreading off in cottage-like habitations for the industrious poor; and other edifices, more substantial, occupied by those in easier circumstances. As the eye wandered, it rested upon three churches, of different denominations, all neat and comfortable. The middle one, of recent structure, is of brick, lofty in appearance, and, in its interior, is a perfect model of completeness and beautiful finish. Its design and completion is the offspring of one whose heart has long been warmed with a Saviour's love, and whose life is guided by the law of love.

In turning from the portico of this mansion, I have entered its portals, that are ever open to the friend, the stranger, and all who wish to participate in the social circle, or desire repose from weary traveling. There, in the family group, is the aged matron, whose religious experience and long acquaintance with human nature prompt her to obey the injunction to "do to others as you would have them do unto you." Hence her powers of conversation are brought into requisition, and her gracious words and smiles lead others to the happy conclusion that they also contribute to the general pleasure. There, too, is the beloved hostess, of middle age, with becoming vivacity, is ever on the alert to put her guests at entire ease, making them welcome by words, looks and actions. Her partner, who is proprietor of all he surveys, with open heart and hand, bestows unmeasured favors; and the hospitality of both is conspicuously seen in the bountiful supply of their well spread table. The inmates who frequent this home of peace and plenty are many and various. The halls often resound with the innocent hilarity of the juvenile companions of an only child, now in her tenth year. Music and paintings are the rational amusements of all, and the gay, happy laugh and cheerful song of the domestics may be often heard.

The morning and evening orisons of this well regulated family ascend in holy incense to the throne of the "Giver of every good and perfect gift," attuning their hearts to praise and thanksgiving.

She who records this picture of cherished remembrances having been a favored inmate of this happy family for months of recent date, was privileged to retire to an apartment significantly called by her name, whenever duty and inclination led her so to do. Oft when the "lengthened shadows proclaimed the close of day," did she retire to that commodious chamber, rendered sacred and dear other by the associations of former years. There, in the solitude of her soul, would she look out upon the landscape, mantled in light and shade, as the world's luminary, in sinking to rest, left its parting rays on the top of a fertile hill. Soon the glimmerings of day would disappear, and the darkness that ensued was in unison with the stricken heart, whose light of life had also sunk to rest! That sun again arose; again and again it sheds its light to cheer the earth; ages may still roll on, but the night of sorrow continues to her, whose all is laid in the dust!

In following the horizontal line towards the south, the thoughts centre on an eminence, the sacred home of all that is mortal of the sainted dead. The bereaved heart here, in holy contemplation, seeks repose; and through faith in the resurrection unto life eternal, anchors her soul on Him who has prepared a mansion for the redeemed, and yields her will to him who doeth all things well."

DEMOPOLIS, ALA., May 11, 1855.

We have just closed a very profitable meeting, of three weeks duration, at which a large number of Christians have been refreshed and comforted, while a deep awakening has gone forth into the community. Five have been converted and four added to the Church. Others are expected to join when they have opportunity. We had some excellent preaching from Dr. Wadsworth, E. Baldwin and other brethren who assisted in the meeting, and there has, doubtless, a powerful impression gone forth here in favor of religion, the fruit of which, we trust, will be gathered not many days hence.

This meeting was not an experiment, but a felt necessity; and we think that in it has been laid the foundation of a prosperous year, and of a more glorious ingathering of souls. Let those who know the wants of this people pray for such a result.

F. M. GRACE.

TALULA CIRCUIT, MISS. CONF., May 8, 1855.

Permit me to say to the lovers of Zion that the prospects of the Church of God are brightening in this rich country. The white population is sparse, the plantations are generally very large, and a spirit of worldly-mindedness is almost as irresistible as the current of the mighty Mississippi itself. And yet, as the sweeping tide of this majestic river can be stemmed, so also may the stream of worldly-mindedness be resisted by the strengthening energies of the Grace of God. The people here are intelligent, warm-hearted and kind. There are, I regret to say, but few Christians, or even professors of religion, but there are a few—there is a little flock, and that little flock is increasing, and I trust that it will continue to increase, until every house shall become a household of faith. I never knew in any country a more general disposition on the part of non-professors to go to Church. Our little-houses are generally filled with an intelligent, refined and attentive audience.

Our second Quarterly Meeting for the circuit was held at Talula on last Saturday and Sabbath (5th and 6th inst.) Brother John G. Jones, our Presiding Elder, was with us, in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of peace. He preached at this meeting to the spiritual edification of many. His text on Sabbath morning was, "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found; call ye upon him while he is near." After giving a short exposition of this passage of Scripture, the object of the preacher seems to have been to take the shortest road to the sinner's heart. I trust that the good accomplished will be seen both in time and in eternity. None, I believe, were converted, yet we were encouraged by a few important accessions. The meeting, I am told, was more largely attended than any other had ever been in this county. The families came in the morning with their baskets of provisions, after the fashion of the people called Methodists in other places.

A large portion of my work here is among the colored people. It is my privilege to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ to thousands of the sable sons and daughters of Africa, and many of them I doubt not, have been soundly converted to God.

The excitement among the colored people which I have witnessed this year has not been an animal excitement. No, thank God, it has been a religious excitement; an excitement produced by the Holy Spirit upon the heart. My own heart is often filled with peace and joy while witnessing the effect of our holy religion upon the ignorant and the poor. The poor, says the Saviour, have the gospel preached to them; and the language of my soul is, they ought to have it, they must have it, and, by the Grace of God, they shall have it.

JOHN T. DEW.

BUFFALO CIRCUIT, MISS. CONF., Homochitto, May 8, 1855.

The Lord has been with his Church at old Macedonia. I attended a three days' meeting at this place with brother Flowers, the preacher in charge, and others, embracing the first Sunday in this month, (May,) at which the Lord was present to bless his people and own his cause. Nearly ten years had passed away since I had worshiped God with the congregation here. And since that time I had passed through many scenes of sorrow and affliction; and some with whom I held sweet converse had been called to their reward in the skies. When I arrived at the place, the fond recollection of the hours I had enjoyed came up in my mind with the joyful anticipation of again meeting with the lovers of the Saviour thrilled my heart with a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory.

It appeared at the commencement of the meeting that the preachers and the Church were harnessed for the work. Under all the exercises, whether preaching, exhortation or prayer, there was divine power, which increased as long as the meeting continued.

The convictions were powerful; sometimes prostrating the individual and depriving him of the use of his limbs, as in the times of Wesley, Whitfield and Dow. Conversions were equally powerful, clear, and satisfactory. And while the shouts of happy Christians and new converts were ascending up to Heaven, I was made to cry out in my heart, "This is none other than the house of God, and the gate of Heaven." I have not attended better meetings. Twelve were baptized, twenty joined the Church, and numbers were converted. May God carry on the good work.

N. L. HUFF.

DEER CREEK, MISS. CONF., May 14, 1855.

I ought to publish, to the praise of our God, the manifestations of his mercy to us upon this work.

Our second Quarterly meeting was held two weeks ago, at Union Chapel, in the upper part of the circuit. The meeting continued four days. Our Presiding Elder, Rev. J. G. Jones, and brother Dew, from Tulula, were with us from the commencement, and labored with untiring energy and zeal, and with success. Brother T. W. Castle was also with us the last two days, and helped us with his usual energy.

The congregations were large for the swamp, the people were serious and attentive, and much interest in personal and experimental religion manifested.

Many surrounded the altar from time to time as seekers; several obtained a clear evidence that their sins were all forgiven them, and their hearts renewed. Some of them praised God aloud, which is rather a new and strange thing for this part of the country. Eight joined the Church. The ministers of the sanctuary, and the few experimental Christians who have borne the "burden and heat of the day," and prayed over this spiritual desert, were much encouraged, and will go on with renewed strength.

The Lord is doing a good work for the colored people upon Hill's plantations, also.

They seemed "already prepared for the Lord" when we came upon the work. Thirty-five or forty have professed religion, and some of them give the clearest evidence that a good work has been wrought within them. The work is still going on. May the Lord save all the people, and drive infidelity to its own place.

IRONY, FICTION, ARMAGEDDON, &C.

MR. EDITOR—Your correspondent, "Progress," made a happy hit and exhibited no little genius, when, in taking off some of the "improvements" of the day, his irony was so grave and well managed as not to be detected by many of his readers; he must have had many a "chuckle" over the godly zeal which these blunders called forth. Irony and satire are most potent weapons, whether wielded against truth or error; and, in judicious hands, may be made to accomplish great good. Edgar A. Poe worked a kindred vein in literature with more success than any other American author. No man in his time could equal him in making the possible, or ideal, appear the actual, and in dressing fiction with all the attributes of fact. He had a way of commencing his fancy sketches at once so unusual in fiction and so natural in the narration of facts, that it threw you completely off your guard; and then they were marked by a minuteness of description and incident, an extent of combination of circumstances, and a carefulness of calculation that fully confirmed first impressions. Well do we remember the puzzled amazement with which friends came to us with his case of "Mons. Valdemar," requesting us to read it and tell them whether it was fact or fiction.

But my object in this article is to call attention to a work recently from the press which combines both these elements in a higher degree than any work that has come under my notice. Indeed, the author has far exceeded all his predecessors in this line that he seems likely to be understood by many of his friends as having attempted a serious discussion of the topics embraced in his work! But a moment's reflection will convince any discerning man that such a view of the author's design would make his work a reproach to his ministerial character and the conference to which he belongs; it would deserve the decided condemnation of that body, and without a parallel as a burlesque upon Bible exegesics. Indeed such a supposition would made the work an exhibition of egotism and vanity such as a religious man, and especially a minister could hardly be expected to possess. I have only need to inform your readers, perhaps, that I refer to "Armageddon, or the United States in Prophecy." I confess that in many respects I think the work overdone; so great is the irony, and so adroitly has the author managed its application, that like Spanish history of the extinct, fabulous tribes, which the work more resembles than any that I know of, and which was converted into veritable history and the Mormon bible, Mr. B.'s work will be taken as a sober attempt at biblical hermeneutics!

The work holds up to public gaze, with full development of intellectual and moral features, those prophecying tinkers upon Providence and Revelation, the lineal descendants of the prophets and "sixth monarchy" men who made England vocal in the seventeenth century with their psalms on the "good time" to be ushered in by the murder of King Charles and the sequestration of the church livings for their own use; the man that imagins that they live just at the terminating point and focal blaze of the world's history; that they have not only taken out the key-stone, but have taken down and reconstructed again the whole arch of the history of Providence and the world; who make the Bible a mere hand-book for political pagandists and agrarian demagogues, who they alone are divinely authorized and qualified to render and construe for the world, and that Providence was constructed, and the world has a history, for the simple purpose of weaving a chaplet and singing an anthem in honor of the democracy of Joe! They give such a construction to Daniel's prophesies and the Apocalypse that if you believed them, your only wish would be, that they did not wind up with "Hail! Columbia" or "Yankee Doodle." This task is executed with a master hand. The specimens of quasi biblical interpretation, a la these fanatics, interspersed through the work, in the gravest manner imaginable, are rich indeed; and if the parties do not discover that they have been sitting for their portraits, we give them up as incorrigible.

There are features of the work to which we must object. It is verging too much upon the impious, and upon trifling with sacred things, to embody in a work of fiction such frequent references to prayer and divine assistance. These, perhaps, more than anything else about the book, have led many readers to think the work a sober attempt at explaining the Bible. We think, too, that the author was carrying the "joke" too far when he misled the agents of the Methodist Publishing House as to induce them to take the work on sale. As a work on the sacred Scriptures, it would compromise the intelligence and dignity of any establishment to have anything to do with it; and we much doubt the propriety of a religious house dealing in works of fiction. Still we would have talents like those displayed by Mr Baldwin in this happy hit, employed

A CHARACTER.

Mr. EDITOR:—There has been at this place, and at Selma,—for the last ten days, a man professing to be a Methodist preacher from the Cacoda Conference. In proof of this, he exhibited a certificate from C. Van Dausen, Chairman of a District in that Conference, dated June 24th, 1854. This certificate was written to Noble Armstrong, which name he claims. He also has Minutes of that Conference, from which it appears that a man of that name travelled three years in that Conference.

In your paper of the 14th, April, you describe a man by the name A. Armstrong, which is a fac-simile of our man's person, and manners; but before we referred to your description, we hesitated to recognize him as a brother, and told him so candidly, but kindly, he did not appreciate our candor, but took occasion to say hard things of us, and is moreing left in high dudgeon for parts unknown. In addition to your description we add that he is knock-kneed, his left foot standing out more than the right, and in private conversation he has a hye word, sure, by which he answers to almost everything; so much we have deemed it proper to say of Noble Armstrong, that the Methodist Church South, and the public, may know that as far as we are concerned, we did not receive him as a Methodist preacher.

Deaths.

In Russell co., Alabama, on Saturday the 5th ult., Miss CAROLINE, daughter of Jacob and Elizabeth McGehee, aged about 22 years.

On the 17th ult., at Valley Cottage, Claiborne parish, La., in the 20th year of her age, Mrs. MARY K. EGAN, wife of Wm. B. Egan, Esq., of Homer, and daughter of the late Col. Samuel B. and Anne S. Harper.

In Salem, Ala., May 2d, 1855, of pulmonary consumption, OPHELIA L., daughter of Rev. Dr. H. I. M., and Mrs. Maria E. Kenyon, in the 17th year of her age.

In New Orleans, May 8th, CHARLES ELIEL, infant son of J. M. and Louisa Smith.

In the town of Carthage Texas, at the residence of S. L. Davis, on Friday the 20th inst., about 4 o'clock, P. M., Dr. ALGERNON SIDNEY THWEATT, eldest son of Henry C. and Amy Ann G. Thweatt. The diseased was born on the 25th day of December, A. D. 1827, in Diawiddie county, the state of Virginia. His father emigrated to Marshall county, North Mississeippi, in the year 1838, where the mother of the deceased departed this life on the 16th day of April, A. D. 1841. She was a devoted Christian, and taught her lovely son to know the importance of the Christian religion, in early life. And he lost no time in preparing for the realities of another world. He professed religion in the 14th year of his age, and lived a devoted and pious Christian till his death. The deceased commenced the study of medicine in the year 1849, while an assistant teacher in a male and female institution, with his father, in the town of Washington, Ark. He pursued an energetic course, and was a regular student of the Louisville College, Ky., in the science of medicine. After he had completed the studies of his profession, he visited the city of New Orleans, to see his father, who was in charge of the Moreau street Methodist Episcopal Church, where he remained a few months, and leaving his father, friends and kindred, in the bloom of youth to master his profession, emigrated to Panola county, Texas, near the east side of the Sabine, where he located for the purpose of practicing medicine, and where he soon established for himself the reputation of a good man and an excellent physician. He here made many good and substantial friends. On the 15th day of December, 1853, he married an amiable lady, the daughter of S. L. and Hulda Davis, who loved him as a son. He leaves many friends and relatives to mourn his loss; and may the God of mercy help them to bear up under this their severe bereavement. May the devoted father and dear sistere bear the loss of their son and brother, with becoming fortitude. As I have been intimately acquainted with Dr. A. S. Thweatt for two years or more, I can speak for myself. He was one of the purest Christians I ever saw in all my life. I visited him often every day while he was afflicted. He spoke of death often, and said if it were not for the ties he had on earth, he would be glad to bid the world farewell. His ties were dear to him. They were his lovely Carrie and his dear sweet little boy. I was by his side when he drew the last breath, and only a few minutes before he died he said to me: Bourbon, I am bound to die, Oh, meet me in heaven. Those were his last words. Would to God we all may live and die as he did.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

A new American manufacture has been commenced in Williamsburg, N. Y., where plates of glass ten feet wide and twenty-five feet long will be made. A plate ten feet square can be made so strong that it will hold a ton weight, and so clear that you can read the fine print of a newspaper through a piece four inches thick. The best English plate glass is made from Amerloan sand.

M. Auguste Marlette, who has been for years past employed by the French Government in making researches in Egypt, and who has succeeded in completely excavating the famous temple of Serapis, says that the fusion of Greek and Egyptinn art at various periods is established by a number of statues which were found among the images of Serapis. Sculptured representations of Apis were found by the side of statues of Pindar, Homer, Lycurgus, Pythagoras, Plato and Euripides.

As an incident illustrative of the dullness of trade in New York, it is meationed that many packages of dry goods, imported last fall, have recently been reshipped to Liverpool, by their consignees. There is no market for them, and notwithstanding freight costs both ways, to say nothing of insurance, commissions, etc., the loss of reshipment is less than that which would be incurred by keeping them in store.

Parson Brownlow, of the Knoxville Whig, publishes what he calls the abridged gospel of Know-Nothingism as follows: "Foreigners and Roman Catholics may all ride in the chariot of American Freedom. But Americans must drive."

An Emeraldor meeting another son of the sod, but whose countenance was not quite remembered, after saluting him cordially, inquired his name. "Walsh," said the other. "Walsh, Walsh," said Paddy, "are ye from Dublin? Be jabers, I knew two ould maids there of that name, an' sure they weren't yer mother, eh?"

REMARKABLE SAGACITY OF A DOG.—The following instance of the remarkable sagacity of a dog is vouched for by the owner of the animal. A gentleman residing in Lynn, has for a long time visited Boston daily on business, at times passing over the turnpike, and frequently over the Eastern Railroad, always accompanied by his dog. On Wednesday last he came to Boston, but during the day the dog become separated from his master, who returned home without him. A few hours after the gentleman reached home the dog also returned. A gentleman who went to Lynn in the afternoon train, states that he saw the dog enter the cars at Boston, and snugly ensconse himself under a seat so if to avoid the vigilant eye of the conductor. On the cars stopping at West Lynn, the dog jumped out and hurried home with all possible speed.

INTERESTING DISCOVERY IN A TUNNEL.—Mr Butterfield, who is running a tunnel into Table Mountain, near Sonora, California, has given the editor of the Herald a description of a discovery made by his company in the course of their excavations. They have got their tunnel in a distance of three hundred feet. Here, one hundred and ten feet from the surface of the ground, they found the trunk of a pine tree, 22 inches in diameter, in a good state of preservation, and with its bark on. The sap appeared to be in a partial state of petrefaction, and the outside was charred, giving unmistakable evidence of the contact of fire at some period having cut out the portion of the tree found in the tunnel, the company have commenced sinking a shaft for the purpose of reaching the roots of the tree. Their informant states that there is but little doubt that the formation surrounding this tree is a solid bed of lava, which, at some remote period, flowed into its present location, covering up tree, &c., (as this discovery shows,) in its progress.

HITTING THE NAIL ON THE HEAD.—The Providence Journal says: "We are generally old-fashioned, and generally behind the times, but we confess that we have great faith in the precept and example of Jesus Christ. We believe that if temperance were more a moral and religious question, and less a political one, it would make much greater progress. We believe that the men who put themselves forward, or who are put forward as its advocates, might greatly strengthen their influence if they would personally decline the political preferment which so many of them seek with an eagerness that throws more than suspicion upon their motives, and provokes the opinion which, whether true or false, has become very general, that with too many temperance is a means, not an end."

TO SPORTSMEN.—Wash your gun barrels in spirits of turpentine by dipping a rag or sponge fastened on your gun rod into the liquid, and swabbing them out three or four times, when they will be cleared from all impurities, and can be used almost instantly, as the turpentine will evaporate and leave the barrels dry; even if they are a little moist it will not prevent their going off like water. After being washed thus, there is no danger of rust as when water is used. I am an old experienced gunner, and have practiced this for years, and found it useful. Spirits of turpentine can be procured at all country stores, and a small quantity sufficeth. [Scientific American.

A few days ago a train stopped at Ashtabula, Ohio, for wood and water, the engineer leaving the cars standing on a high, open bridge, when two passengers, named Peter Ritz Gatcher and William Jonce, stepped off the cars and fell through the bridge, a height of sixty feet. Both were instantly killed.

On the 7th inst., the cars of the Michigan Southern Road had just stopped at the depot in Toledo, Ohio, when a German, name unknown, a passenger, fired a pistol through his head, blowing it all to atoms. Morganza is the name of a new city projected by a Mr. Morgan, at the mouth of the Big Sandy River in Western Virginia. Three railroads, it is said, will center at this point. The location is said to be healthy, and the site well adapted for building purposes. Morganza is 150 miles from Cincinnati and 220 from Wheeling.

The Toronto (Canada) Leader says that the Governor General cannot give his consent to the prohibitory liquor bill. His instructions are "to reserve for the signification of the Queen's pleasure, every bill of an extraordinary or unusual nature."

HEAVY ROBBERY.—A letter from Carrollton, (Ill.) to the St. Louis Republican, says that the safe of the County Clerk, Mr. F. P. Vedder, was blown open on the night of the 12th inst., and $3,025 taken therefrom. A large amount of county orders was also stolen.

The new prohibitory liquor law of Michigan went into effect on the 14th inst. Measures have been taken to test, as speedily as possible, the constitutionality of the act, by making a case for the Supreme Court of the State.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—A destructive fire broke out in Springfield, Ill., on the night of the 11th, and nine of the largest stores in the city were burned to the ground. The dispatch states that Springfield has no fire apparatus or organization of any kind for extinguishing fires.

The kitchen of the jail in Sumterville, Ga., took fire on Friday night, the 11th instant, and was consumed, together with three negroes, the property of Dr. J. L. Haynesworth.

Getting in at Night.

"The door was locked when I got home," said Tom, "and how to get in without waking up the Governor, was the difficulty. I knew he'd give me 'particular fits,' if he knew I was out after 10, and the clock had just struck one. The back yard was an impossibility, and but one chance remained. There was a porch over the front door, the roof of which was but a few feet below two windows. One of them I knew was fastened down, and the other opened from a bedroom, which might or might not be occupied. An old maidan sister of Tim's wife had arrived on the same day, and it was very probable that she was in that room; but I knew the bed was in the corner farthest from the window, and hoped I should be able to get in and through the room without awakening her, and then I had a comparatively easy thing of it. So getting a plank from a neighboring board-pile, I rested it against the eave of the shed, pulled off my shoes, put them in my pocket, and then 'cooned up.' All right so far, but I thought it necessary, in order not to arouse any suspicions in the morning, to remove the plank; so dragging it up, I threw off the end, and down it went with an awful clatter on a stray dog that had followed me for two or three squares, who immediately set up the most awful howl a whipped hound ever gave tongue to. That started half a dozen other dogs in the neighborhood barking; a mocking bird in the window above commenced singing as if he intended to split his throat et it, and an old woman, in her night clothes, with a candle in her hand, appeared at a window across the street. I knew I was safe as far as she was concerned, but if any one came to our windows, the candle gave enough light to very probably discover me.

—Nobody did come, however, and the old lady, after peering up and down the street for a minute or more, popped her head in and retired. The mocking bird still kept up its eternal whistle, and it was fully half an hour before it and the dog settled down and gave me a chance to move. Creeping slowly along the wall, till I reached the window, I put my hands on the sill, sprung in, and, with my head and shoulders within, and my legs hanging out, stopped to listen. Yes, she was in that room, for I could hear her breathing. After waiting for a minute, I cautiously drew up one leg, then the other, slewed them round, and, putting them down to the floor, was just conscious that I had stepped on something soft and yielding, and was about withdrawing them, when another yell broke out at my feet, the old maid jumped up from her bed crying 'Murder! murder!' and the dogs and the mocking birds started again. I saw through it all; I had put my foot in it more ways than one. A little darkey was lying on her back, under the window, and I had stepped on her face, and, of course woke her up. I decided in a flash what to do. The house would be aroused, and I caught to a certainty, unless I could get to my room before the governor was up. But I hadn't a moment to lose, for the little nigger was yelling, and the woman screaming, so I started for the door, made three steps, and struck a chair: tumbled over, of course, made the awfullest racket you ever heard of in the dead hour of night, in a peaceable house: the nigger and the old maid screamed louder than ever, the mocking bird whistled like a steam whistle, and the dogs fairly made a chorus as loud as Julien's.

"I reached the door, however, swiftly and quietly opened it, and just got out in time to see the old gentleman open his door, with a candle in his hand, and come hurrying up the stairs. Not a moment was to be lost. There was a wardrobe near where I stood, and I sprang behind it. Up came the governor, reached the door, opened it, went in, and in the meantime there was all sorts of confusion and inquiry down stairs as to what was the matter. Nobody else came up, though, and from where I stood I heard every word of inquiry and explanation in the room. Of course they couldn't make much out of it. The little darkey was too frightened and too sound asleep at the time to understand the truth, and the upshot of the business was, that they concluded she had been dreaming, and the governor, after giving her a sound spanking, and explaining the matter to the aroused neighbors, from the window, went down to his room again.

"So far, so good. I now had to go down stairs, reach the back door, unbar it, get into the yard, make for my room, which was in the second story of a back building that stood unconnected with, and about a dozen yards from the main one. After giving everybody another half hour to settle down again, I started. Boys, did you ever try to go up or down a pair of stairs, at midnight, without making a noise? You may try all sorts of ways, but every step is sure to creak, each with a peculiar noise of its own, and loud enough, you are certain to waken everybody. I had gotten nearly to the bottom, when a little fiste dog came trotting up the entry towards me, yelling furiously. A suppressed 'Come here, sir, you Zip,' silenced him, for he recognized me; but the fiste started the mocking bird, and the dogs in the neighborhood having learned to take the cue, of course all joined in chorus for the third time.

"I ran along the passage, reached the door, and unlocked it, just as the governor roused the second time, opening his door and seeing a man escaping from the house by the back way, of course cried "Thieves!" "Thieves!"—made a rush after me. I was too quick for him though, opened the door, sprang out, broke for the door that opened into the room below mine, and had just reached it, when crash! within a foot of my head went a brick, and another voice that I knew belonged to next door neighbor Tompkins, joined the governor in the cry of "Thieves! Thieves! Murder! Thieves!" I was safe, though. Rushing up the stairs, I shelled myself quicker than I ever did before or since, and was in bed and sound asleep in less than half a minute. Wasn't there a row though? I never heard so many dogs before, the mocking-bird, of course, was outdoing all previous efforts, the chickens even began to crow, Tomkins next door was hallooing "Thieves!" and calling the governor. I could hear screams and all sorts of talking and noises among the neighbors, until at length the old gentleman's voice was heard in the yard calling "Tom! Tom!"

"Tom was sound asleep—snoring!"

"Tom!" cried the old man in a voice that would have roused a man from an epileptic fit.

"I judged it prudent to wake then, and jumping from my bed raised the window, and rubbing one eye, and looking particularly frightened, (which I was,) asked:

"'Why, father, what in the world's the matter?'

"There's thieves in the house!" was the reply; "get your gun and come down and be quick!"

"He's in the room below you, Tom!" hollood Tomkins, "I'm certain of it. I saw him as he ran down, and threw a fire-brick at him. I know he didn't pass that door, Mr. Jones."

I was directed to "look out for myself;" the governor stood sentinel at the door below, armed with a club, while Tomkins had five minutes to collect all from the neighbors, and less than half that so thoroughly was every house alarmed, there were a dozen or more men in the yard, armed with guns, pistols and sticks.

The governor led the attack. Opening the door, he called, "Come out here, you housebreaking scoundrel! If you attempt to run or resist, I'll blow your brains out!" Nobody came, however.

"Watch the door," was the order, "while I go in," and I was told to "look sharp," and "shoot the rascal if he came up stairs." A momentary search was sufficient to satisfy every body that the thief was not in that room.

"He's up stairs, then," cried Tomkins, "for I'll take my Bible oath he didn't pass that door."

So up stairs they trooped, but I had lit a candle by that time, and there was no hughear there. The strictest search; even in looking under a bootjack, didn't show the faintest trace of him. The yard was next examined, then the house, and everybody being tolerably well satisfied that he had escaped, the neighbors dispersed to their several homes, but I was appointed as sentinel for the rest of the night, and ordered not to go to sleep on my post under penalty of a flogging.

The articles missing, on a thorough investigation next day, were two pies, six, the old lady's silver thimble. The thimble turned up in a week or two, being discovered under the corner of the carpet, but the pies have never been accounted for to this day. On oath, I could have given very material testimony as to the disposition of the stolen property, but as the case didn't come before any court, I remained quiet.

Didn't the local editors loom, though! One of them elongated himself through a quarter of a column, and headed the item "A Diabolical and Atrocious Attempt at Burglary and Murder!!" describing with graphic particulars, the fiendish attempt to throttle Miss —— and her servant, complimented the "coolness and resolution of R. Tomkins, Esq.," and perorated with a withering anathema on the want of vigilance displayed by the police.

It was fun for me to see with what wide awake sagacity the watch used to stop at the front door and listen during their nightly rounds, for a month after; and you couldn't have bribed a youngster to go under the porch on any account after dark. The excitement died away though, after a while, but I'll never forget the night I tried to get in "without making a noise."

Contradictory opinions have been expressed by writers on the steam engine, respecting the value of the condenser. Mr. Scott Russell contends that a vacuum may be too good, and a decided loss of power: and Bourne asserts that in a locomotive working at a pressure of from 120 to 105 pounds on the square inch, the efficiency of a given quantity of water, raised into steam, may be considered about the same as in the condensing engine, because the resistance of the atmosphere, 15 pounds, on the square inch, is about one-eighth of the whole pressure in the former engine; and the rare vapor in the condenser, two pounds on the square inch, of a low pressure engine, amounts to the same resistance in proportion to its pressure.

GROSS BULKHEADS FOR STEAMSHIPS.—For want of gross bulkheads, recommended by the late Grand Jury of the United States Court, the steamer Golden Age has followed the North Carolina. It is probable that neither of these steamers would have sunk if they had been provided with bulkheads. The water would then have been confined to the apartment where the rupture or injury occurred; the fires would have been protected, and the engine would have been enabled to perform its duty. After a few more such disasters, underwriters, as well as steam owners and passengers may awaken to their duty. When bulkheads are introduced, we shall probably hear of no more such sinkings. [N. Y. DEAD-HEAD CONGRESSMEN GOING TO EUROPE. A Binghamton (N. Y.) paper says that the extraordinary emigration of Congressmen by the Colline steamer on Wednesday, will surprise no one who is aware that every one of them voted for the Collins appropriation in the last Congress.

A shad fisherman of the Delaware river sends a note to the Philadelphia Inquirer, complaining that "the stembotes that trafick in the delawer spile the shaddin bisness, with there splashin and ruain in shoar." He remonstrates against this, and takes the indisputable position that "shaddin were invented afore stembotes."

The Norfolk Herald gives an account of a party of six gentlemen of that city, who made an excursion to Cobb's Island, in Northampton county, Va., to shoot birds. They killed, in eight days, 7005 birds, consisting of the following varieties: The common sand bird, ringnecks, brown backs, plover, bishops, curlew, (long bill,) do., (short bill,) willite, bitterns, (two varieties,) red hille, or sea crows, sedge hens, ducks, gulls, etc. In addition to this they gathered large quantities of birds' eggs, which were quite a delicacy when fried. They also caught a number of terrapins, and gigged and captured an enormous black drum wheighing 90 pounds.

PAID FOR IT.—Mary A. Smith has recovered $5,000 in Starke county (Ohio) Court, from the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad for injuries sustained in January last by the conductors not stopping the train when requested to.

The case of Miss Bunkley, the escaped Emmittsburg nun, against Messrs. We find the following in the Chillicothe (Ohio) Metropolis of the 11th inst.

"We learn from the Jackson Standard that a few days since nine men got into a canoe at Westfalls' Mill, in Vinton county, for the purpose of crossing the creek. The men who had charge of the cars, for the purpose of frightening one or two who were timid, rowed the boat up close to the fall, and suddenly the water struck and filled the little vessel. The result was that two men, named Dennison McGinnis and W. Napper, were drowned, and M. Dordan so severely strangled that he died a day or two afterward with congestion of the brain. The others escaped, some with great difficulty.

Lieut. Tennison, of the U. S. Revenue Cutter, Forward, has been fined $8 and costs at Wilmington, Del., for an assault on Lieut. Jones, of the same vessel.

SPOONING IT.—The last dodge, says the Cincinnati Enquirer, we have heard in evading the State Liquor Law, occurred yesterday at one of our fashionable drinking saloons. An individual walked up to the counter and demanded a dime bottle of brandy. Now, the rule is to charge fifteen cents, unless an empty bottle is furnished in return for the bottle received; and, as the consumer laid only a dime on the counter, the extra five cents was demanded.

"I don't want the bottle," said he, "draw the cork."

"The liquor can't be drank on the premises," replied the barkeeper.

"I ain't going to drink it on the premises, rejoined the other, and the barkeeper, supposing that he had some vessel to pour it into, drew the cork, when the gentleman quietly pulled out a sponge from his pocket, and pouring the liquor into it; then, taking his seat, commenced leisurely sucking it.

"You see," said he, nodding complacently to the astonished barkeeper, "I ain't going contrary to this rule, for the law says the stuff shan't be drunk on the premises."

The bystanders came to the conclusion that the stranger would make an appropriate Governor of Illinois, being decidedly the greatest sucker of them all.

ARTESIAN WELL.—A third vein of water has been reached at a depth of 381 feet. The well was running over from it all day yesterday. The tubing is down 870 feet—within two feet of the bottom. Mr. Reed's chief borer, a negro he valued at $3,000, was sent home sick a few weeks since, and is now dead.

CUSTOM-HOUSE.—The scaffolding has got very high-faluting—now tries to frown down that Charles Hotel. The laborers go in as morning and come out evening, as usual. The arm of the big derrick, on Saturday evening, pointed N. by N. W. with no prospect of rain.

GREAT FIRE IN PETERSBURG, VA.—We find the following in the Richmond Penny Post of the 18th:

We learned by telegraph, just as we were going to press last night, that a tremendous conflagration was raging in Petersburg. Among the buildings destroyed are the stores of Watkins, Son & Co.; Clarke's shoe store; Ford's cigar store; Robinson's clothing store; Muir & Stevens' store; Falconer, Plumber & Co's; Tench & Co's auction store; Thompson's tin store; Wall's hat store, and a number of others.

The fire broke out on Bollingbroke street, the whole of which, extending to Sycamore street, was in flames.

It was seriously apprehended that the whole city would be consumed, as the streets were already so hot that the firemen could not bear the heat, and unfortunately but one engine was in working order.

Application having been made to the chief engineer of our fire department for aid, we learn that he immediately dispatched, in an extra train, a number of engines and a detachment of our gallant firemen to the scene of conflagration.

Washington National Monument.

Address of the Board of Managers of the Washington National Monument Society to the People of the United States.

FELLOW CITIZENS; We address you on behalf of the Washington National Monument Association, and submit for your consideration the following report of what has been done:

The corner-stone was laid on the 4th of July, 1848. At that time there was in the treasury of the Association the sum of $22,460 66.

The work has gone on with varied progress, until the sum of $230,000, the product of voluntary contributions alone, has been expended in its erection.

The original estimate of the cost of the whole work—the shaft, the base, and the ornamental part—exceeded $1,222,000.

The base, built of the blue stone of the Potomac, solid and indestructible, is sunk eight feet below the surface and rises seventeen and a half feet above the surface of the surrounding earth. It is fifty-five feet square at its top. From this springs the shaft, the walls of blue stone fifteen feet thick, faced with white marble fourteen inches thick, in courses two feet in height, tied and bonded into the blue stone at every course. In its ascent it diminishes gradually and regularly in the exterior line.

The interior is carried up a straight unbroken chamber. Within, and set into the solid wall of this interior, according to the taste of the architect, have been placed, and are yet to be placed, the stones contributed by the States, communities and associations.

This naked shaft, thus rigidly cut, thus firmly based, thus indissolubly bonded, now rises in its simple and grand proportions one hundred and fifty-two and a half feet above the blue stone base. It is already one of the first objects which meet the eye of the traveler as he passes through the hills by which the city is hemmed in, and he starts to find the immense machinery on its top, designed for lifting stone, still idle, and anxiously inquires the cause.

Fellow-countrymen, we are pained to say it is your neglect. When the scattered and subjugated Polish nation and the friends of liberty in Europe began to erect a mouument to Kosciusko, they made it a labor of love, and from every valley and mountain and plain and running stream, far and near, they brought stones and piled and heaped them into a vast pyramidal mound to testify that love. And now, after the lapse of thirty years, amid the convulsions which have shaken that unhappy country, pilgrim hands still swell that pile with constant contribution.

We are erecting a monument to one greater than Kosciusko—to him who in history or myth is known among every kindred and nation of this earth; who laid the foundations, gave the proportions, and superintended the structure of government which, with miraculous speed, has risen to the front rank among the nations, and we call upon you for aid. Men well known to you have given to it long years of carefulness and labor. They have been urgent and pressing in their calls for help, and you have, to a certain extent, responded to their call. It was not their work; it was yours; and they were your stewards, giving their time and care and labor and money in the same cause with you.

But they have failed; not for lack of energy or zeal on their part, but for want of that action and sympathy on yours which was essential to success. You, the people of this broad and happy land; you, the children of Washington; you, to whom he has left the priceless bequest of his services and his love, have held back the contribution needed from each to erect to his memory a suitable Monument in the National Metropolis. While thousands have answered promptly the appeal to their patriotism, and contributed the amount already received and expended, the far greater number, either from apathy or want of opportunity, have failed to join in this work of grateful duty. This failure compelled our predecessors to arrest the prosecution of the work, and to appeal to Congress for assistance.

Fellow-countrymen, this is not a suitable object of legislative provision. A free, a prosperous, a thriving people will not allow a debt of love and gratitude, due by every individual heart, to be discharged by an act of Congress.

A new Board of Managers has now been appointed. We come into office under favorable auspices, and with well-founded hopes of means to prosecute the work. Since our election on the 22d February last, we have not been idle. Our arrangements have been began, and are in progress. We appeal to the people. We wish no legislative aid. We look to free hearts; we call upon all, not the liberal and the generous alone. We call upon each man who this day walks erect in all the panoply of freedom in this bread land, who is not dead to the common impulse of humanity, who is worthy in the least degree of the countless and diversified blessings by which he is surrounded, we call upon men everywhere to contribute each his mite. A great and mighty people of 25,000,000 can not be so dead to the sensations which are innate in every breast at the bare naming of such a benefactor, as to refuse or neglect to give their aid in such a cause.

Let every man, then, who feels his heart beat with American pulsations, and every man who reveres the name of Washington, singly or in companies, communicate directly with our Secretary, and send in his contributions to our Treasurer, or suggest a mode for its collection.

By order of the Board.

CHAS. C. TUCKER, Secretary.

A few days ago in Boston, a man having with him a little child, visited the menagerie in Howard street, and while looking at the lion the man took the child in his arms and was in the act of placing its hand on the animal's head, when it suddenly struck the child with its paw, tore off one of its ears, and badly bruised the side of its face.

LOSS OF THE SHIP PAULINE.—The ship Pauline, Colburn, of Bath, from Philadelphia bound to Havana, with coal went ashore on Elbow Cay Reef on the morning of the 25th of April, and was totally lost. The cargo sold for $13 as it lay.

RETRIBUTION.—Blackwell, who was lately married to the strong-minded woman, Lucy Stone, is the individual who some time ago choked a lady in the cars and robbed her of her servant girl. Justice, if some times slow, is always sure.

TAMPA BAY.—We learn from the Tampa Peninsular that the U. S Surveying schooner Varina, Capt. Berryman, is now in Tampa Bay, engaged in making a survey of its capacity and depth of water as a commercial harbor. This will be the first thorough and satisfactory examination of the waters of Tampa, made by one adequate to the performance of the duty.

Ellis, the member expelled from the Massachusetts Legislature, was arrested in Boston on the 16th for debt, while on his way to the State House. A writ of habeas corpus was sued out by his counsel, on the plea that Ellis is still a member of the House. If the plea proves successful, his case will probably be argued in full before the courts, and the facts sought to be proved before the Legislature will thus be made public.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE NAVY.—The New York Courier and Enquirer understands that sailors are enlisting very fast in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and there are now about 400 awaiting orders on board the receiving ship North Carolina.

Mr. Longworth says his grapes are unhurt on the late frosts in the vicinity of Cincinnati; and that he shall make full as much, if not more, wine than he has any previous year.

Mississippi.

The Vicksburg Democrat has the following paragraph:

Two sons of the Rev. James Walton—Eddie and John, 12 and 14 years old, were drowned in Big Black, near Bowie's Ferry, on the 3d inst. They were bathing in company with some other boys, and one of them venturing too far out into the treacherous stream to reach the shore again without assistance, his noble brother went to his rescue, and both struggling in the water together went down. Their bodies were recovered and buried in the same grave.

The Pontotoc Herald has the following:

We had but one good rain during the month of April, and the prospects for another are still gloomy. The farmers complain that the cotton is dying rapidly, and it will be favored with a shower during the next ten days, the crop will be materially injured.

On the morning of the 14th inst., the Eclipse Hotel, in Port Gibson, took fire and was destroyed. The livery stable of Mr. Milligan adjoining the hotel, was also consumed; and several neighboring houses took fire but were saved.

The Hinds County Gazette, of the 16th, says:

The scarcity of provisions in this section of country is really distressing and alarming. In addition to the prevailing fact that the gardens of our citizens have been almost entirely consumed by the drouth—and that other crops, that money was never known to be so scarce—we find every article in the provision line up to the very highest figure, and with a continued upward tendency. Flour is selling at fifteen dollars per barrel; bacon at from fifteen to eighteen cents per pound; corn meal at two dollars per bushel (and to be had only by sending to the mills.) These would be extraordinary prices were money abundant; but with the great pressure, and general scarcity which undoubtedly exists, our condition is truly alarming.

On the night of the 13th the residence of Mr. Francis Surget, near Natchez, was destroyed by fire.

The Holly Springs Times has the following paragraph:

The two Marks, who committed the brutal murder a few miles east of this place, last week, by shooting Miss Smith, and seriously wounding her brother, have been brought to town and lodged in jail. They were taken in Hishomingo county, just beyond Hatchie Turnpike, where they had been lurking in the vicinity of the residence of their brother. The pursuers discovered evidences of their presence in the neighborhood, about an ambuscade in the woods. They at once procured some dogs, put them on the track, and soon chased the refugees to the house, where they surrendered.

Louisiana.

LOUISIANA.—The Ouachita Register, of the 11th, says of the river and weather:

The Ouachita is again too low for navigation as high up as this point. We are informed by creditable authority that in the neighborhood of Camden there are many families actually suffering for the want of the common necessaries of life; and should the river still continue too low for navigation, many planters will have to haul their supplies from the Mississippi river.

The weather, at present, is very warm for the season of the year. Since our last issue, however, there has been a little refreshing rain, and the crops on the east bank of the Ouachita river are now looking as well as we have seen them for years. The crops on the hill lands were too much injured by the drought, we fear, to recover to any great extent.

The Register has the following rattlesnake story, which it coupon rather flimsy:

Last Friday evening a rattle snake was killed near the waters of the Dugdemona, (about fifty miles Southwest of this place, on the Natchitoches road,) measuring nineteen four inches in length, nineteen inches around the thickest part of the body, and having forty-four rattles.

The session of the Sixth Judicial District Court commenced in Baton Rouge on Monday last, Judge Robertson presiding. The Gazette learns that the docket is unusually full this term. There are one hundred and seventy cases to be tried, besides a large amount of criminal business to be attended to.

The Harrisonburg Independent of the 16th, has the following paragraphs:

On Sunday last we had light showers during the greater part of the day, but not sufficiently copious to wet the ground below the surface. Still, however, the rain was evidently of much service. Crops look well, and with timely rains, the prospect of an abundant yield was never greater. "Low and rattling," in reference to all the watercourses is still the cry.

Benjamin Stanly, who stands indicted for the murder of John B. Pitt, in July last, was arrested a few days since, and lodged in the public prison of this parish.

The Democratic Convention in Caldwell parish, met at the court house in Columbia, on the 7th inst., appointed delegates to the State and District Conventions, and recommended the Hon. Mark Bonner to the State Convention, for nomination for Governor.

The Piney Woodsman, at Springfield, Livingston parish, informs us that Mr. Wm Durkin, of that place, was killed on Saturday last by the accidental discharge of the gun, caused by his dog running against it. He lived about an hour. The Woodsman gives the following description of a beer-calf:

This strange creature was calved by a cow belonging to Mr. Franc DeLatte, who resides in the French settlement, on the Amite river in this parish. Its whole body, its head, and its legs down to the ankles, together with its eyes and ears were literally those of a bear. It had also the tusks of a bear, but had no other teeth. The color was red with black spots. The hair was long and woolly but still bore a resemblance to the hair of a cow. Its tail, and hips, were the only parts having any exact resemblance in a calf. Its body was as thick as it was long. In fact all the movements of a bear, and while lying at rest kept up a perpetual growling after the manner of a bear. It refused to suck, but took milk when poured into its mouth. We have not heard whether Mr. DeLatte has succeeded in preserving this curious creature alive.

The Holmesville, Miss., Independent of the 17th has the following paragraphs:

We learn that a rape was committed on the person of a white lady living near Georgetown, in this State, upon Tuesday, the 8th inst., by a runaway negro fellow belonging to Gen. Cunningham. The villain was immediately pursued by the citizens of Coplah, and overtaken, when he confessed the hellous crime, and was immediately hung by the enraged parties who captured him. The lady was alone at her home when the negro came upon her from the woods, and after accomplishing his hellish purpose, forced her to swear upon her knees, with the back of his knife across her throat, that she would not reveal his crime. She gave the alarm, however, on the first opportunity.

We understand the Board of Police of this county, at their meeting last Monday, granted the opening of a public road from Holmesville to Magnolia, (Prewett's Depot,) on the New Orleans and Jackson Railroad, and have appointed commissioners to survey and locate the same.

STAGE ACCIDENT.—The Mobile Advertiser, of T

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Agricultural.

The soil of the South is generally so fertile that the impression is almost universal among the agricultural community there is no deterioration or wear out to it. Such, however, is not the experience of the observant and reasoning planter. It is a self-evident fact that all lands from which crops are annually taken, and no fertilising ingredients returned, must necessarily become less productive, until finally it has to be abandoned to "old fields." This system of cropping without mercy is all wrong, and ought to be abandoned by those who love their homes too well to seek new ones. It pays our more indefatigable Northern farmers to rest their lands, to plough under green and fertilising crops, and to give to their soil liberally of manures; so liberally, that some of our readers would deem the amount so expended fabulous. And why should it not pay us in this favored region? It would, in an equal degree.

May Work.—Fields that were sowed in oats in the fall ought now to be broken up and planted with sweet potatoes or cowpeas. All kinds of food for man and beast must necessarily be very nigh next fall, as our surplus cereals will be required for Europe, whether the war which is now desolating the chief grain-growing portion of that continent be continued or not. And it stands every tiller of the soil in hand to see that no ground lies unnecessarily idle. Even in our own slightish and apparently sterile piney woods land, with good tillage and a few dollars laid out for fertilizers, crops of peas and sweet potatoes might be raised that would astonish the natives. We would here remark that sweet potatoes are at the present moment selling in this city at a dollar and a half per bushel. The season has been one of unexampled drought, and it has continued so long dry that we may reasonably look for rain soon. Take advantage of any showers that may pass by and put in a few acres of late corn. A fair crop of this grain may be made, even if not put in the ground until the tenth of July. And recollect, too, that this month of May is the time to secure large crops of cabbage by sowing seeds every favorable wet spell. To enable every plant to withstand a drought, nothing is better than deep ploughing, and if you afterwards use a subsoil plough, penetrating the earth two feet deep below the surface, you will benefit your crop vastly.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

We learn that the concourse of travelers at Niagara Falls begins early this season. A late Buffalo paper says the arrivals at the Clifton House, on the Canada side, averaged fifty a day; and the hotels on the New York side were also filling up, though it was apprehended that the effect of the Liquor law would soon be to drive visitors across the river for their accommodation.

Capt. Ingraham has declined the public dinner tendered him by the citizens of Philadelphia.

The U. The Star learns that all were well on board.

The London Leader, of a recent date, has the following in regard to Irish emigration:

The "Exodus" from Ireland still continues at a very great rate, notwithstanding the attempts made by the priests to prevent the people from going to America, which has fallen into great disfavor in consequence of the Know-Nothing agitation. A paper which is supposed to speak the sentiments of John of Tuam, observes: "While the Irish Catholic race was treated with kindness in America, we never uttered a word of remonstrance or warning; but now that all parties agree in complaining of the dreadful persecutions which await them from all the powers of Know-Nothingism" in the hitherto boasted land of liberty, we feel it our imperative duty to raise our voice in protest and reclamation. Bad as home is, and cold as is the prospect that awaits our people under a system of laws that obstinately refuse security for tenant industry, it is better to remain and battle with the ills they know than fly to others of a more revolting kind. A quiet death in the old land of the saints, with the aid of religious consolation in that awful hour, is better than contact with awful demoralization and almost total absence of religious comforts which await the emigrant beyond the Atlantic." The Irish Roman Catholics now look upon Canada as the land where all creeds and classes may enjoy liberty, although under the "upas-tree" of English rule.

The Patent Office at Washington has recently received a quantity of the Cassabar melon seed, seven years old, procured from Persia by the United States dragoman at Constantinople. These melons, it will be recollected, are of a very sweet and delicious flavor, very wholesome and nutritious, and are so simple in their character that they may be eaten by invalids with impunity. Those who receive the seeds for cultivation should bear in mind that if planted in the vicinity of any of the melon, pumkin, cucumber, or any of the gourd-bearing plants, they are liable to be hybridized or mixed, which will change the character of the seeds and destroy the purity of the variety; consequently they should be planted in an isolated position when influenced in the manner indicated above.

The pay of the French soldier is one cent per day. Out of that munificent endowment, he must provide himself with thread, needles, &c., to keep his uniform in repair. Then he must replace all things lost or spoiled while in his possession, from the army stores. He is furnished with one pair of pantaloons, and one pair of shoes per year, and one coat every two years. On leaving service at the end of the seven years, the gun, sabre and coat are taken from him, and whatever is left he is entitled to.

The Chicago Democrat says Messrs. Gibbs & Griffin have at present over four hundred thousand bushels of wheat and corn in their immense warehouse on North Water street. This is the largest quantity of grain ever gathered together in one warehouse in that city.

They have funny names for newspapers out in Iowa. The three daily papers published at Keokuk are called respectively: The Gate City, The Morning Glory, and The Keokuk Nip-and-Tuck.

Produce is high enough everywhere, but in Nova Scotia nearly every article of the kind seems to have reached famine prices. On the 5th inst., flour was selling at Halifax at sixteen dollars a barrel. When we consider that Canada raises a large surplus of breadstuffs, this is somewhat extraordinary.

On the night of the 13th a man named John Slaughter was stabbed and instantly killed in Norfolk, Va., by two men named Decker and Geddine, who were arrested.

The Military Camels.—The Washington Star furnishes the following information in regard to the subject of obtaining these "Ships of the Desert" for purposes of military transportation, etc.

Major Wayne has been selected, very properly, to conduct the experiment. To that end he is about to start for the East, travelling overland from Liverpool or Havre. He is to purchase about fifty camels in Persia, of the kind which has been in use in that quarter of Asia for military purposes for centuries. Indeed, the Persians for 120 years have had a corps of artillery called "Zambqurek, in which dromedaries play a conspicuous part: In so much as the guns are transported on the backs of these animals, from which they are also fired. These guns carry a leaden ball weighing about half a pound. These dromedaries are accustomed to a climate almost identical with that of the region in which it is proposed to use them in the United States. For four months in the year they are accustomed to snow and much mud. These animals range in value in Persia from $15 to $75 usually, very choice ones bringing $150 at times.

The United States ship Supply, in which they are to be brought hither, is to leave a cargo of stores in the Mediterranean for our squadron stationed there, on her way out. After taking in her return cargo of camels, she will probably make for Indianola, Texas, and there land them. Two or three scientific gentlemen are now engaged in investigating facts connected with the climate of the various parts of the United States, in order to ascertain where it will be best to have them pass their first winter. It will be recollected that they travel comfortably sixty miles without food or water, and live on food which other animals of burden reject. We are firm believers that the experiment will succeed and hope yet to see camels used as ordinary beasts of burden in our country.

Anecdote of Napoleon.—One day the First Consul, on dismounting from his horse, and traversing the gallery adjoining the centre saloon at Malmaison, stopped to examine a portfolio of engravings which had been placed upon a table at the park end of the gallery. Isabey is said to have entered at the end next the court. The First Consul was then slim, and wore the uniform of the guides or horse chasseurs of the Guard—that beloved uniform, the very sight of which makes the heart beat. Eugene Beauharnais, as I have observed before, was Colonel of that fine regiment. Isabey, who had not heard the First Consul return from his ride, seeing a small slender figure in the uniform of the chasseurs, and observing the two epaulettes, supposed it to be Eugene, with whom he was extremely intimate, and determined to take him by surprise. Dexterous, light, active and supple as a cat in his movements, he advanced softly without the slightest sound upon the First Consul, and alighted in a straddle on his neck. Napoleon imagined the house was falling or that the old gentleman was come to strangle him. Rising up, he disengaged himself by main force from his new-fashioned collar, and threw poor Isabey in his turn upon the ground, and, presenting to his dismayed view a countenance for which he was certainly little prepared, demanded in a severe tone: "What is the meaning of this buffoonery?"

"I thought it was Eugene," stammered out the luckless youth.

"And suppose it was Eugene," replied the First Consul, "must you needs break his shoulder-bones?" and he walked out of the gallery.

This story, though carefully concealed, was soon bruited about. The First Consul had too much tact not to perceive that his was the ridiculous share of the adventure; Isabey understood it too, full as well, and both would willingly have kept the secret. But, whether the one in the first moment of his terror, related the whole to Eugene himself, or the other in his resentment could not withhold it from Madame Bonaparte, the affair got wind. I know that a short time afterward the truth was denied. At all events, if it caused the departure of Isabey and his loss to our company, I must call it injustice, and an act of useless injustice, for truly one must be illegally doscended, and without any mixture of inferior blood, from Timon or Heraclitus, to think of the First Consul escaladed in this fashion, without laughing. Something of a Bear Story.—A gentleman who has traveled in Texas tells the following of one of the first settlers in Austin county, of that State, and which, of course, is vouched for as being literally true:

In the summer of 1827, he said he was engaged in getting timber in the Brazos Bottom, and the cane being so thick, he had to cut a pathway through some fifty yards to get to the best timber-trees, and, as was customary in those days, no one ever went from their houses without their rifles. Having occasion one day to come out of the brake to see some neighbors, who had ridden as near as they could without rithont riding in the cane, he left his rifle, and walked over to the edge of the cane, to where his friends were sitting on their horses. After conversing some time they left, and he turned to go to his timber; but, to his surprise and astonishment, what should he behold, after advancing about fifteen paces toward the tree, but a huge bear sitting erect on his haunches, with his rifle cocked, and aimed in a direct range with the pathway in which he was returning, and, "For me," saye he in relating it, "I felt as if my days were numbered. I had no way to retreat, except along my straight little path, and I just commenced getting on my knees for the last time, as I thought, when the bear, seeing this, did his best to fire; but Providence was on my side; my rifle was donhle trigger, and Bruin did not understand it, and that was all that saved me."

Pill Takers.—There are people in the world who physic themselves to death. We have known men to flee to pills for relief for every kind of ill. They had what may be called a pill mania. Some of these pill devonrers would present a startling sum total, could they give in round numbers the amonnt taken during a life-time. We recollect hearing of one man, in the western part of New York State, the total of whose pill-taking was recorded as follows: In twenty-one years he took 236,034, which is at the rate of 10,806 per year, or 29 per day. He began, however, it would seem, with a moderate appetite, which increased as he grew older; for, during the eight years preceding his death—of course he died—he swallowed pills at the rate of 78 per day! In one year, just before he shuffled off his pill coil, he took not less than 51,000! The most surprising part of the story is yet to be told: in addition to all the pills recorded, this victim swallowed, at various times 50,000 bottles of mixtures. These facts were obtained, we would add, from a respectable apothecary, near where our medicine-maniac lived from boyhood to death; and who furnished him with all he wanted in his line. There is a question in our mind, whether the respectable apothecary, as aforesaid, was an accessory to the murder of his profitable customer; for, that he was murdered, would seem to be a fixed fact.

Legal.—The other day, the present week, a lady, the owner of a grocery in Natchez, was on trial charged with selling whisky to a slave without the written permit of the owner. The spy, who had been sent to smell out such offences, stood near the door, and testified that he saw the negro take a gallon jug from his wagon, without a cork, and empty, because he turned it bottom upward, carry it into the store, give it to the lady, who carried it into a back room, staid a short time, brought it out and gave it to the negro, also giving him some money at the same time, although the said witness had not seen the negro give the lady any money. The jug was full, and the liquor was whisky, because the witness took the jug from the negro and drank of it.

The learned District Attorney, Merwin, contended that it was plain that the money handed the negro was change for money paid by the negro; but the adroit counsel for the lady, Judge Thatcher, gravely appealed to the court, if the circumstances of the case did not bear him ont in the very probable supposition that the benevolent lady, finding herself by some foul means, in possession of some villainous red-eye, "gave the negro the money to pay him for removing it from her premises!"

A broad grin illuminated nearly every face in the court. Even the usually rigid features of Judge Posey gave indications of a smothered smile, under which he gracefully took a glass of ice-water. The result was the jury was hung and not the lady. [Concordia Intellgencer.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

The steamship Mexico, Capt Hawiess, arrived on Saturday last from Galveston, with dates to the 17th and full files of papers from the interior.

The Galveston Gazette has the following paragraph:

By the mails received this morning we have exchanges from almost every quarter of the State, and we are glad to learn that the drought is at an end. Showers have fallen in every section, and the prospect for the crops is brighter in consequence. It may be that some districts have not yet been visited by rain, but if there are any such they must be limited. All our accounts go to show that the rains have been general, and we believe that at this time enough has fallen for present agricultural purposes. Heavy hailstorms have fallen in the west, and done some damage to the young corn.

The Houston Telegraph of the 16th says:

Every mail from the interior brings us cheering accounts of copious rains and encouraging prospects once more to the farmers. In this vicinity we have had enough rain for the present, but the indications are that we shall have more yet. Planters now want an opportunity to work their crops, a good many have yet to plant and replant a portion of their fields. The accounts from the cane region are more favorable, and we take occasion to congratulate our readers on account of the sudden and happy termination of the anxieties occasioned by the extraordinary drought, so universally experienced throughout the State ten days ago.

A white man who stole a negro woman and her two children, in Harrison county, was pursued in Arkansas and the negroes recovered.

The Crocket Printer gives the following account of a shooting affair, in which Dr. Inman, of that place, was seriously wounded:

Dr. Inman was standing in a dry goods store when Burton entered and said, "What sort of a d——d letter is that you wrote me." The Dr. said "If you have the letter it will explain itself." Burton then presented the letter with the left hand and almost instantly fired a pistol with his right at Dr. Inman. The ball took effect immediately under the orbit of the eye, ranging backward and downward about four inches.

Burton attempted to escape but was captured, and is now in jail.

An affray occurred a few days ago in Centreville, in which a young man named Walker, a printer, was stabbed in the abdomen, by a man named May.

The Dallas Herald publishes news from Fort Belknap that the Indians were coming into the reserve in large numbers, and that those from the north had brought with them that loathsome disease, the small-pox. Cars had been taken, however, by the Indian Agent, to keep those infected by the disease from communication with the others.

An affray occurred in San Antonio on the night of the 5th inst., between Terry O'Neal, Wm. G. Tobin and Joe Malloy. Malloy fired a pistol at O'Neal, shattering his left arm, when Tobin shot Malloy, killing him instantly. Tobin was allowed to escape next day with impunity.

Near Eagle Pass, on the 30th ult, the body of a man was found, much mutilated by carrion birds. The cap of the deceased, found near the body, proved him to have been a man named McCool, who had deserted from the army. It is supposed that he was murdered.

The Austin State Gazette has the following paragraph:

The long-expected rain has come at last. On Wednesday night we had a very plentiful rain, and a moderate continuance on the following morning. With the present rain, we believe the corn crops will be made without a doubt. We are now satisfied that our prediction will be verified, and that our harvest for cotton as well as corn will surpass any of our sister States.

Owing to the large accumulation of snow in the mountains, it is thought that the Colorado will be very high this season. All the peaks and high points of the Wichita mountains were covered with snow at last accounts. A gentleman direct from the Wichita country says that the snow is distinctly visible on most of the mountain summits. The mountains separating the Colorado and the Pecos are also covered with snow. The indications are favorable to an extensive rise.

We have three forts, McKavel, Chadbourne and Hallbnap, which belt our Indian country, and we are informed by Major Neighbors that there are but six companies of military apportioned to these forts, and these are but skeletons of companies. On the Rio Grande, on the other hand, the heaviest distribution of the military is made. We believe there are more at Fort Duncan than in the whole of the Indian country. We mention these things from information we have received on very good authority, and in view of the necessity of more fully protecting our frontier. From what we learn there is evidently a want of distribution of military force in the Indian country.

We learn from Boston that the ship Climax, has been lost in the harbor of Callao, with a cargo of guano. She belonged to Messrs Howes & Cromwell, of Boston, and was insured for $60,000 on the ship and $30,000 on the freight, in various companies of the city of Baltimore.

The jury in the case of James C. Barnard, charged in the U. S. Circuit Court, at Philadelphia, with engaging in the slave trade and piracy in the brig Grey Eagle, have returned a verdict of "not guilty."

Another Powder Mill Explosion.—A dispatch of the 4th, from Wilmington states that Garicha's drying and grinding powder mills blew up at 11 o'clock that morning with a tremendous explosion. Nobody hurt.

Mrs. Stowe Burnt in Effigy.—The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer states that within the past few days the University of Virginia has been the scene of incidents hardly creditable to the chivalry of the Old Dominion. Miss Beecher, an able and accomplished lady, the sister of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and of Mrs. Stowe, visited the vicinity of that institution. Her presence was soon known, and she was treated to a mock serenade, and Mrs Stowe was burnt in effigy.

Singular Escape.—A few days since, while Mrs. Banforth, of Warren, Pa, was engaged in her usual duties, a heavy thunder storm came up, and in the midst of its fury a lightning stroke descended upon her, burning her hair from the crown of her head to the back of the neck, melting her hair pins, and proceeding down her body—leaving its mark as it went—until it passed through the floor. Strange to say, the lady lived and is rapidly recovering.

Compulsory Vaccination.—A bill is before the Massachusetts Legislature which makes it compulsory on parents, guardians, overseers of charitable institutions, prisons, the selectmen of towns, and Mayor and Aldermen of cities, etc., to see that all persons who may come under their charge, are duly vaccinated; and any neglect of this duty shall be punished by a fine of five dollars for each and every year of such neglect.

Judge Lynch in Virginia.—In Guyandotte, Cabell county, Va., on the 29th ult., a number of young men turned out for the purpose of riding on a rail a man named White, for whipping his wife. The fellow got an axe, and locking himself in an upper room of the house defied the crowd. The master was compromised by his promising to leave town and not return any more, which promise was faithfully kept.

A few days ago a woman went on board a ferry boat plying between Philadelphia and Baltimore, having in her arms an infant which was crying very loudly. On the way over she threw the child into the water and it was drowned. She was arrested in Camden.

At the municipal election in Homesdale, Pa., on the 11th, the entire American ticket was elected.

The Louisville Courier of the 12th publishes a long letter from Professor Morse to Bishop Spalding, in answer to the Bishop's charge that he (Professor Morse) could not prove that Lafayette ever used the words, "If ever the liberties of this country (the United States) are ruined, it will be by the Romish priests." Professor Morse proves that Lafayette did use the expression, and also make it appear that Bishop Spalding's evidence to the contrary is unworthy of belief.

In return for the splendid Haras, value about 2,000,000 reals, recently presented to the Pope by the Queen of Spain, his Holiness has sent her Majesty the body of St Felix the Martyr.

From the Rio Grande.—The True American, published at Colliad, Texas, publishes the following:

By the kindness of H. Clay Davis, who left the Rio Grande on Monday last, we learn that another revolution has broke out in Mexico. About fifteen hundred soldiery had crossed the river, headed by Garza, ex-Governor of Tamaulipas; Capestran, Carvajal, O Campo and J. M. Canales. Their detention this long has been in consequence of their waiting the arrival of Robles from New Orleans, who was recently banished from Mexico by Santa Anna.

The following letter from the special correspondent of the American, at Brownsville, goes to authenticate the above statement:

Brownsville, April 26, 1855.—Dear Sir: We have nothing of special interest on the Rio Grande except peace and quietude now. In fact, everything has been unusually still for the last three weeks. But a "calm always precedes a storm." It is a notorious fact that another revolution will open in a few days under General Caravajal, and the ball commences at Camargo. General Woll received a dispatch by courier yesterday, saying Caravajal was opposite Camargo with 400 men, one half Americans; but nobody believes the latter part of the report. The filibusters may get some Americans to join them from Corpus Christi, such as discharged teamsters and soldiers, but none from off this side of the Rio Grande. The Americans here have all seen the elephant.

Night before last an entire company of soldiers deserted from Matamoras to this side, but not one has been seen here. The whole matter has been thus far managed with masterly secrecy. Heaven knows what the result will be; the Mexicans are quiet geniuses in regard to revolutions, notwithstanding their natural love of the thing. General Woll has thrown a great many citizens in prison who he suspects of being friendly to the revolutionists.

A Copenhagen letter writer says in relation to the Sound dues question:

On the 12th instant, the Charge d'Affaires of the United States to this Court, Col. Bedinger, had an official interview with the Danish Minister for Foreign Affairs, in which he delivered the formal notice of his Government of the cessation of the treaty of the 26th April, 1826, between the two countries, after the lapse of the term stipulated in the treaty (twelve months) expressing himself at the same time, with his usual energy of character, with a force of language which the American diplomatists so well know how to adopt when they wish their hearers to know that they are in earnest, and will not suffer themselves or their country to be trifled with.

Presidency of Liberia.—The Presidential election in Liberia was to have taken place on 1st inst. President Roberts has declined a reelection. Edward J. Roye and Stephen A. Benson were the opposing candidates. Roye, some ten year ago, was a barber at Terre Haute, Indiana, and on emigrating to Liberia became a successful merchant at Monrovia. He has been a member and speaker of the House of Representatives of that Republic; was a candidate two years ago for the Presidency against President Roberts, and is now editing and publishing a paper in that country. He is said to be a pure African. Benson emigrated to Liberia when a child. He is the principal merchant at Bassa Cove; has filled the office of Judge of one of the highest Courts of Liberia, and is now Vice-President of the Republic. He is represented as a man of talent, and of great popularity.

The Telegraph from Sebastopol to London.—A telegraph dispatch dated Balaklava, Wednesday evening, 25th, was received at the War Office at half-past 12 o'clock, on Thursday. The delay in the transmission of the message arises from the fact that the electric wires between Cape Chilastra (where the wire dips into the Black Sea) and Varna, a distance of twenty miles, are not completed, nor, we believe, is the wire carried into Balaklava from St. George's Monastery. When the telegraph is carried up to Head-quarters, whence one to the trenches is already laid down, the field officer in command during the night will at the same moment, announce a sortie to Lord Raglan, and to the Prime Minister in Downing street.

The American Ship Great Republic.—The large American clipper ship Great Republic, which arrived in the Thames from New York about a month since, and had been lying off Purfleet, has been taken up by the French Government for the conveyance of troops to the Crimea, and is to proceed to Marseilles on Friday. The Great Republic, it is stated, will be able to receive on board and comfortably berth as many as 2000 soldiers.

Advices from St. Petersburg mention that for some weeks past no British subject has been allowed to leave the country. The refusal to grant passports was coupled with an intimation that cases having transpired of English mechanics having held meetings and refused to work, any repetition of such conduct would cause them to be sent into the interior.

The Electric Telegraph in Spain.—The Madrid Gazette, of the 19th, contains a royal decree sanctioning the bill adopted by the Cortes for establishing a general system of telegraphic lines throughout the Peninsula. The first lines to be set up are to be from Saragossa to Barcelona, so as to place the latter city in communication with Madrid, from Madrid to Cadiz, and Madrid to the Portuguese frontier.

An entrenched camp for 40,000 men is to be established near Constantinople, and will be occupied by French troops; the city is also to be strongly fortified. The French will be established in Turkey, and it is predicted will never again leave there.

There are 650 cannons and mortars, of the largest size, mounted and playing on Sebastopol, whilst the Russians have 2000 pieces in position for the defence of the place, with a still overflowing arsenal. All the above is exclusive of the artillery of the armies on both sides.

What the Spectator Sees and Hears During the Bombardment.—It is something awful to stand upon the hills which overlook the town and watch the progress of the nightly bombardment. The Congreve rockets rush from the French batteries with a deafening roar, leaving a light trail of fire behind, just sufficient to trace the course of the missile as it darts vaguely hither and thither through the air, settling down at last with a loud crash in the Flagstaff. This wild, dramatic course occasionally lands them outside the Russian lines, and now and then forces them clear over every thing into the the very centre of the town. From both right and left the mortars are discharged with a heavy, painful explosion, and with a flash which, even at a distance, is almost blinding.

As the dull boom shakes your very frame, you hear the shell with a kind of whistling roar mount higher and higher into the air, till having reached its zenith it descends with redoubtable speed and force into the enemy's works. The ebook with which it strikes the ground can be distinctly heard even in the Allied camp, followed in a second after by a sharp rending explosion, in the bright glare of which the earth is thrown up like a cloud. The enemy are replying to each shot with many long guns, some mortars; but use no rockets at all; and whenever a pause occurs in the cannonade, the sharp, quick rattling of the musketry makes itself audible in the advanced trenches, till the recommencing roar of artillery drowns all other sounds.

REGISTRY OF LETTERS.—The New York Tribune, in an article upon the new Post-office regulation for registering valuable letters, says:

This plan may be well enough so far as it goes, though we doubt if it is much of an improvement. A perfect account of the letter is made at the office in which it is deposited; the receipt will be evidence that it was duly mailed; so, if it reaches its place of destination, the regulations are such that it would be likely to be delivered. But suppose it to be stolen on the route? as it may be, as well as any other letter. Indeed, it is quite obvious that if there are any miscarriages of letters after the period above referred to, it will be among those packages directed to postmasters; for, being so addressed, of course they may be presumed to contain money, and will be just the ones to be purloined.

What the peculiar desire is a system by which money may be safely remitted, we confess. The plan in question does not appear to us to be at that character. There is more risk about it than under the present system, for now a dishonest clerk must steal a whole mail to be certain of finding letters containing money, whereas under the new plan the valuable letters are separated from the ordinary ones by the Department itself, and it will only be necessary to steal a single package to obtain a haul.

The Tribune favors the system in operation in Great Britain, where the Government takes the risk and makes good all losses.

The railroad train which left Baltimore on the afternoon of the 14th inst., ran upon a bridge on fire four miles east of Annapolis Junction. The locomotive and four passenger cars got over safely, but the last car and way mail car ran off, slightly injuring the brakeman and mail agent.

We would, however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, for it also, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections, where known. They are manufactured by Samuel Griswold, of Griswoldville, Georgia; who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

Dr. John Beckwith,	William McNutt,
Hon. S. C. Posey,	H. W. Kimball,
Geo. G. Raoland,	William Watkins,
A. C. Barton,	John W. Fairson,
D. L. Dinsmore,	Rev. Duncan Brown,
Col. Isaac Lane,	Jerome B. Pillow,

S. GRISWOLD & CO.

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Winter Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and gote well. They are quite convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be. A. H. McLean, Rutherford county, Tenn.

SCOLDING IN THE PULPIT.

A lady correspondent of the New Orleans Christian Advocate complains of the preacher scolding his hearers in the pulpit. She says: "He has a way of talking which anywhere but in the pulpit would pass for scolding. This is not common; it is only now and then; but very marked. I suppose he does not mean well, or the subject in hand gets tangled. His fine forehead frowns and wrinkles. Around his mouth there are curling and sneering, and almost ill-natured expressions. What he says is hard and harsh. His eye, so beautiful and persuasive when glowing with love or moistened by a tear for poor sinners, looks on us all as if he was outdone, and didn't care if we did go to the bad place."

This is a painful picture to study, even in part. It must be still more so in reality. The pulpit which exhibits it will always be unpopular, and richly deserves the dislike it never fails to invoke. The minister who, with frowning brow and stern expression, hurls harsh denunciations on his hearers hoping to benefit them thereby, must be sadly ignorant of human nature. He does not understand that the door of access to the human spirit cannot be forced by the blows of angry denunciation; and that the only effect of such attempts upon it is to force the naturally perverse mind to lock itself up more closely, and to retire within its most inaccessible defences. Even a church will become cursed, disgusted and backslidden under a scolding ministry. It cannot be otherwise while the constitution of human nature remains what it is. It must be that the manifestations of the preacher's mind will beget manifestations in the hearer kindred to his own. If he is angry, harsh and denunciatory, they will feel angry, harsh and stern, too. Certainly they will not, cannot be reformed under such a ministry. It is not in the nature of things to expect it. If a minister would be successful, love must reign supremely in his pulpit. His mission is a work of love. His spirit should be the same. Even when unwilling, as he often must, the judgments of God against transgressors, he should speak in tones of tenderest affection. When his lips utter ance to the woes which hang like clouds big with destruction over the wilful sinner's head, he should do it with pity in his heart and tears in his eyes. By thus combining the strictest fidelity to truth, in its severest aspects, with the strongest and best affections of his nature, he will retain the respect and confidence of his hearers, while he unlocks their prejudices, and throws open the gateway of their hearts for the entrance of his Master.—Zion's Herald.

TEMPERANCE INFORMATION.

FRANKLIN, LA., May 22, 1855.

Mr. Editor—Please publish the following for the information of our temperance friends who are anxious to cooperate with us in redeeming our State from the controlling influence of alcohol;

TEMPERANCE INFORMATION.

The I. O. of Good Samaritans and Daughters of Samaria have organized a State Grand Lodge at Franklin, parish of St. Mury, La. It requires at least twelve petitioners, six males and six females, to secure a charter; the cost of the charter is ten dollars. Quite a number of Methodist preachers of this State could organize subordinate lodges, (they being members of the order,) by special appointment from us. All that is necessary for the friends of this cause to do to secure a charter, books, &c., is for some friend to draw up a petition to the Grand Lodge of this State, promising to conform to the constitution and by-laws of the order; forward the petition to us at Franklin, enclosing the ten dollars, and all of the rest will be done for them. Let each petition state where they wish the lodge located. Any of the Preachers who joined the order at Franklin or elsewhere can, by special appointment from us, organize lodges in their fields of labor. I have lost brother Fisher Rawson's letter and address. I hope he, with others, will forward their petitions, with as many names as they can get, at once to us at Franklin, and let us go to work at once in good earnest to redeem our state by the order that calls out fully female influence and cooperation. This order has done wonders in Texas, and, if properly favored by temperance men, can do the same in Louisiana. N. A. CRAVENS.

DRESS.—A correspondent of the Richmond Ch. Advocate complains of another article in favor of the wearing of jewelry by Christians. The editor, mediating, says:

"One of the best things we ever heard the Rev. J. N. Maffit say, was on the subject of dress. He said he did not intend to try to preach their jewelry and costly array off of them. If he went into the woods to shoot a bird, he would not try to shoot its feathers off. He would shoot right in the heart at once. So, said he, the best way to promote plainness of dress is to shoot right in the heart, to kill sin dead in the soul. We give his ideas, not his words. There's a spice of wisdom in the thought; and it is very suggestive."

THE PAST AND THE PRESENT.

THE CONTRAST.

BY A SUPERANNUATE.

Brother McTyeire:—The perusal of your paper of May 12 called up reminiscences and events in my mind beyond the reach of your personal recollection. You have been looking into the volume of "Bound Minutes of the Annual Conferences." With the contents of that interesting history of Church statistics, and with many, very many of the men whose names are there recorded, I have been familiar for threescore years.

To account for the appearance and disappearance of men professing to be "moved by the Holy Ghost to take on them the work of the ministry," is not an easy task; especially if we make the record the only rule of judging. Many may be, and often have been "moved by the Holy Ghost to take on them the work of the ministry," even in the Methodist Church, whose names appeared but for a short time on the minutes, or never appeared there at all, who made full proof of their call to that holy work. Being moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the gospel is one thing, and being called to enter or remain on the itinerant lists, is another; the former is imperative, the latter depends on circumstances and the openings of Providence.

The significant question, "Who have located through weakness of body or family concerns?" stood regularly on the Annual Minutes; and here the names of many useful preachers disappeared from the list of traveling preachers. And mark the causes: First, "bodily weakness, or weakness of body." There is a striking, and, I might add, a lamentable contrast between the zeal, labors, &c., of traveling preachers of the past and present generation.

There is a material difference between preaching twenty-five or more times in a month, meeting as many classes, holding many prayer meetings, &c., as was the custom forty or fifty years ago, and that of preaching four times in a month, and meeting no classes, &c., as the manner of some now is. There was also a marked difference between the spirit and manner of performing these labors, and the wear and tear on the constitution was more rapid.

Second—When I was transferred, by Mr. Asbury, from the Western to the Virginia Conference, in 1795, there was not a married preacher in that Conference, although its bounds embraced almost the entire States of Virginia and North Carolina. The reason was, that there was no provision for a preacher's family; to marry and to locate were synonymous. Hence the disappearance from the minutes of the names of many of the able ministers who adorned the Christian ministry in a local sphere. And many of those ministers, with impaired constitutions, ministered to the waste of themselves and families with their own hands, and preached as much as many now called traveling preachers; while the former received no support from the Church, and the latter from $400 to $1,000. So much for the past and the present.

The old men wept over the second temple because it was not, equal to the first; and Moshiem says, "there is no institution so pure and excellent but that will, in time, by the corruption and folly of men, be changed for the worse."

But the cant phrases of "croaker," "old fogyism," &c., are apt to be appropriated, by narrow-minded or superficial thinkers, to one who dares to complain of the removal of "old landmarks," dereliction of duty, "class meeting delinquency," &c.; and few have the moral courage to say with the prophet, "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace." In the days of pristine purity, of simple superintendency, Mr. Asbury (the only superintendent) superintended from twelve to twenty annual conferences, stretching from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the then Far West—Kentucky; and that, too, on horseback, in advanced age.

This is the past; what of the present may be learned from an article in your paper, taken from the St. Louis Advocate, speaking of the "plan of Episcopal visitation." Are these matters at last scrutinized? Some are inquiring.

METHODISM AMONG THE GERMANS.

[The following intelligent testimony to this work among us is from a German-born citizen of this city, one who, by his associations and moral integrity, is every way qualified to judge.—ED.]

NEW ORLEANS, May, 1855.

It may, perhaps, be a matter of great interest to many of our "American brethren" to hear something about this portion of Christ's moral vineyard; in anticipation of which we venture to portray a brief sketch about this unpretending but goodly heritage of our blessed Lord.

For many years it has been our privilege to witness the untiring, self-denying zeal of the German missionaries stationed in this city. Our observations of the past entitle us to the most flattering hopes for the future. The field in which they labor is one of great interest, and could not have been supplied with more pious servants of the Lord than those which are at present engaged in this hallowed work. We are happy to state that they have not labored in vain. No, thanks be unto the Lord, many are the souls that have been converted under their ministration, and are added to the Church of God! Yes, the sound of their shoutings and rejoicings must undoubtedly have re'choed in the heavens, and nothing but eternity will be able to reveal the whole extent of this glorious cause. The fostering care which our Conference has bestowed to this promising portion of the Methodist Church will and must ultimately result beneficially to the institution of Christ at large, and to the saving of souls individually. Not many years hence, and Southern Methodists will number thousands of thousands among the German population of this happy land. The kingdom of darkness, which has gained such a stronghold among our German countrymen, must eventually crumble into dust, and that of the merciful Redeemer be established, when faithful soldiers enlist. Oh! these happy little flocks, when they congregate in their little sanctuaries for divine service; then it is that their countenances beam with heavenly joy and rapture. Freely they drink of the spiritual and living water as it gushes out from the eternal rock, even our Lord Jesus Christ. Their ministers, filled with the Holy Ghost, bring the powerful word of the Cross home to every heart, and a powerful and saving influence pervades their assemblies on almost every occasion.

Their prayer and class meetings are indeed proofs of Christ's sanctified Church on earth. The most hardened sinner cannot but receive favorable impressions of the reality of our blessed religion when in their midst.

Their faith is carried into every day practice, every one of them becomes a missionary. Sinners are sought and efforts made everywhere to bring them under the saving influence of the gospel. Pastors and members are daily congregated to enlarge the borders of Christ's Kingdom on earth. Infidelity, superstition and self-righteousness are bound to give way when such means are being made use of to bring sinners to the knowledge as it is in Jesus.

Thus it is plain that all care and sacrifice bestowed upon this branch of the Methodist Church by our American brethren is being crowned with success.

We would, in conclusion, direct the attention of the entire Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to the missionary cause amongst the Germans. The Macedonian call, "Come and help us," rings throughout our land. May the Church of God, then, be up and do her duty; may the means and assistance be forthcoming to bring sinners into the eternal sheepfold of our only and true shepherd, Jesus Christ, is the humble prayer of one of the least. EVENINGS WITH SIR THOS. BROWNE.

Extracts and Comments.

"Be charitable before wealth make thee covetous, and lose not the glory of the mite. If riches increase, let thy mind hold pace with them; and think it not enough to be liberal, but munificent."—EXT.

The force of the exhortation, "Be charitable," is strengthened by the word "before." A great deal of human virtue is anticipative; it must be acquired in advance of those circumstances, which will test its efficuciousness. Men must learn the science of number ere they go into the business of practical computation. Concrete must not undertake to manage a campaign without a previous knowledge of the art of warfare. The rule of wisdom is to be sure of our power ere we attempt its exercise.

I know of nothing in Providence more beautiful than its watchful care of human virtue. How early the child is taken into the arms of Heaven; how closely folded to the bosom of its Peace; how sweetly taught to lisp the language of a higher world! The moral work is begun before the young spirit is sent abroad into the open world. The divine Friend puts in the first claim, and solicits the heart in the budding of its desires. Influence is very much determined by times and seasons. It is, indeed, a thing of dates. A moment in the freshness of life is worth more than hours afterward. The study of the almanac of existence ought to be the next study to the Bible.

Our faith in childhood is almost a mockery. We fall far short of truth and hope. Christianity warrants any degree of effort in behalf of childhood. It tells us that it is near to God—only a small gap between—and that our work is to close it up, and so shut out the entrance of new evils. But, alas! we neglect the most sacred commission of our office, and the gap widens, deepens, darkens into a huge gulf. I find few people who view childhood as a holy trust. It bears their name, inherits their blood, enjoys their protection. They feed and clothe it; pay the schoolmaster to give instruction and the doctor to cure its disease, and otherwise meet its necessities. But parents are the trustees of Heaven. The treasures of Christ are deposited in their hands, and they stand indebted to the revenues of eternity. How much could be added to the wealth of human souls, if we invested the prudence of clear foresight, the deeds of earnest endeavor, the prayers of intercessory nights, in this loan of immortality granted us in childhood! The world is to be redeemed in its children: and until our methods reach them we shall have no title to the dignity of Christian Reformers. No such words as "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven" are found elsewhere or in other connections than the Bible. Childhood is the image-spirit of the celestial Paradise. Man and woman were before the curse, but childhood came after it; and it would seem as if this gentle creature of promise, entering on life in the yoke of prophecy, were designed to renew the assurance of salvation to those who seek it and bring, as in a living gospel, "tidings of great joy" to the households that cherish them. IDEALIST.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

The U. S. Mail steamship Granada, Capt. Griffin, arrived on Saturday last from New York, via Havana, bringing the California mails and passengers transferred to her at the former place by the El Dorado.

We have received by this arrival San Francisco papers up to the 1st inst., but they contain scarcely any thing of interest.

The State Legislature was expected to adjourn in a few days. A bill had been passed providing for the purchase of the portraits of Gen. John A. Sutter and Gen. John E. Wool.

The San Francisco branch mint was to be reopened on the 1st inst., for the reception of deposits, and the operations of the mint were to be resumed on the 7th.

The pastures being very abundant this year in California, the San Francisco Herald estimates low prices for stock from this cause as much as from the hard times.

The same paper is urging the making of a vigorous effort to have San Francisco the depot for the Pacific whaling fleet. Towards that end the Legislature of the State has made material reductions in the port charges, and it is hoped the Executive and the Board of Commerce of San Francisco will adopt active measures to complete what has been so well begun.

The clipper ship Neptune's Car, Patten, from New York, arrived at San Francisco on the 25th ult., and clipper ship S. S. Bishop, Shankland, 127 days from Philadelphia, arrived on the 29th. No other arrival from Atlantic ports reported.

The Times and Transcript states that Col. Walker and the expedition to Nicaragua had not sailed on the 1st inst., but arrangements were on foot to give the brig Vesta, which is to convey the expedition, speedy despatch.

Another monster nugget has been found. The Sacramento Union says, that on the 28th ult., Messrs. T. Lambert and A. Van Sinderen, found a lump of pure gold on their claim on Kentucky Flat, near Rough and Ready, which weighs seventy-two ounces and two penny weights.

The Calaveras Chronicle gives an account of a recent lynching affair at the town of Jesus Maria. A Mexican named Justo Betancour stabbed an old citizen of the place named Wm. Joyce, having no other provocation, as far as could be ascertained, than a demand against Joyce for seven dollars, which the latter had promised to pay on the evening of the same day. The Mexicans were arrested, but a rumor got about that Joyce's doctor had pronounced his wound mortal, and the populace, becoming excited, took Betancour and hung him to a tree.

A correspondent of the Yreka Herald, writing from North Salmon river, says that Deputy Sheriff Ward, with a posse of forty well armed men had recently succeeded in arresting five of the leaders of the mob that hung young Moran, last winter. Others of whom they were in pursuit got wind of the affair and escaped.

A letter to the San Francisco Herald states that the body of a Mexican, hung by the neck, was found a few days ago near the tree where but a short time previously two Mexicans were found hanging by ropes passed into their mouths and through the back part of their necks.

The head of the notorious robber, Jenquin, had been attached by the Sheriff of San Francisco county, to satisfy a judgment for debt. A singular piece of property to seize.

Hadrian and the Planter.

The Emperor Hadrian, passing near Tiberias, in Galilee, observed an old man digging a large trench in order to plant some fig-trees. "Hadst thou properly employed the morning of thy life," said Hadrian, "thou needst not have worked so hard in the evening of thy days." "I have well employed my early days, nor will I neglect the evening of my life; and let God do with me what he thinks best," replied the man. "How old mayest thou be, good man?" asked the Emperor. "A hundred years," was the reply. "What," exclaimed Hadrian, "a hundred years old art thou, and still planting trees? Canst thou, then, hope ever to enjoy the fruits of thy labor?" "Great king," rejoined the hoary-headed man, "yes, I do hope, if God permit, I may even eat the fruit of those very trees; if not, my children will. I have not my forefathers planted trees for me, and shall I not do the same for my children?" Hadrian, pleased with the honest man's reply, said—"Well, old man, if ever thou livest to see the fruit of these trees, let me know it." "Dost thou hear, good old man?" and with these words he left him. The old man did live long enough to see the fruits of his industry. The trees flourished, and here excellent fruit. As soon as they were sufficiently ripe he gathered the most choice figs, put them in a basket, and marched off toward the Emperor's residence. Hadrian happened to look out of the windows of his palace seeing a man bent with age, with a basket on his shoulders, standing near the gate, he ordered him to be admitted to his presence.

"What is thy pleasure, old man?" demanded Hadrian.

"May it please your majesty," replied the man, "to recollect seeing once a very old man planting some trees, when you desired him, if ever he should gather the fruit, to let you know. I am that old man, and this is the fruit of those very trees. May it please you graciously to accept them as an humble tribute of gratitude for your majesty's great condescension."

Hadrian, gratified to see so extraordinary an instance of longevity, accompanied by the full manly faculties and honest exertion, desired the old man to be seated, and ordering the basket to be emptied of the fruit, and to be filled with gold, gave it him as a present. Some courtiers who witnessed this unwelcome scene, exclaimed, "Is it possible that our great Emperor should show so much honor to a miserable Jew?" "Why should I not honor him whom God has honored?" replied Hadrian. "Look at his age and imitate his example." The Emperor then very graciously dismissed the old man, who went home highly pleased and delighted.

The steamer Illinois, which left New York for Aspinwall on the 21st, carried out two companies of United States troops, under the command of Major Prince, to be stationed at Fort Steilacoomb, Washington Territory. Major Prince, who is appointed to the permanent command, served under Gens. Taylor and Scott in Mexico, and was wounded at Molino del Rey.

LATER FROM CHINA.

Hong Kong, March 15.—The events of the month elapsed since the date of the departure of the last mail steamer are more marked by stirring events than for many months previously.

On the 12th inst. Sir John Bowring took his departure on a diplomatic visit to Siam, in her Majesty's steamer Rattler, accompanied by the sloop-of-war Grecian. It is said that Peguese envoy will go to Singapore from Siam, and return to this port by one of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Steamers, the Rattler sailing for England. In China there is generally a strong feeling against Sir J. Bowring—all classes express disappointment and hostility to the measures of the literary diplomatist, and desire his recall. Indeed, the busy tongue of rumor asserts that Sir John's recall is in his pocket, nay that he will proceed from Siam to Singapore and from the latter place to Europe.

Of such elements are the community here composed, that there is probably no men in England, however popular, that would prove a favorite in China with the mercantile community, unless he was disposed to be led by the commercial advantages of those resident in China, to the prejudice of any and every other interest. Every plenipotentiary from Elliot to Bowring, has split upon the same rock, and even an angel would fail to please or realize the unreasonable expectations of every class of the foreign residents.

Affairs at Canton look more settled; for the time, at all events, the rebels have been driven away from the city. The blockade has been put a stop to; and by a combined movement of the imperial soldiers and the people, Canton and the forts in its neighborhood have been freed from the terror-spreading horrors of the insurgents. On the 6th inst., the rebels at Blenheim Reach were taken by surprise, fled precipitately in boats down the river, and for the most part escaped, the imperialists being but too well pleased to regain possession of the forts.

The other strong-holds of the insurgents also fell into the hands of the imperialists, who are reported to have effected their object by buying up the ring-leaders. The imperialists have made a shocking use of their triumph. The place of execution has been a vast carnage field, where headsmen have daily been put to death, in the hope of striking terror into the minds of the population.

At Shanghai, also, the imperialists have succeeded in recapturing the city, followed by frightful atrocities in revenge for opposing the imperial rule. Beyond the mere fact of the capture of the city, little more is known with certainty, the accounts being very conflicting. All accounts agree in representing the foul atrocities committed by the mandarins. Nearly five hundred prisoners have been put to death, and some were tortured in the most frightful manner before being put out of the way. Some of the rebel chiefs have succeeded in escaping, but by far the greater number of the ring-leaders have found themselves in the hands of their unrelenting enemies.

Louisiana.

The Baton Rouge Advocate has the following items:

We learn from one of the obliging officers of the Penitentiary that its affairs are in as prosperous a condition as could be expected from the obstacles to be surmounted, arising from the necessary delays in taking a new start, and other difficulties and unusual drawbacks not within the power of the most vigilant to remedy.

The hauling of water from the river costs $2½ a day.

They are now turning out 3,700 yards of cotton goods daily, and have made since the 2d of May, a full million of brick. They have on hand a large supply of negro shoes and molasses barrels.

We learn that the stock in the vicinity of Baton Rouge are suffering for want of water. A man who went into the woods the other day to dig for water was surrounded in a few minutes after he commenced digging by a large number of cattle, waiting, apparently with great longing, for the appearance of the grateful stream they were doubtless in hopes would gush forth to relieve their parched throats.

The Gazette of Friday last furnishes the following item:

On the 23d inst., a man to our vicinity, fell into his well over thirty feet deep. When the alarm was given the women in the neighborhood, bent on an errand of mercy, came at once to the rescue. Some valiant knights also came, but left again to procure assistance. When they arrived with assistance, they found that the women had rescued the poor fellow from his peril, safe and sound.

The Franklin Banner (parish of St. Mary) gives the following account of a brutal murder:

James H. Buck, a carpenter, residing at Centreville, in this parish, on Tuesday last caused the death of his young slave, a lad about twelve years of age, by the most inhuman and brutal treatment. So far as we have been able to learn the facts of the case, it appears that the lad had a few days before his death run away from his master, for some cause or other, when he was pursued and caught, knocked down, stamped under the feet of the fiendish monster, and kicked upon the head, breast and other parts of the body, until he was quite insensible. He was then taken home and put in chains, and there kept through the night, more dead than alive, and the next morning about ten o'clock, this miserable victim of the most hellish cruelty was a lifeless corpse!

A warrant was issued for Buck's arrest, but he had not been taken.

The same paper states that Capt. Muggah, of the steamboat Mary Bess, had delivered to the authorities of Franklin one of his firemen named Michael Pierce for killing the mate of the boat, George H. Foyster. It appears that while discharging freight below Pattersonville, the mate struck and kicked one of the men, supposed to be the prisoner, and after getting under way the latter struck the former on the head with a billet of wood, knocking him overboard. He was picked up immediately, but life was extinct.

The Iberville Gazette of Saturday, says:

The river is rising slowly at this point. Within the past week it has risen some 8 or 10 inches, and the water is now beginning to flow pretty freely into the Bayou. This latter, however, will yet require a rise of about five feet, before it will be navigable for steamboats.

The Plaquemine Sentinel of Saturday, has the following:

The long, everlasting drought still prevails in our parish and in our crops, particularly the cane, were being greatly injured six weeks ago, it can be imagined the state they are in now. Round about Plaquemine, we have had several little showers within the last month which merely laid the dust. It has been many weeks since we have had any rain that could be of real service to the plantations. Our gardens are literally ruined. We know of many, among them ourselves, who planted a considerable quantity of Irish potatoes, and now, upon the eve of hoeing, when we calculated to have potatoes at least as large as hen's eggs, we find nothing but white roots like strings, branching out in every direction from the plant, the earth about the roots having scarcely any moisture whatever. Some of our rose-bushes, we fear, are dying in consequence of the want of water, no doubt, and we are afraid that our evergreens will go next.

The Thibodaux Minerva of Saturday, says:

Mr. Fortier informs us that the filling up of the prairie portion of the Railroad between Bayou des Allemands and the Lafourche will be entirely completed within sixty days from this date; and when completed it will be the prettiest and most substantial road to be found anywhere in the United States. This is saying much. But we can assure all that we do not in the least deviate from the truth.

MISSISSIPPI.—The Hinds County Gazette, of the 23d, says:

And yet we are without rain! with prospects less flattering, indeed, than they were weeks ago. The condition of things is becoming alarming. Corn is entirely ruined for the safety of the crops, and there are those who predict a famine. Notwithstanding the drouth, however, the cotton, where "stands" were obtained, continues to look extremely well; corn, too, in the bottoms, looks quite flourishing, and a very abundant crop may be made should seasonable rains occur in the future, commencing at an early day. Gardens, pastures, etc., etc., have suffered severely, and prove, in most instances, very serious losses.

The Democratic Platform, published at Brandon, has the following paragraph:

Within the last twelve or eighteen months a number of fires have occurred in the Steen's Creek neighborhood, in this county, under circumstances which leaves little doubt but that it was the work of an incendiary. Two churches and the private dwelling of Mr. John B. Lewis, have been burned. A negro belonging to Mr. Hewin, was suspected, taken up and tried before two justices, and five jurors, in accordance with the act 1854, and committed for trial before the Circuit Court.

A dispatch from Cincinnati of the 21st, says:

Elijah Williams, a rich planter of Barnesville, S. C., arrived in this city to-day with eight negroes, one of which was his wife, his six children, and the other his wife's mother. The object of his visit here was to manumit the whole and settle them in this State. Just, however, as he stepped from the steamboat into a carriage, he fell dead. The negroes having been brought here, are of course free under our State laws. Mr Williams had previously willed the whole of his estate to the negroes.

Terrible Earthquake at Niphon—Particulars of the Loss of the Russian Frigate Diana.

We have already had intelligence of the earthquake which occurred in the island of Niphon on the 23d of December, whereby the towns of Ohosaca and Simoda were destroyed, and Jeddo much injured, and the Russian frigate Diana lost. We find in the Courrier du Havre the following details of the latter event:

As we have already informed our readers, an earthquake of the most violent kind has taken place at Japan, and, among other misfortunes, has occasioned the loss of the Russian frigate Diana. The American steamer Powhatan, which was in the same vicinity, and which saved many of the shipwrecked mariners, has prepared an account of its voyage from Japan to Shanghai, from which the Novelist, of Marseilles, has borrowed some details on the shipwreck of the Russian vessel.

The frigate which was lost in the midst of this shocking catastrophe had on board the Vice Admiral Putiatin, engaged at the time in completing the treaty between Russia and Japan. She was at anchor at the port of Simoda. From the moment of the first shock of earthquake, the sea exhibited such a movement of eddying and whirling, that in less than thirty minutes the ship presented ground herself more than forty times, snapping and twisting all the chains holding her. The motion was so rapid that no one on board could keep on his legs, and all were seized with vertigo. When the sea retired, the frigate, which drew twenty-one feet of water, was left in eight feet of water only. On its return, the sea rose to the height of five fathoms above its ordinary level, and in again retiring it left the frigate in less than four feet of water, so that the anchor stocks were visible. The agitation of the bottom of the sea was so great at the time, that the Diana, though in four feet of water, was borne to a great distance. The officers believed that the part was about to become the mouth of a submarine volcano ready to engulf them.

When the frigate next found herself afloat it was perceived that she was filling, and that the keel and the rudder had been torn away, and were floating alongside. By passing sails under they succeeded in keeping her afloat; and on the next day, the sea having become calm, they brought the frigate into deeper water. Some shocks were again felt, but they were not attended by any serious consequences.

After having repaired damages as well as they could, and constructed a temporary rudder, the weather being fine again, they attempted to bring the frigate into a bay less exposed, and where they might more easily complete repairs. But when they were at a distance of seven miles from Simoda, a tempest blew up. The Japanese boats, to the number of over a hundred, which were towing the Diana, abandoned her, after having, however, taken in all her officers and crew, and shortly after the ship was swallowed up in the sea.

It must be remarked, says the Novelist, that the Diana, which was pursuing the Napoleon III, was perfectly disposed to disregard the neutrality of the port where the latter ship was lying, and to capture her even in those neutral waters, if she could. The French vessel, however, thanks to the rapid maneuvers of her captain, Lopez, had set sail and departed from Simoda twelve hours before the arrival of the Russian ship. The city of Simoda has been overthrown that hardly a trace of its streets is distinguishable.

The following is from an officer on board the Powhatan, dated—

Off the mouth of the Yang-tse-kiang,
March 2, 1855.

"We sailed from Simoda a week ago last Thursday, expecting a run of about five days to Shanghai, but we had scarcely got out of the harbor before we encountered a heavy gale of wind, which required a large expenditure of coal to enable us to breast it, without making any headway; but, on the contrary, rather losing ground. This had scarcely subsided when we had another gale more severe than the first, which lasted much longer, and after that subsided, we had still another directly in our teeth, which seemed to combine in itself the severity of both the previous ones. I never before have experienced anything to compare with it at sea. Being short of coal, the ship could not be placed in the most favorable position for weathering the gales, on the captain thought it necessary that he should force her through it all he could, so that he might make his fuel last to get the ship into port when the gale abated. By the greatest good luck, we have managed to avoid the necessity of taking off our paddles, and bonting up under sail.

The exchange of the ratifications of the treaty between the United States and Japan was made on the 21st day of Feb., and we sailed on 22d.

"The Island of Niphon, in which Simoda is situated, was visited on the 23d December by a severe earthquake, which was most disastrous in its effects. The city of Ohosaca, one of the largest in the empire, was completely laid waste. Jeddo itself suffered considerably, but has since suffered more seriously from the effects of an extensive conflagration. The town of Simoda, on our arrival, presented a complete scene of desolation and ruin. After the shock of the earthquake, the sea commenced bubbling up as it were along the shore, and then receded with great rapidity, and as soon returned with such increased volume as to flood the whole town to the depth of six or seven feet, sweeping away houses, bridges and temples, and piling them up in a mass of ruin.

"Five times during the day did the sea rise and recede in this manner, spreading desolation far and wide. The largest junks in the harbor were driven from one to two miles above high-water-mark, where we saw them lying high and dry. About 200 of the poor inhabitants lost their lives by the overflow, the remainder saving themselves by fleeing to the mountains with which the town is surrounded."

The Philadelphia Sun gives the following description of a new weapon used by the rowdies:

It seems that inventive genius is at work to perfect cowardly weapons as well as those intended for more manly purposes. On Sunday evening, two fellows giving the names of Alex. Taggert and Jas. Higgins, were arrested in the Seventeenth Ward for insulting females in the street. The latter wore on his finger a very heavy ring, made of copper, projecting from which were four metal points about a half inch in length, well calculated to do very serious injury were it used on a person's face, as each one of the points would make a hole at least one-half inch in length, or terribly lacerate the flesh.

WAR BETWEEN VENEZUELA AND NEW GRENADA.—By the arrival at New York of the schooner Erastis, Capt. Brewer, we have news from Puerto Cabello to the 1st of May, and from Caracas, the capital of Venezuela to the 26th of April;

The political affairs of that republic were as usual much troubled; but this time it was external war, not civil commotion, which agitated the public mind. Capt. Brewer reports that a few days before leaving Puerto Cabello, the Venezuelan government had sent 300 troops to Maracaibo, and that the laboring classes were being impressed into service, for the purpose of making war upon the neighboring republic of New Grenada.

The President, Jose T. Monagas, had sent a message to Congress detailing the circumstances of the existing hostilities, and Congress had authorized him to carry on the war by the most vigorous means, if more amicable measures failed.

LATER FROM BUENOS AYRES.—Advices from Buenos Ayres to the 17th of March, state that the Brazilian question had been permitted to pass through the waters of the Platte and Parana, in order to establish the blockade. Three American ship captains had got into a serious difficulty with an enemy, while riding past the guard-house of Buenos Ayres on the 7th of March. They landed in the soldier stabbing Capt. J. Lincoln, of the bark Maria, in the breast very severely. The conduct of the sentry is severely denounced, as the captains were proceeding along very quietly when attacked by him.

The kitchen of the jail in Sumterville, Ga., took fire on Friday night, the 11th instant, and was consumed, together with three negroes, the property of Dr. J. L. Haynesworth.

The Ways of a Bomb-shell.

A column of white smoke rushing up into the air expands into concentric rings; then follows the heavy, dull report, like the beat of some giant drum; and then comes the shrill scream of the shell as it describes its fatal curve and descends with prodigious velocity, increasing rapidly every instant, till it explodes with the peculiar noise of "a blast" just as it reaches the ground. At least, it ought to do so; but to-day I watched the shells, one after another, and only two out of three burst properly, though the range and flight were beautifully accurate. The Russian fuses are bad, but their artillery men are not to be excelled when their practice is undisturbed. It was interesting, just as the man of pleasure in Lucrelius likes to see the sea rage when he was out on board ship, to look at the shell dropping, and to see our active little Allies scampering away to their cover, and adjusting themselves to the closest possible connection with mother-earth, till the hurling masses had gone by them. Any man with moderate confidence and experience may despise round shot at long ranges if he only sees the guns from which they come discharged. Well, we won't say despise exactly, but at all events "evade." But a shell is a diabolical invention, which no one can regard as it approaches without a certain misgiving that a triangular piece of jagged iron may be whizzed through his internal economy at the shortest possible notice afterward.

If it is sent from a gun it fizzles and roars through the air, and sends its fragments before it, the rune of dispersion, which is the neat phrase used by the learned militant to imply the direction of the bits of shell (or its contents, when it is filled with bullets, etc.) being in the direction the shell has taken from the gun, and the fragments being propelled with a portion of the velocity of the shell at the moment of explosion. If it be discharged from a mortar it whistles gently and delicately, giving a squeak and a roar, now and then, as it rises to its greatest elevation, and then, rushing downward with a shriller whistle toward the point, its fragments are projected all around radially, and are propelled merely by the force of the bursting charge. A man behind a bomb, or at the side of it, is just as likely to be hit as a man before it when it bursts in that way; whereas the pieces from a shell from a gun in nearly every instance fly forward, so that a person behind it or outside of the limits of the cone of dispersion is safe. Unless the bomb or shell bursts in front of a body of men in the air a very considerable degree of safety may be attained by the men throwing themselves flat on the ground, inasmuch as the pieces of a shell which bursts on the earth fly upward from the point where they encounter maximum resistance.

Of course, if a bomb burst over a man on the ground, or if a shell explodes in the air in front of a man, there is so great safety gained by his throwing himself down beyond the consequent reduction of the amount of vertical exposure. It is rather an unpleasant reflection whenever one is discussing the range of a missile, and is perhaps exclaiming: "There is a splendid shot," that it may have carried misery and sorrow into some happy household. The smoke clears away, the men get up, they gather round one that moves not, or who is racked with mortal agony; they bear him away, a mere black speck, and a few shovels full of mud mark for little time the resting-place of the poor soldier, whose wife, or mother, or children, or sisters, are left destitute of all solace, save memory and the sympathy of their country. One such little speck I watched to-day, and saw quietly deposited on the ground inside a trench. Who will let the the inmates of that desolate cottage in Pleardy, or Gascony, or Anjou, know of their bereavement? However, there goes another shell, and it does nothing but knock up a cloud of snow and dust. [Camp Correspondence of the London Times.

THE MASTER SPIRIT AT SEMASTOPOL.—The head engineer at Sebastopol is a young man named Todtaben, who at the commencement of the siege was a captain and almost unknown. When the siege commenced, Prince Menschikoff, it is said, asked the then head engineer how long it would take to put the place in a state of defence. He answered "Two months!" Todtaben stepped forward and said he would undertake to do it. If he had as many men as he required, in two weeks, He did it in twelve days, and was made colonel. Since that time he has had the direction of everything in the way of building batteries, defences, &c.—The other day the Grand Duke called upon his wife, who is residing in St. Petersburg, to congratulate her upon her husband's promotion; for he is now General and Aide-de-Camp to the Emperor. The Russians adopt the common-sense practice of taking the man who will do the work best and they get it the best done. This is the practice in well-conducted private business; it is still more necessary in public service, where the consequences of mistakes through incompetency and ignorance may affect a whole nation.

GOV. GARDNER AND THE PERSONAL LIBERTY BILL.—The Massachusetts Legislature adjourned sine die on the afternoon of the 21st. The Governor, in his message vetoing the last nullification enactment of that body, expressed his approval of several provisions of the bill, but others he thought conflicted with the Constitution of the United States, as declared by the Supreme Court. We make the following extract:

Unconstitutional enactments tending to an armed conflict between our State and National systems of Government, which must result in the annihilation of one, alike fatal, whichever it be, should be equally shunned by statesmen and patriots. In such delicately balanced organizations, the integrity of the one should be preserved as zealously as the humiliation of the other should be advocated. There is much of good in it, but that cannot atone for the evil. There is much that, in accordance with the true doctrine of man's rights and Of State rights, Massachusetts might well place upon her statute book, but that can not authorize its illegal and unconstitutional requirements. I trust and believe the Legislature will not act in this case without deliberate reflection. Let it not hastily place itself where it may wish to recede, but without the power. An omission may hereafter be supplied, but the stigma of an unconstitutional enactment can never be entirely effaced. The rights of the honor, and the integrity of Massachusetts, are unsullied so long as having sworn to obey her Constitution, and that of our common parent, the United States, and let us act under the solemnity of those oaths and in obedience to their requirements.

A RELIC.—The Pittsburg Dispatch has the following description of a medal recently dug up on Braddock's Field, the spot where nearly a hundred years ago the British and Colonial army under General Braddock suffered a terrible defeat at the hands of the French and Indians from Fort Duquesne:

The medal seems to be of copper, and bears the following devices and inscriptions: on one side a figure of a man on a bobtailed horse, pointing with his sword to troops, camp and a fortified town in the back-ground; inscription—"Frederic, dg rorre rex et Protestantim, defessor; Lissa, Dec. 5." On the reverse, troops of cavalry engaged in battle, volumes of smoke, with dead and wounded in the foreground; a portion of the forces retreating; inscription: "Quo nihil majus ... Reboch, 1757."

At first glance we supposed the medal might have been dropped on the battle field by some soldier engaged on either side in that fearful fray, but such could not have been the case. The defeat of Braddock occurred early in July, 1755, while the battle of Rosbach, Saxony, which this medal is designed, as commemorate, did not take place until more than two years afterwards, when that Prussian village was rendered famous by the decisive victory there obtained by Frederic the Great, in the "Seven years' war," over the Imperial and French troops, led by Marshal Soubise. Saxony was invaded in August, 1756, and peace was not declared until February, 1763.

Health, Weather and Water.

Continuing our last week's article upon this subject, we walked up town, and found an alarm spreading of Cholera. The paper having been put to press, it was impossible to add to our statement, as we desired. It seemed to have sprung out with sudden violence. On Tuesday evening last, the Board of Health pronounced it Epidemic. The weekly cemetery reports, ending last Sunday morning, give 385 deaths—of which 204 were from Cholera.

It is most fatal among children. On last Wednesday, about 8 per cent of the Orphans' Home died of it. The deaths occur mostly between 4 and 5 o'clock in the morning.

The drought and redness the inhabitants of the suburbs to great extremities. Many of the poor, scooping water out of the gutters to drink.

Thursday morning, after loud and long thundering, a grateful rain fell from 3½ to 6 o'clock. This has replenished the cisterns, washed the streets and produced a favorable change in the atmosphere.

We shall continue to lay before our readers the most faithful accounts we can procure. We have no interest or disposition to withhold the whole truth.

The Morgan street Sabbath School celebration, 24th ult., was the best we ever attended. Scholars 270.

Relief Committees.

The poor and helpless must suffer unless relief is organized. Cannot a committee of relief be appointed at the prominent point (say post office) of each distressed neighborhood, where applications may be made, and where those having money or provisions to give can deposit it for distribution. These neighborhood committees might correspond with each other, and equalize the distribution. The preachers might call a meeting at church, after sermon. Good text—Prov. xi, 24-5-6.

DEATHS.—Rev. Alexander Campbell, D. D., an excellent and holy man and Presbyterian minister, residing in this city, died Tuesday last. The obituary of Mrs. Dameron, a [illegible] mother in Israel, will appear next week.

REV. JAS. WALTON.—In the obituary column, the many friends of this excellent minister, a member of the Mississippi Conference, may read of his heart-rending affliction.

Methodist Principles.

Our down town cotemporary, the Orleanian, of Roman Catholic principles; speaking of papers, says:

"The largest circulation obtained by any paper in the city, is that of a religious paper up town, of Methodist principles."

Is it so then that the Methodist principles have an Advocate in New Orleans, in the front rank of the press! This is encouragement to our friends who have nobly aided us in struggling up to this point.

But these times are pressing us very severely. We do not like to say much about such things; necessity compels us. Those who owe, will do themselves and us justice, by forwarding the amount at once. Our Agents will take this hint.

The drought with its gloomy predictions of scarcity is nearly past. During its prevalence we said nothing about money, though receiving little. Can it not be sent now? Let those who can, send.

Church Property in Spain.

Notwithstanding the Concordat, Ecclesiastical property in Old Spain seems to be endangered as in New York. Among the current items is this:

"A law has just been enacted by the Spanish Cortes, ordering all the lands and dwellings belonging to the clergy, to religious fraternities, and to pious and sacred works, to be sold and turned into money; breaking up all accumulations of ecclesiastical property, and stripping the Church of its immense possessions."

We discredited such news as too good, but it is likely to be confirmed. Whether the money is to be loaned the government, or held by the Church, or reinvested upon different tenures, does not appear.

Madrid journals are beginning to occupy themselves with the [illegible] the government of Queen Isabella [illegible] French alliance. One of those journals—the Espana—enthusiasting the advantages which this alliance has already produced for Piedmont, says: "We also, if we were disposed to dispatch an expedition of 15,000 or 20,000 volunteers to the armies of the East, would be sure of obtaining from the two allied Powers —first, a guarantee for the integrity of our colonies, but more especially of Cuba; secondly, the insurance on the part of England of a loan of ten or fifteen millions of hard cash; and thirdly, the certainty that France would compel the Court of Rome to sanction the sale of estates of the church."

Pulpit Claptraps.

THE ADVERTISING MANIA.

The showman and pill doctors had better look out, or their occupation's gone. The Doctors of Divinity have laid hold of that vulgar instrument of notoriety,—puff advertisements—and bid fair to out-Barnum Barnum. This folly is not only fledged, but on the wing, and we feel bound in discharging the painful, but faithful duty of a christian journalist, to shoot it as it flies.

Puff advertising is reduced to a science. A prince of humbugs boasts that by it, he can draw a crowd on any occasion, and that by the wording and style, he can select his crowd.

That little book—"Peep at No. 5"—written by a minister's wife and daughter, gives a vivid description on this wise: The Downs street Church did not fill up fast enough, nor the pews sell. A worldly-wise deacon waits on the pastor, and urges him to put 'notices in the papers'—nothing like that;—give out a series of discourses, and the texts of 'em beforehand, and let them be 'something new and taking like.' But the pastor would do nothing to help forward such a perverted taste. It took a more manly administration of the pulpit to suit him.

We lay before our readers some specimens. In the Creole, January 6, prominently stands, this:

"COURSE OF SUNDAY EVENING SERMONS TO THE YOUNG OF BOTH SEXES.—The first of a course of Sunday evening Sermons to the young, or the Bible exhibition of the Faculty of Memory as connecting our present with our future and endless life, will be delivered to-morrow evening at 7 o'clock, by Rev. Dr. V., in Odd Fellows' Hall."

In same paper, January 20, the dose is repeated, and a little stronger:

"COURSE OF SUNDAY EVENING SERMONS TO THE YOUNG.—The Rev. Dr. V., of the First Presbyterian Church of this city, at the request of many, in consequence of the unfavorable state of the weather last Sunday evening—a week ago—has consented to repeat, to-morrow evening, the first sermon of a course to the young; and then, is expected to continue the course every Sunday evening till finished. We understand it is to consist of six discourses. The subject for to-morrow evening is—'Memory as an imperishable principal of retribution—its power to impart pleasure or to inflict pain.' Service in Odd Fellows' Hall, on Lafayette Square, to commence at 7 o'clock. Seats free.

This series of discourses addressed to the young of this city, by Dr. V., of which we have before made mention, begins to attract public attention. The Doctor is an accurate scholar, and a most eloquent speaker, and the subject of these discourses is presented with a beauty, originality and earnestness, rarely witnessed. As a mere intellectual treat, they cannot fail to present the highest attraction to our young men. Grand thoughts clothed in all the graces of language, and uttered with fervor, affect the listener with true pleasure. We trust the young men of New Orleans, will take occasion to become acquainted with the able and benevolent man, who now lectures on Sabbath evening, in Odd Fellows' Hall."

The "repeating," reminds us of the parson who having finished the reading of his "discourse," discovered a large portion of his hearers(!) asleep. Quoth he, "My hearers, this discourse has cost me great trouble, and as I do not wish it to be lost, and as many of you were asleep, I will repeat it." He had a wide-awake audience afterwards.

Another of February 3, in course:

"LECTURE TO-MORROW EVENING.—The subject of Rev. Dr. V.'s Third Sermon, in his Sunday Evening Course to the Young, for to-morrow evening is—'Practical lessons from the Imperishable Nature of Memory, etc.'"

March 17, in the same front column, the note is slightly varied, but still inside the gamut:

"RELIGIOUS NOTICE.—The Remembrance and Recognition of Friends in a Future State. Rev. Dr. V., (whose Sunday evening course of sermons to the young of this city, has been interrupted on two or three occasions by the applications for the Hall, by persons engaged for public institutions,) continues his discourse, etc."

These samples will suffice. We must be sparing, as we publish gratis.

Could Brette, the parlez vous man, beat that? "Who is Brette?" Take care what you ask. Read almost any number of the Delta, and you will know. For instance, 27th inst.:

"PROFESSOR BRETTE.—The system of the Professor is established. It is appreciated North and South, and not to know Brette argues yourself unknown.

He has succeeded in teaching many of our citizens to speak French fluently—many who failed under other teachers—who were, like Napoleon in his march to Moscow, "stopped by the elements."

He has won as high a character, personally, as he could desire. He is respected as much for his honor, his virtue, his kindness, as for his undoubted talents. In a word, he is as popular as he is celebrated.

Every year adds to his reputation. Next year he will be further advanced than ever; for his motto is progress, and in his lexicon "there's no such word as fail."

He can still be found at No. 13 St. Charles street."

We should like to give, if we had a copy at hand, Dr. McLane's "Genuine Vermifuge," also, his "Celebrated Liver Pills." Old Dr. Townsend and Jacob Townsend, too, will have to spur up, or the Sarsaparilla will be lost sight of.

Another Richmond in the field! Oxford will not be out-done by Geneva. The Creole of May 19, has it:

"DISCOURSE TO YOUNG MEN.—A discourse to Young Men will be delivered in Trinity Church, corner of Jackson and Plaquemine streets, on Sunday morning, by the Rev. Dr. C. Subject: 'The Temptations of Young Men.'—it being the first of a short Series of Lectures or Discourses to the Young of both sexes, of the time and place of the delivery of which due notice will be given."

Clear the track! Geneva had the start, and is yet in the run.

Some wag (we suspect him) counting it a free thing, enters a rival in the Picayune, May 23:

"NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.—A series of Lectures will be delivered shortly in this city, as soon as the arrangements are completed, of which due notice will be given, on the following subjects:

1st Lecture—The Great Drouth.
2. Lecture—Can the Allies take Sevastopol?
3. Lecture—The Effects of the Great War on the Institutions of the United States.
4th Lecture—The Fate of England and France and the other members of the Holy Alliance.

The First Lecture will comprise the following subjects:

1. The Commencement of the Drouth.
2. The Continuance of it.
3. The Reasons for it.
4. Its Effects on other Nations.

The Basis of operations of this Lecture, is from Jeremiah, chap. 14, v. 22, 1st clause: "Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain? or can the heavens give showers."

☞ Those Lectures will be spicy."

One capital defect about this notice—the lectures ought to be addressed to "Young Men." Our lecturers are partialists. Now and then one is so benevolent, as to take in the young "of both sexes." Is this according to the gospel, which sends its ministers "to every creature?" Only a sail set to catch the breeze of "Young America."—Therein lies the art—to catch every breeze.

Friday morning, a week ago, we read in the Crescent:

"RELIGIOUS NOTICE—Heroism of Christianity.—The Rev. Dr. C. having been requested to deliver his course of lectures to young men, on "The Heroism of Christianity," will address the young men of the city, at Christ Church, (Dr. Leacock's,) on Sunday night. Being about to embark for Europe and the Crimea, he will have time only to commence the series of lectures by delivering two or three. The remaining part of the course will, Providence permitting, be given on his return in the autumn."

In several other dailies, simultaneously, appeared the same notice, all in the editorial columns, too. Therein lies another art: the common reader counts these notices the spontaneous tribute of the press to greatness, whereas it is the highest priced advertisement.

Won't it be an agony—that hiatus! To have two or three, and wait for the balance till autumn. Those "young men" who hear the first part may fall by epidemic this summer, and be in their graves when the Doctor returns in autumn to deliver "the remaining parts." Who will be here to visit them in sickness and bury them?

And what has going to Europe and the Crimea to do with "a course of lectures to young men of this city, at Christ Church, (Dr. Leacock's,) on Sunday nights?" We read the notice in all the papers, and can't make it out, though all mention "Europe and the Crimea." If absence for a few months will interrupt the course, to be resumed on his return next autumn, why not say so.

Just in there is an idea the advertising genius may appreciate—to wit: transfering the interest felt by everybody in Sebastopol to a course of lectures in New Orleans. Far fetched though it be, we prefer accepting this rather than suspect the eloquent Doctor of indulging a swell of vanity in letting us know, under the head of "Religious Notice," that he was going all the way to Europe and the Crimea.

Other specimens are before us, but it would extend this article too far to give them, even with a bit a piece. Hereafter we may serve them up. For the present we have taken the nearest and latest. We must mention one more; the case of a divine in Baton Rouge, who is lecturing (to the young men, of course) on "The fossil remains of mind." Quid rides? It is verily so.

Just think of Paul posting a religious notice under the "Unknown God," that on Sunday night he would deliver a course to the young men of Athens on "The fossil remains of mind!"

By the way, something could be made out of those Flathead Indians, just from Puget's Sound? A taking course might be got up on the "Cerebral relations of superstition to a future world." They are now on exhibition at the Pelican theatre, but the manager might let the churches take a benefit.

In conclusion, we ask: Has the gospel failed? Are its themes worn threadbare, and is there no more power in them? Are these claptraps to be relied on for keeping up the Church and gospel ordinances? God forbid.

Of course there can be no objection to letting strangers know when and where they can find a place for worship. When a Bishop arrives, there may be persons awaiting ordination, and it should be known—advertised, if you please. So of any special agent of the Church. A programme of extraordinary occasions is legitimate. But when there is a standing appointment for religious service, let the people come to worship God, and not to hear Paul or Apollos. Putting out these special inducements to draw a house degrades the pulpit to the level of earthly platforms. It cultivates itching ears among the people, and destroys the morale of a congregation. The titillation of personal vanity poorly compensates the Church's loss.

May we never fall back to those times when the poet Cowper upbraided the clergy of the English Church with substituting morality for religion, saying:

"How oft, when Paul has served us with a text,
Has Plato, Tully, Epictetus preached."

Repentance, faith, justification and sanctification are grown stale! The people want to have some new thing, and the pulpit, instead of rebuking, is meeting half-way this perverted taste!

Not all. There are some who will not come down to it, who persevere in a manly administration of the pulpit.

NASHVILLE CORRESPONDENCE.

NASHVILLE, May 21, 1855.

MR. EDITOR.—Since the pleasant week of the Missionary Anniversary nothing of special interest has occurred in our city until the 17th of this month, on which day the Old School General Assembly met and organized in the First Presbyterian Church. The opening sermon, preached by Dr. Boardmen of Philadelphia, was an admirable specimen of pulpit eloquence, and fully realized the anticipations of a numerous and attentive audience. The Assembly is large, consisting of 210 delegates, a majority of whom are ministers, and presents a grave, weighty and dignified appearance. Dr. Rice, now of St. Louis, was elected Moderator, and Mr. Phillips Clerk. The first mentioned of these two gentlemen spoke on Thursday evening before the Presbyterian Historic Society, on the history of that Church; and although some folks, belonging to other denominations, thought the fulsome polemic a little too self-glorifying in behalf of his own household of faith, the address was able and interesting.

On Friday evening the Sabbath School Anniversary was held. There were several addresses, but I have forgotten the names of the speakers. The Presbyterian Church has set the Christian world a noble example in this department of religious labor, one which cannot be too zealously followed.

Dr. Robert J. Breckenridge, although not a delegate, is here. I heard it intimated, a few days ago, that he is to preach the annual missionary sermon, and if this be so, there is a rich treat in store for those who may be present on that occasion, as he is indisputably one of the greatest men in this nation, East, West, North or South. His eloquence is the eloquence of thought, and in the clearness and tremendous power of his language, he has often reminded me of our own revered Winans; to say which is, in my estimation, to pay Dr. Breckenridge no ordinary compliment.

The venerable Dr. McGill, and Dr. Thornwell, from Charleston, S. C., are both here.

We had an excellent sermon from Dr. Lacy, of North Carolina, yesterday morning, at McKendree Church, on the words, "And yet there is room." The doctrines advanced by the speaker, were sufficiently Arminian to please even an ultra Methodist audience.—At night, we all went to hear Dr. Thornwell. The discourse was a good one—well worded, and perfectly correct, but neither so original, or so eloquent as I had been led to expect. I suppose it must have been a failure, as his reputation is very extensive among his own people.

Rev. S. D. Baldwin, author of "Armegeddon," has recently delivered two lectures here on his wondrous theme, the prophecies; in both of which he displayed not only a marvellously intimate acquaintance with the prophetic writings of the Old and New Testaments, but an immense amount of general information. As usual in all cases of discovery, some believe enthusiastically, others doubt, and others again, are violently opposed to this new interpretation of the sealed visions. Whatever may be said of Mr. Baldwin's theory, he is certainly no ordinary man, whether we consider his genius or his scholarship.

You will be glad to hear that the Publishing House is progressing rapidly towards completion. There are now about thirty hands, male and female, at work in the bindery. Mr. Stitt, the accomplished superintendant of the printing department, is at this time absent in the East, on business for the house, and visiting his family, from whom he has been cheerfully absent for a long time.

Dr. Stevenson has been in town for two or three weeks past, in very feeble health. He returned to Louisville, on Friday last.

The environs of Nashville are very beautiful, now that the Spring foliage is in perfection, and the gardens everywhere, blushing in fragrant bloom. We have peas and strawberries in abundance—an old story by this time, with the dwellers of the Crescent City—and you may rest assured that after our long fast from fruits and vegetables, we are enjoying them to the fullest extent. To the fullest extent did I say, alas! no: for a rumor of sickness and death has floated to us on the pleasant breath of Spring, and we know not when the Cholera, with its train of horrors will be in our midst, as it is already in the midst of neighboring cities. So is it with us poor mortals; we eat and drink, and sleep and wake, and sleep again, but a shadow is ever pursuing, which will, one day, hide us from the light of the sun, and from the faces we love. Well for us will it be, if

"Out of our last home dark and cold,
We shall pass to the city whose streets are gold;
From the silence that falls upon sin and pain,
To the deathless joy of the angels' strain,
Well shall be ended that ill begun—
Out of the shadow, into the sun."

CROTCHET.

DISTRESS IN ALABAMA.—The Selma Sentinel of Saturday last says:

While other sections of the State are on the eve of starving for bread, it would seem some persons in our own community are not entirely independent. We were informed yesterday morning by a gentleman who is connected with one of our milling establishments, that within the last few days, he had quite a number of applications from destitute persons for meal, and that in one instance, of a dependent widow lady, the mother of several children, who stated she had not had a mouthful of bread in her house for three days."

THE BIBLE PRAYER BOOK, by W. W. Everts. New York; Ivison & Phinney 1855; 12mo. pp. 244.

We feel no jealousy of books on this plan—containing forms of prayer—as infringing on the spontaneous aspirations of the heart. It is an aid to private, social and family prayer, to draw from the inspired records those rich expressions in which desires, prompted by the Holy Ghost, find full and appropriate utterance. Those who lead public devotions would do well to study their prayers as well as their sermons. A theological student of Dr. Chalmers, told us he often read from a MS. his opening prayer before the class. The extempore privilege is much abused by incoherent ramblings and impromptu irreverences. Foster, in his Essay on Prayer, (we wish all our readers were familiar with it,) says: "It must operate to make them [spiritual desires] more strong, more vivid, more solemn, more prolonged and more definite as to their objects. Forming them into expressions to God, will concentrate the soul in them and upon these objects."

The book under notice is neatly prepared, and by one who has got up useful manuals. On the day that it was laid upon our table we had a funeral service to perform—the funeral of a child. Exploring the index for that, specially, it directed us to page 166.—The prayer begins:

"We acknowledge with humility, the frailty and uncertainty of human life. It is short at its greatest length; and in its greatest security it is without defence. The old must die and the young may die. For death hath passed upon all, even those who have not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, and youth, childhood and infancy, fade before the withering breath of the destroyer. The opening bud of existence is broken from its parent stem, ere yet it has displayed its beauties and exhaled its fragrance. The blossoms fall from the tree of life, or the partially green fruit decays before the golden clusters of Autumn bend down its branches. In the blade or stalk, or unripened kernel, the harvest is blasted and turned back into the earth, disappointing the hopes and leaving unrequitted the toil, and unsatisfied the wants of the husbandman. O, Lord, we deplore these ravages, etc."

Call you that praying! David, even in his feigned craziness, would have been ashamed of it. The rhetoric is bad, and the devotion worse. We pity the minister who could insult the griefs of parents, and the majesty of God with such fustian? If piety did not forbid a prayer offered to the congregation, taste would suggest a less elegant performance as befitting the house of mourning.

We give this quotation, because it was our first sample of the book, and a satisfactory one. The quotation is drawn out so far, that the reader may reach "Lord," and know that Mr. Everts is at prayer. To that point the listener could only infer that he was "addressing" God, by his bodily attitudes or his eyes shut: the reader, by the caption of PRAYER. How unlike those incomparable models of devotion—the Psalms! the first verse of which, generally the first word, brings the soul into audience with Deity. This making fine speeches at the Lord surely needs no more than holding up to the light for its reprobation, as vicious in style and irreverent of spirit.

THE EDUCATION DEMANDED BY THE PEOPLE, a pamphlet, Phillips & Sampson, Boston, 1855.

Dr. Nott, on the 25th of last July, would celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his Presidency of Union College. He therefore commands one of his brightest boys to take the stand and make a speech.—giving him the subject he is to speak on. Frank Wayland obeys.—Dr. Wayland, the honored President of Brown University! Verily this is old age, with a crown.

Dr. Wayland discusses the comparative merits of objective and subjective education. The communicating knowledge to the mind and disciplining the mind's faculties. We need not say the discussion is able and luminous. His suggestions upon the present systems of collegiate instruction are weighty. Our people—our country—our times demand a system peculiar to themselves. "Whenever an institution is established in any part of the country, our first inquiry should be, what is the kind of knowledge (in addition to that demanded for all) which this portion of our people needs, in order to perfect them in their professions, give them power over our principles and enable them to develop their resources."

Scientific mining, geology and the natural philosophies generally, are needed to aid us in exploring the wealth, determining the character, and advancing the material progress of our country. Following out these thoughts it is no hinwise for southern and agricultural states to copy the curriculums of the northern and mechanic, as for America to copy Europe. An extract to the point—p. 28.

"The present is a most auspicious moment in which to take this subject into full consideration. There seems a fatal tendency, in the promotion of systems of education, blindly to follow precedents, without examining the laws on which they are founded, or the results which they have attained. The West, in organizing its institutions, looks backward to the East, and considers its labor perfected when it has copied the universal model. We, of the East, as far as public opinion will permit, have imitated Cambridge and Oxford, without considering how utterly unsuited to our condition, must be institutions founded for the education of the mediæval clergy, and modified by the pressure of an all-powerful aristocracy."

We commend the whole subject to whom it may concern.—Norman, 14 Camp st.

IRON-THROPE, THE PIONEER PREACHER, by Paul Creyon: Boston, Phillips & Sampson, 1855.

A pleasing narrative of a new settler's life in 1812. The preacher is overwrought.—We have it through Norman.

LITERARY AND HISTORICAL MISCELLANIES, by Geo. Bancroft, New York, 1855: Harper & Bro.'s; 8vo. pp 517.

Generous margin, clear paper, large print; has superior typography throughout. Mr. Bancroft is our Macauley.—His Miscellanies are a treat. Here are College Addresses, Review Contributions of the highest order, and some pieces written at a very early period of life, when the author was a student. The volume is a real acquisition to one's library. For sale by McGinnis, 36 Camp st.

A JOURNEY THROUGH THE CHINESE EMPIRE, by M. Huc; New York, Harpers, 1855. 2 vols.

This Jesuit missionary has given the outside world the most detailed account of Tartary and Thibet, yet published. To these travels is now added China, which was part of the same interior trip of observation. He journeyed under circumstances peculiarly favorable to protection and observation, from the frontier of Thibet to Canton—reaching the latter point, October, 1846. His remarks on the missionary aspects of the Empire, as between Romanists and Protestants, will, of course, be read with allowance. In the Author's preface, dated Paris, 1854, he attributes the Deistical element of the insurgents, rather to the Mahomedans, "a considerable number of whom, with Koran and Mosque, exist in all the provinces," which the Chinese have for a long time had at command, than "to the Bibles prudently deposited on the sea-shore by the Methodists." For sale by McGinnis.

HISTORY FOR BOYS, by J. G. Edgar; Harper & Bro.'s, 1855.

A captivating compend of the Annals of the Nations of Modern Europe. Pictorial illustrations. For sale by McGinnis.

CHRISTIANITY VIEWED IN SOME OF ITS LEADING ASPECTS, by Rev. A. L. R. Foote, author of Incidents in the Life of our Savior; edited by Rev. D. W. Clark, D. D. Cincinnati, Swormstedt & Poe, 1855.

An American republication of an English work. Christianity is considered—first, as a life; second, as a labor; third, a reward; fourth, a culture; fifth, a discipline; sixth, a fellowship; through all of which there runs a deep view of sound doctrine and Scriptural piety.

DR. WINAN'S SERMON; a copy, as elaborated by the author, and published by Stevenson & Owen, has been received. Those who read our skeleton, will like to see its flesh and skin, with some improvement in the anatomy.

Pacific Conference.

Bishop Andrew opened the Conference. Rev. B. H. Russell was appointed Secretary.

Bishop Andrew recommended that the members meet each morning at 8½ o'clock, and spend the time, thence till the opening of the session, in prayer meeting.

Rev. Messrs. Bonsal, Maupin, Lattimore, Shilton and Cox, having been recommended, were received on trial.

The Conference resolved, after discussion, not to revive the Christian Observer. Also that Bishop Andrew be requested to remain during the year, and make the tour of the State.

The California Advocate of April 28 gives the following—

APPOINTMENTS:

San Francisco District: W. R. Goher, P. E. San Francisco, O. Fisher; Oakland, M. Evans; Martinez, J. M. Fulton; San José and Santa Clara, B. T. Crouch; Santa Clara Circuit, P. O. Clayton, R. C. Ellis; Vesalia (to be supplied; Tuolumne, F. G. Gray; Jamestown, T. C. Barton; Volcano (to be supplied).

Conference closed its session on Wednesday. Rev. Mr. Wynn was transferred to Georgia Conference. Rev. James H. Bristow to the Louisville. Rev. Mr. Gober's character was passed, and a resolution, exculpating him from all blame in the case for which he was suspended, was passed. The members in society are reported to be 941.

We understand that the session was harmonious, and that the preachers left in good spirits.

The Seguin (Texas) Mercury furnishes the following important information:

Everybody should know it—that the tincture of lobelia is a sovereign, certain and infallible remedy for a snake bite, no matter of what tribe. This is vouched for by a physician of this county, and is worth remembering.

DOES FREEZING KILL?—In the basin under the dome of the Crystal Palace we noticed last fall a number of goldfish flashing their bright sides in the clear water. Yesterday we saw them again, as lively as ever, and remarked to Sam Brevoort, the superintendent. "So, your fish lived through the winter, but they are not so bright colored as last fall."

"No wonder; the color froze off; the wonder is the life did not, for that basin was a solid cake of ice, and those fish were as solid as any part of it. But they thawed out as good as new, except the color, and that is coming on with warm weather. I think that settles the question, that freezing don't kill."

Missionary Reports.

EAST FELICIANA COLORED MISSION, May 14, 1855.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

According to promise, I now endeavor to give you some account of East Feliciana Colored Mission. I found on all the different class books 249 members. During this Conference year, thus far, 172 have joined on probation, some of whom are backsliders reclaimed, making in all 421 members now on class book. The number of children catechized up to this time is 185, besides some 400 adults. I make it a point to instruct the parents, whose children are out of my reach, that they may catechize them. As far as I am capable of judging in spiritual things, God's Spirit is performing His office in the conviction and conversion of sinners at the various points on this mission. Not only on the mission, but it is spreading beyond it. God grant that it may continue to spread.

This morning, on a plantation near where a meeting was held yesterday, and some twenty joined the society, the negroes appeared to be rather noisy while at their work in the field scraping out cotton in the dust, (awful dry these times.) The master stepped round to ascertain the fuss, when to his astonishment he finds them hard at work talking about their good meeting. All right, he troubles them not, but lets them go on their way rejoicing.

It appears that Ethiopia is stretching out her hands unto God. God be glorified for this work of grace. My soul is very happy. These poor people are the purchase of the Redeemer's blood. Jesus cares for them, and shall we not, as Christians, care for them also? God is no respecter of persons; and are we better than God? Shall we not as missionaries, come down to their capacity and take them by the hand to the fountain that is opened for sin and uncleanliness? O the responsibility that rests upon the missionary! The wisdom, the meekness, the humility it needs! Pray for me. Will the Lord continue to carry on this work in East Feliciana? Lord, increase our faith.

WM. S. TOWNSEND.

A Good Example.

PRESIDENT PIERCE AND CABINET.

It is refreshing to find this item in a reliable Washington paper. We neither doubt the truth or high moral influence of the fact stated. Those who agree with St. Paul in making supplications, prayers and intercessions "for all that are in authority, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty," will agree also in "giving of thanks. To the honor of our highest authorities be it known, and be a national assurity:

"We really do not know any gentleman who sets a better example to society than the President in his walk in life as a man. No other person in Washington is more regular in his attendance on divine worship. He is regularly to be seen in the evening as well as at the services in the day time. This strict observance of Christian duty is fully borne out in his invariable conduct and bearing, it matters not in what society he is thrown. Our attention has been called to these facts by a revered Christian friend, than whom no other among us is more keenly alive to passing circumstances which tend either to benefit or injure society. We may not inappropriately add, that we never before knew an American Cabinet to be one and all so scrupulously observant of the obligations resting on them to set good examples in their conduct in society as men. Those who believe with us that a well ordered society, a thoughtful, prudent and conscientious society, is exceedingly desirable everywhere, will doubtless agree with us in awarding to these gentlemen praise for conducting themselves as gentlemen, as though at all times remembering that in their position their example as men is likely to have due effect on those by whom they are surrounded."

Sir David Brewster makes the following remarks relative to the structure of the sun: So strong has been the belief that the sun caused as a habitable world that a scientific gentleman was pronounced by his medical attendant to be insane, because he had sent a paper to the Royal Society, in which he maintained that the light of the sun proceeds from a dense and universal aurora, which may afford ample light to the inhabitants of the surface beneath, and yet be at such a distance cloth as not to be among them; that there may be water and dry land there, hills and dales, rain and fair weather, and that as the light and seasons must be eternal, the sun may easily be conceived to be by far the most blissful habitation of the whole system. In less than ten years after this apparently extravagant notion was considered a proof of insanity, it was maintained by Sir William Herschel as a rational and probable opinion, which might be deducible from his own observations on the structure of the sun.

UNIVERSALISM.—A certain preacher of Universalism had been preaching in a county school-house for several successive Sabbaths, to convince the people that there was no hell. At length it was announced that at his next meeting a collection would be taken for his benefit. The day arrived, and the collection was taken up in a hat. When the "deacon" had passed through the congregation, and given all an opportunity to contribute, he returned to the desk and gravely emptied the contents of the hat upon the desk before the preacher. And such a "collection!"—A few coppers, with old buttons, pieces of tin, broken jewsharps, horse-nails, and almost every other worthless thing that a man could carry to church in his pocket! The preacher was thunderstruck; but, recovering his self-possession in a moment, and gazing upon the "collection" before him, exclaimed, "Well, I am not so certain whether there is a hell or not, but I am certain there ought to be one for such fellows as you are;" and taking his hat left the house.

The agricultural division of the Patent Office at Washington publishes that, in view of the strong properties of guano, it never should be placed in contact with seeds; for all seeds in the process of germination give off a greater or less quantity of carbonic acid and vinegar; and these acids, having strong affinities for the ammoniacal portion of the guano, are apt to attract it so powerfully as to check and even destroy vegetation.

The Directors of the Ohio Railroad have made a lengthy report to the city of St. Louis and other stockholders of the State, in regard to the road. The report states that there is a gap of only forty miles between St. Louis and Vincennes, in the western division, and that two hundred and fifty thousand dollars will only be required to complete the road to Wabash. It is estimated the profit on the road, when completed, will be 15 per cent. on the cost—seven millions.

Deaths.

We have just been called upon to mourn a serious loss, and sympathize with a deeply afflicted family. Death has snatched from us, without scarce a warning, one who was endowed with every social and Christian virtue—an affectionate son, a tender and devoted husband and father, a firm friend.

WM. A. SHORT was born in Northampton county, N. C., November 17th, 1821. At the age of eighteen, surrounded by all the cares and temptations of a college life, he counted all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus." This has been his firm hold always since; and when his hour approached and death had set his seal on his brow, although it was unexpected, he was not unprepared. He had returned to the bosom of his family after an absence of some weeks, when he was attacked by disease, his whole system paralyzed, and shattered to the bed from which he never rose. And though his manly form was now cold, and his physical prowess destroyed, the great Author of his being left his mind unclouded and his lips unsealed, for which, as a true Christian spirit, he thanked God. And though he naturally clung to life, yet he bowed submissive to the will of his Maker, ceasing to feel that if the platform of fond and living hopes and schemes should crumble beneath his feet, that the omnipotent Being would hold out an arm of might to sustain him in his darkest hour.

And when that hour approached, when the angel of death stood ready and waiting at the door, when the pulses of his heart grew feintor and fainter, with a steady and unwavering faith in the promises of his Maker, his spirit winged its way home—home to rest forever in the penoseful bosom of his God. He left us Thursday, May 16, 1855.

Let the widow and orphan be comforted, for there is one above who careth for them.

EDWARD H. and JOHN A., youngest and only surviving sons of James and Louisa Williams to their death by drowning, while bathing in Big Black river, near Bowles' Ferry, on the 3d May.

Edward was fourteen and John twelve years old. Never before was it my painful duty to communicate such sad intelligence to a parent. Early in the morning on the 3d, these lovely boys, with hopes buoyant and hearts light, bade a last adieu to all left at home to spend the day with some friends on the river. That morning's sun found them in the bloom of health, and never did he look down upon a happier group. But, alas! alas! how attenuated the thread that connects human life and earthly bliss. That evening, when the sun was descending the western horizon, a solemn procession of many friends was seen moving slowly up in front of the parsonage of little Eddy and John, bearing their lifeless forms in mournful silence to their once happy home. The various scenes of that day beggar all description. Who can paint the deep sorrow of a fond and doating parent's heart, the thrilling anguish of a devoted mother's soul? Or the mighty upheavings of pain and sorrow that rent the hearts of two lovely, sisters and an only brother! How sad and pitiful to see the flowers, just as they rose lovely in bloom, and promise gave of many a happy day, nipped by the frost of death.

A small mound of earth in the graveyard at Richland marks the spot where their remains rest. Together they lived as twin brothers, nor were they separated in death.

It be written that the younger one, while heroic daring, plunged into the river to rescue from a liquid grave his drowning brother, but shared the same fate. All efforts to save this drowning boys were in vain. The friends present did all in their power to rescue them, even at their own peril. Their bodies were recovered in about two hours, but could not be revived.

The language of their sorrow-stricken parents, they were all their parents could desire them to be; obedient and faithful to their kind and affectionate to their sister and brother, and sincere in their devotedness to God.

The Lord has taken these lambs to himself, plucked the flowers in the bud, to transplant them in a clime more congenial to their growth and happiness. May God sanctify this deeply afflictive visitation of his providence to the good of this greatly afflicted family.

R. T. JONES.

—On the 9th May, in Wilkinson Co., Miss., MRS. ADELINE HAVARD, wife of John Havard, in or about the 28th year of her age.

Though a member of the church for nearly two years, and feeling the need and importance of a change of heart, she did not experience it until brought low by a protracted and painful illness, when her prayers were heard, and she could rely on the blood of Christ for forgiveness. By indulging a disposition, which seemed peculiar to her mind, to have a reason for everything, however dark or mysterious, and through great mental suffering, she was occasionally in a state of anxiety and perplexity; but when she would cease these difficulties, and turn to earnest and simple faith in Christ, she would be filled with light and joy. On the night before she died, the Saviour seemed to be personally present. She wanted nothing only to set a better example in the world and to rear her children for God. A few hours before she died she said, "I have come to be thankful." Her death was calm and gentle sleep. May God console the bereaved husband with the hope, which Christ, of meeting her in heaven; provide for the motherless babes; and may her death be a savor of life unto her relations, friends and neighbors. DIED—In St. Helena parish, La., April 26, MARIANA, wife of James J. Tuber, daughter of Hon. William and Mary Kinchen, in the 40th year of her age.

Sister T., brought up in the bosom of the Church by pious parents, embraced religion in her youth, was a quiet, orderly member of the Church, a lady of but few words. When she was informed that her physician despaired of her recovery, and asked in reference to her feelings, she first expressed some misgiving, but soon the cloud disappeared and she said she was ready to go. Just before she breathed her last she said she saw her Saviour, and wanted to go; then died. We sorrow not as others who have no hope.

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP DANIEL WEBSTER.

News from Central America.

The steamship Daniel Webster, Capt. Lucas, arrived from San Juan Wednesday morning. The Webster brings California passengers and papers. We are indebted to Mr. Hart, the purser, for late files. The intelligence is down to May 9, being eight days later than we previously had.

The Star of the West left San Juan, May 24, with 400 passengers and eight hundred thousand in specie for New York—Daniel Webster, with 100 passengers, at same time, for New Orleans.

San Juan river is in navigable order, and boats pass and repass without grounding. Passengers crossed from ocean to ocean in forty hours, including stoppages. No prospects of the river being lower this season.

The news from the interior of Central America is somewhat important.

Gen. Coral is still at Minaqua with 3,000 troops, under good discipline, but remain inactive for the present. Gen. Castillon is strongly fortified at Leon, awaiting the arrival of Walker, now on his way from San Francisco, with an armed force on board a schooner. After his arrival hostilities will commence and bloody work is expected, as they are all desperate men selected for the occasion. Col. Wheeler, the American Minister, was at Minaqua at last advices.

Many persons are at Greytown expecting the arrival of Col. Kinney and party, and are ready to join him. It is supposed he will proceed immediately to the gold quartz mines of Chantalles, a distance of about twelve miles from the mouth of Indian river. Business throughout the country is remarkably dull, especially at Greytown. There were no vessels in port when the Webster left.

The following items of news we gather from our California files:

The steamer, with the news of the failure of Page & Bacon, in St. Louis, arrived in San Francisco late in the afternoon of the 1st inst. That day, Page, Bacon & Co. had shipped $300,000 to New York. The next morning there was, of course, a heavy run on the house, and it is said that $400,000 were drawn out before noon, at which time the house was closed by the sheriff. It will be remembered that on the previous stoppage of the house, creditors of the house holding claims to the amount of $400,000 were induced to accept certificates, payable in 2, 4, 6 and 8 months, guaranteed by a large number of heavy business men in the city, by subscriptions to the amount of $1,000,000. It is now currently reported and generally believed, that the guarantors held a meeting on the 5th, and after having requested the oldest member of the firm at present to execute them a mortgage on his property in St. Louis, which he refused, they passed a resolution declaring that they were not legally nor morally bound, and that they would contest the matter at law. It is understood, however, that several of the guarantors express their determination to pay all they have subscribed. The paper of Page, Bacon & Co. is now selling at 50 per cent. discount, and less. So says the California Chronicle.

The Legislature of California adjourned on Monday, the 8th instant. No Senator has been elected, and Governor Bigler is in the field, and warmly pressed by his friends, as a candidate for that high office.

The Shasta Courier of the 5th instant, learns from a note addressed to J. T. Laudrum, Esq., of Shasta, by Messrs. L. Fleming, W. Harr and J. Tuttle, that two men, William Cockran and Jesse Brown, were recently murdered by the Indians, on the South Fork of the Cottonwood. It is said that Brown had with him about one thousand dollars, and Cockran four or five hundred.

The ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Fremont case, to the effect that a precise definition of boundaries is not necessary to the validity of Mexican and Spanish grants, is likely to create considerable excitement. On the 8th the U. S. Land Commission confirmed a claim "for six square leagues of land on the San Joaquin river, beginning at the base of the Sierra Nevada and running down stream."

The brig Vesta, destined for Nicaragua, sneaked from the harbor at 1 o'clock on the morning of the 5th inst., having on board Wm. Walker, ex-President of Sonora, and fifty-five kindred spirits. They are all fighting fellows, armed to the teeth, for the purpose, as it is understood, of taking part in the internal troubles of Nicaragua. The vessel was in the hands of the sheriff at the time she left, but they managed the keeper by threats and set him on shore at the entrance of the harbor.

The Times and Transcript, speaking of the Kinney expedition, says:

The expeditionists, numbering fifty-six, all told, were armed to the tenth, each man having been provided with two six-shooters, a bowie knife and a Mississippi rifle, which are considered to be the best tools for the development of the agricultural resources of the Republic of Nicaragua. The Walker expedition will, it is supposed, be joined by a portion of the Kinney expedition, who are to sail from New Orleans, and via the San Juan river, effect a junction with their brothers-in-arms from the Pacific side. If the expedition from the Atlantic side be as well equipped as that which sailed from this port on Thursday night, the Chamorro party in Nicaragua will have a rather hard time of it in maintaining their ascendancy. Exciting news may hereafter be expected from Central America.

SHIP BUILDING IN LOUISIANA

The last Legislature of Louisiana, notwithstanding all its sins of commission and omission, enacted some very good and wholesome laws. First among these we class the act "Relative to Ship Building," which is to continue in force for five years from the 19th of March, 1855. We copy the material portion of the law for the benefit of our ship builders and the public:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana, in General Assembly convened, That a reward or bounty is hereby offered, and shall be given by this State to each person or association of persons, whether residents of this State or otherwise, who shall build and complete, or cause to be built and completed, within this State, any ship or vessel of a tonnage, each of more than fifty tons burthen; which reward or bonus shall be five dollars per ton, on the measurement, for each ship or vessel; and for each sea going steamer so built and completed as aforesaid; and four dollars per ton for each and every river or lake steamer so built and completed as aforesaid.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, &c. That any person drawing the said bounty shall file in the office of the Secretary of State a certificate, signed by the collector of the Port of the builder, which shall state the name of the builder, the name and tonnage of the ship or other vessel; was wholly built and completed within this State; and upon the production of a copy of said certificate countersigned by the Secretary of State, it shall be the duty of the Audit or Public Accounts to give to the holder of said certified copy a warrant upon the Treasurer for the amount to which he may be entitled.

We have always considered it the primary duty of every government to foster, promote and encourage, domestic industry and enterprise, to the fullest extent consistent with reason and justice. Home development, home advancement and home aggrandizement, should be the first objects sought to be accomplished by our legislators. The interests of labor have been too long undervalued, in the South especially. Nothing adds so much to the wealth and strength of any community or commonwealth, as the possession of large numbers of the followers of the industrial trades, pursuits and avocations. These are facts incontrovertible. And, while their possession does so much for a community, their absence is injurious in a proportionate ratio.

The business of ship building should be carried on largely in Louisiana—should bring to the State hundreds, if not thousands, of industrious and skillful mechanics—and would, were our natural advantages properly appreciated and cultivated. As the Legislature has taken a step in the right direction, we really indulge in hopes that results, fruitful in good, may flow therefrom, and that the time is not far distant when Louisiana ships and steamers will be known and admired in all of the important ports of Christendom. It seems to us the bonus offered by the State is quite liberal, although we confess to an exceedingly small amount of practical knowledge in the premises.

That ships and steamers can be built just as cheaply in this State as in the north, there can be no doubt. What is wanting is skill, enterprise and capital, and all of these can be brought to bear, where ample remuneration offers itself, as it does in Louisiana. We possess the finest ship timber in the world in inexhaustible quantities, which is easy of access and can be cheaply transported to any given point. Almost every day this timber is cut down, split, hewed and sawed into proper lengths and shapes, and sent to Northern ship yards thousands of miles off, where it is used in the construction of vessels, many of which come back here to engage in the transportation of Southern produce. Now, would'nt it be cheaper to build the ships where the timber is, than to send that same timber off some thousands of miles and there build the ships? Of course it would. This proposition is clear. There would be a vast saving in expense, to say nothing of local advantages added, to which the bonus offered by the State ought to give a stimulus to the business such as would make it grow and prosper until it becomes one of the most important pursuits of the State. In some future occasion we shall recur to this subject more particularly.

RELIGIOUS FLAGELLATIONS.—A correspondent of the New York Express, writing from Rome, furnishes the following:

I witnessed last night one of the most ridiculous ceremonies a man in his wildest dreams could imagine—a flagellation. I wish some body like Dickens would write a description of it, that I might copy and send it to you; for the whole thing consists in having it set before you in as ridiculous and ludicrous a light as it appeared to me. I never can do it justice.

Two American artists, one French ditto, Matteo—your respected correspondent—and a yellow spaniel (the property of one of the aforesaid American artists) left the trattoria, or restaurant, last evening at 7 o'clock, in search of the church San Something, where a band of wicked people were, in consequence of their sins, going to flagellate themselves, and thereby mortify the flesh. Having discovered the church, and having nearly broken our necks in stumbling over the benches, which were strewed promiscuously about the nearly pitch-dark church; having, finally, secured seats on one side, we made our observations, which were that the building—tolerably large, about twice the size of the "Edward's"—was lighted merely by five small wax candles near the altar; that some two or three hundred individuals were scattered about looking like spooks in the mysterious darkness; that many of them were kneeling; that it was cold, and that if the performance did not commence soon, they would have to do without our illustrious presence.

We had half concluded that it was a "sell," when some priests came out from a side-door, and, with the assistance of two small boys with bald spots upon the crowns of their heads, who swung censors with smoking frankincense, and another small boy who had a bald spot upon the crown of his head, and who rang a tea-bell from time to time; mass performed, and all went out at the same door, except one monk, who commenced a tiresome and stupid discourse about the necessity of sinners from time to time, when they felt convinced that they needed it, of mortifying the flesh in a humble and becoming manner. During the sermon, some of those in the church who responded the loudest, arose from their knees, and kneeled in the centre, when another man with a bald place upon the top of his head—and a black gown thrown over him, distributed among them a variety of leather straps about two feet in length, and with which those in the middle of the church would belabor themselves when the time came.

The old monk waxed warm and enthusiastic, and when finally the five lights were extinguished, one after another, until it was total darkness, the noise commenced, and such thrashings and beatings as we heard, but could not see, kept us in continual convulsions of laughter, as we were almost afraid we should be turned out. It sounded precisely as if the whole forty or fifty were beating one another with the straps, and I have no doubt some of them were so doing. I assure you it was very ludicrous; and when a light was brought suddenly in, to the consternation of the scrappers, they all sneaked back to their obscurity, at the sides of the church, and the old monk once around, took his straps from the flagellated ones, and the doors being opened, a fresh crowd came rushing in, who no doubt repeated the performance; but we had satisfied ourselves, and scrambling over the benches, made our way out into the street. What sights one does see in Rome!

U. S. TROOPS.—The Baton Rouge Gazette learns that orders have been received at the barracks to prepare quarters for a detachment of 250 recruits, destined for the 7th Regiment of Infantry, and for Major Hunt's Light Battery, at present stationed in the Indian country at the Upper Arkansas. This detachment will probably remain here until there is a sufficient amount of water in the Arkansas river to admit of a steamboat transportation as high as Fort Smith.

The following named officers accompany the detachment, viz: Capt. Jno. M. Jones, 1st Lieut. M. R. Stevenson, and Asst. Surgeon Wm. W. Anderson.

This will make the force at the barracks under Captain Barry's command some where about 400 men when, in our memory serves us, is the largest number of U. S. troops we have had in the garrison here for many years.

Queen Victoria was 35 years of age on the 24th of the present month, May. She was married at 20, in the year 1840, and has given birth to seven children, all of whom are still living. Prince Albert is yet in his prime, and the family will, doubtless, be largely increased.

Our "Fem. Sems."

A writer for the Eufaw (Ala.) Whig contributes a pair of pungent articles on the defects of the educational systems pursued in most "Female Seminaries." He makes good quotations, too:

"The female educators, now-a-days, seem pretty generally to have adopted Mrs. Malaprop's course of female education, and, like that ancient lady, they don't think there is a superstitious article in it."

Hear Madame Malaprop:

"I would by no means wish a daughter of mine to be a progeny of learning. I don't think so much learning becomes a young woman. For instance, I would never let her meddle with Greek or Hebrew, or Algebra, or Simmy, or fluxions, or parallaxes, or such inflammatory branches of learning; neither, would it be necessary for her to handle any of your Mathematical, Astronomical, diabolical instruments. But, Sir Anthony, I would send her at nine years old to a boarding school, to learn a little ingenuity and artifice. Then, sir, she should have a supercilious knowledge in accounts, and as she grew up I would have her instructed in Geometry, that she might know something of the contagious countries. But above all, Sir Anthony, she should be mistress of Orthography, that she might not misspell and mispronounce words so shamefully as girls usually do, and likewise that she might reprehend the true meaning of what she is saying. This, Sir Anthony, is what I would have a woman know, and I don't think there is a superstitious article in it."

The writer continues:

"Now it may be gathered from what has been said, that these female seminaries by no means qualify a young woman for discharging the duties of life. Now if those duties were to go balls and parties after supper, and dance and play until the 'wee short hours ayant the twal,' then lay and sleep until 10 o'clock the next day, rise with a bad appetite and drink bad coffee and eat bad food of all kinds, then go to the shops and spend the forenoon in running up bills for the purchase of ribbons, laces, &c., returning to a dinner of unclean quality, afterwards consuming the evening at the piano and paying calls—if these were the duties required, then the education received at the 'Fem. Sems.' would suit to a T. But unfortunately for the comfort of young ladies, these do not comprise the duties of life. A woman has higher duties to perform. * * * * That this last is an important female duty, I shall prove by quoting the writings of a much better man than myself, and one worthy the profoundest respect from everybody:

'There are duties devolving of right on the husband, and other duties devolving of right upon the wife. Thus it is the duty of the husband to provide for the wants of the family, and of the wife to assume the charge of the affairs of the household. His sphere of duty is without, her sphere is within. Both are under obligations to discharge these duties specially, because they are parties to the marriage compact. That man is worthily despised who does not qualify himself to support that family of which he has voluntarily assumed the office of protector. Nor surely is that woman less deserving of contempt who, having consumed the period of youth in frivolous reading, dissipating amusement, and acquisition of accomplishments which are to be consigned immediately after marriage to entire forgetfulness, enters upon the duties of a wife with no other expectations than that of being a useless and prodigal appendage to a household, ignorant of her duties and of the manner of discharging them; and with no conceptions of responsibilities which have been assumed than such as have been acquired from childish caprice, luxurious self-indulgence, and sensitive, feminine, yet thoroughly finished selfishness. And yet I fear the system of female education at present in vogue, is, in many respects, liable to the accusation of producing precisely this tendency.'—Wayland.

Who will gainsay this? I shall quote another passage from the same author which leans on the subject, and may be the source of pleasant reflection to many young ladies:

'The husband, by the employment of capital, labor and skill, in productive consumption, secures an annual revenue for the purpose of consumption, in various means of gratification, whether necessary or superfluous. The expenditure of this annual revenue, or the making of those arrangements which govern the expenditure, generally devolves upon the wife. If that expenditure be made without economy, either the gratifications which it might procure are never enjoyed, and in all the consumption neither comfort nor pleasure is obtained, or it is obtained at an expense perfectly ruinous. Hence it will be seen that the physical comfort, as well as the means of happiness of both parties, depends more on the domestic education of the female sex than is ordinarily supposed. Affection will rarely exist in the atmosphere of self-inflicted poverty. No man can respect a woman by whose ignorance of her appropriate duties he is plunged into disgraceful bankruptcy, and wedded to hopeless penury. Nor let it be supposed that no talent is requisite skilfully to superintend a household. It requires at least as much ability to direct with skill, and on principle, the affairs of a domestic establishment, as to select a ribbon or dance a minuet, to finger a piano or embroider a fire-screen.'

A great deal more might be said on this topic. It is very suggestive. But enough has already been said to satisfy the most incredulous, if they will believe it, that the course of instruction pursued in these female seminaries by no means prepares young ladies attending them for the discharging the most important duties of life, but rather converts them into a species of gilded butterfly, who flutter about the resorts of fashion until some fool, captivated by their colors, wins their hearts (easy prizes) and conveys them away to ornament his parlor, where they reign for awhile as bauble-in-chief among other fool's baubles, and then sink into perfect insignificance."

All well said, as far as "ologies" are allowed to supercede orthography and syntax, as is seen in notes that are enough to turn the edge of a lover's heart, so bad is the spelling and grammar. But the reform called for must be effected in the "Fem." homes, and by the "Fem." parents. Our domestic education is more at fault than the seminary.

SLAVE PRODUCTS AND COMMERCE.

The unconstitutional and infamous conduct of the Massachusetts Legislature, in passing what is usually termed the "Personal Liberty Bill," despite the veto of Governor Gardner, has excited general and wide spread indignation throughout the country. This feeling is not confined to the South, by any means. It prevails extensively over the North, and the leading journals there comment upon it in terms of deserved severity. Indeed, more contempt, pity and scorn, have been manifested at the North than at the South. And, when we look at the matter in all its bearings, there is no case for special wonder. The honorable, patriotic and conservative portion of the people of the North, feel mortified, humbled and outraged at the vile wrong a fanatical Legislature has practised upon one of the most ancient and renowned commonwealths of the North American confederacy. They feel that a foul disgrace has been put upon that which once was noble; that political scavengers have polluted the temple of patriotism; that treason has reigned rampant in the halls of legislation; that corruption has triumphed over right; that dark and gloomy fanaticism, has usurped the posts of reason and justice; and that envy, hatred and all uncharitableness, have borne away, where love of country, reverence for the constitution and laws, and fraternal regard, should have unrecked unlimited control.

In view of these facts, it is not at all surprising that the sensible and discreet of our Northern brethren condemn the "Personal Liberty Bill," which nullifies an article of the constitution of the United States and a law of Congress—the Fugitive Slave law—at one and the same time, in language of severe and just denunciation. No excuse, no palliation, can be found or devised for such traitorous conduct. It stands before the world a legislative achievement of unmitigated villainy—conceived in fanaticism, brought forth in corruption, and named by those who would become Benedict Arnold's if they had the nerve or the opportunity.

The practical bearing of this act will operate to the injury—perhaps material detriment—of Massachusetts. It cannot, and will not operate to the disadvantage of the South, for so far as the nullified law is concerned, the attempts to enforce it have been productive of far more damage than benefit. Were it taken from the statute book this section of the Union would suffer no pecuniary injury. Save as the exponent of a constitutional principle, the law is comparatively worthless, while it has been the malestay and chief reliance of the Abolition leaders of the North. It and the Nebraska bill, have been god-sends to Greeley, Garrison, Sumner, Seward, etc. But, for them, the staple of fanaticism would long since have run out, and probably quiet would have reigned in the land are this.

While this sentiment of patriotic indignation is showing itself throughout the country, giving cheering token of the advent of better times; while all the indications go to show that there is an upheaving of national and fraternal feeling in the hearts of the people, from Maine to California, which will, it is to be hoped, "crush out" the hydra of fanaticism; and while non-intercourse is openly advocated in influential quarters, it may be well enough to reflect a little before proceeding to extremities, and consider whether Massachusetts will not come out right if we give her time. In the first place, we do not believe all reason and common sense have fled the State, because a few run-mad bigots have obtained temporary ascendancy, and if they have, self interest, all-powerful and controlling, would dictate a retracing of the unconstitutional steps taken. Of all the States of the Union, Massachusetts is the most dependent upon the products of slave labor. She cannot get along without them. Deprive her of cotton alone, and the State would be ruined. It is the life-blood of her strength, prosperity and wealth, and stimulates and invigorates every department of her industrial system. It gives employment to thousands and tens of thousands of her population. In its manufacture are invested some one hundred millions of dollars capital, which have yielded enormous profits, much of which has contributed to the building of railroads and ships, and the general improvement of the State. It has given employment, indirectly, to thousands of hardy ship builders, and then found employment for the ships. Without cotton and the profits, business and pursuits, which flow directly from it, where would Boston and Massachusetts be, so far as wealth and progress are concerned? The suggestion is so obvious that it needs no answer.

Because the people of that State have partaken of the insane root, it does not follow that they will remain everlastingly poisoned. They will recover in time to prevent being pushed over the verge of ruin, or else we are much mistaken in their shrewdness, not to give them credit for more exalted emotions. And when the revulsion does take place, the disgrace a wretched band of fanatics have inflicted upon the escutcheon of a once glorious State, will be wiped out. At least we hope so, and we always hope for the best.

This world cannot get along without the products of slave labor. And until the world can so get along, slaveholders will be protected in the enjoyment of their rights, with here and there an unimportant infringement, no matter how strong the talking or intense the apparent excitement. An Embargo law, if enacted by the next Congress, prohibiting the export of a single bale of cotton, would do old England—the mother and nourisher of abolitionism—more injury in twelve months than the Russian war has done or will do in twelve years. She is more dependent upon cotton than Massachusetts. Stop her cotton factories and she would be ruined. Hence the impregnability of our position. We can afford to laugh to scorn the efforts of mock philanthropists until the products of the earth or the wants and necessities of mankind change.

To enforce our proposition we submit the following from a Virginia paper, which Hunt's Merchants' Magazine says, "right or wrong, there is more truth than poetry in its statements:"

The whole commerce of the world turns upon the product of slave labor. What would commerce be without cotton, sugar, tobacco, rice and naval stores? All these are the product of slave labor. It is a settled fact that free labor cannot produce them in sufficient quantity to supply the demands of mankind. The world follows its interests, and if free labor was more valuable than slave, it would be employed at this moment in the United States, Cuba and Brazil, which are all open to free labor. What would become of England, the arch-agitators of abolitionism, but for cotton, by the manufacture of which she has waxed fat and strong, while she curses the system by which it is produced. By the way, will some one inform us why the English consciences has never suffered as much from slavery in Brazil as slavery in the United States?—Crescent.

FAMINE IN GEORGIA.—Accounts from the northern part of Georgia represent that many people in that section are without corn, or the means to procure any. There is none for sale, and there is serious danger of famine. Horses and mules are turned out into the wilds to wait for grass or starve, so that no plowing can be done, and planting must be done with the hoe. Unless relief be extended, the poorer class of that section must perish.

The groans of a Christian are far more musical than the songs of a sinner.

The believer cannot sigh without his God observing it.

Miscellaneous Items.

A big tooth of a fossil elephant has been found near Enon, Clark county, Ohio, which, with the roots attached, would have weighed fifteen pounds, as in its fragmentary condition it is eleven inches long and three inches thick. The Dayton paper supposes the head of the animal must have weighed four thousand pounds.

Jarvis, the painter, was one day employed in painting a portrait of Bishop ——, and during the progress of the sitting the venerable prelate began to remonstrate with him at the dissipated course of life into which he had fallen. Jarvis made no reply, but dropping his pencil from the forehead of the portrait to the lower part of the face, he said, with a slight motion to the reverend sitter, "Just shut your mouth, my lord." By painting upon that feature he changed the subject in two senses.

Mrs. Mary Carney, now residing in Coffee county, Tennessee, was one hundred and one years of age, on the 4th day of the present month, May. She retains her sight surprisingly, her general health is good, her mental faculties are unimpaired, she knits and performs other light work with activity, walks about and converses with her friends, and still possesses a cheerful mind.

A singular freak is said to be exhibited by the Catfish in the Mississippi, along its banks. At Natchez, many of them of late, have been seen floating to the shore nearly or quite dead—a sense of rare occurrence for many years before. What is the cause of this? A learned friend suggests that they have been killed by the under current, or by hot springs in some portions of the Mississippi, or in other rivers.

At a lecture of Bayard Taylor's, lately, a lady wished for a seat, when a portly, handsome gentleman brought one, and seated her. "Oh, you're a jewel," said she, "oh, no," he replied, "I'm a jeweller—I have just set the jewel!"

A FISH STORY.—A species of perch, found in Tranquebar, on the Coromandel Coast, East Indies, it is said, not only creeps on shore, but actually climbs up tall fan palms, in pursuit of certain shell fish, which form its favorite food. Covered with viscid slime, he glides smoothly over the rough bark; spines, which he may sheath and unfold at will, serve him like hands to hang by, and with the aid of side fins and a powerful tail, he pushes himself upward, thus completing this strange picture of fish and shell fish dwelling high on lofty trees.

A miserly gentleman having billeted himself on his friend in Edinburgh during the royal visit, was talking to a friend, on his return, of the great expense of living. "How much, now, do you suppose I spent in Edinburgh?". "I do not know," replied his friend, "I should suppose about a fortnight."

Mr. Soule and Mr. Perry.

The New York Herald of the 23d, publishes the following synopsis of a document issued by Mr. Perry, late Secretary of the United States Legation at Madrid and Charge d'Affaires ad interim, in defence of his conduct while occupying those positions. It is in reply to charges brought against him by the flon. Pierre Soule in the letter published by him on the 24th of March last, in the Washington papers:

It is a lengthy and interesting document, and covers the whole ground of the allegations made against the writer's conduct, not only during the time when he was Mr Soule's subordinate in the Spanish Legation, but frequently since he has been entrusted with the whole responsibility of its duties. Mr Perry retorts the charge of his being "a spy and traitor" by showing that Mr. Soule had himself all along acted a double part, by transmitting erroneous information to government respecting the real feelings and views of the Spanish Cabinet and people in reference to the sale of Cuba, and also by so purposely mismanaging the affair of the Black Warrior as to impede the success of the reclamations of the American government. Whilst selling this part on the one hand, Mr. Perry states that Mr Soule persisted in declaring in his dispatches to Washington that no arrangement of that question, or of any other subject of our complaints with Spain, was practicable even for months after he (Mr Perry) had informed him that the Spanish Government were desirous to arrange that question and all others. He also charges Mr. Soule with suppressing an important dispatch from the Secretary of State intended for the Spanish Government, in reference to this same affair of the Black Warrior, during a space of five months. Mr Perry adds, that immediately after Mr. Soule's departure from Madrid he succeeded in remedying the mischievous effects of this proceeding, and in obtaining from the Spanish government a satisfactory proposition for the settlement of the case, and ultimately its complete adjustment, after Mr Soule's final departure in February last.

As still further proofs of the evil influence which Mr. Soule's personal hostilities and filibustering tendencies exercised over the negotiations between the countries, Mr Perry states that when relieved from them he procured from the Spanish government a proposition for the settlement and immediate payment of all claims involving private interests which had been presented by either government to the other since 1834. He obtained an overture for the negotiation of a great treaty "conceding immense benefits to our commerce, and securing the prompt and complete protection of the political, religious and social rights of our citizens, in future, in every portion of the Spanish dominions, in consideration for similar benefits conferred on Spanish subjects and their commerce by the United States."

Mr Perry makes various other charges against Mr Soule, of attempted tampering with and direct him from the honest discharge of his duties, and also of intercepting in Paris a despatch addressed by him (Mr Perry) to the Secretary of State at Washington. The statements will no doubt provoke a reply from Mr. Soule, who will probably give us the whole history of the affair in his forthcoming narrative of his mission. It is but right to add that the telegraphic correspondence from Washington states that despatches have been received from Madrid which indicate that the promises and independence held out by Spain in connection with Mr. Perry's "great treaty," are all bosh, and thrown out to gain time and humbug the present Administration. Another correspondent in Washington has sent us an epitome of the instructions sent out with Mr. Dodge, and which, if correct, would go to show that, like the double instructions of Mr Soule, they are merely drawn up for political effect.

The Richmond Enquirer of the 25th says: "The returns so far are not sufficiently distinct to warrant any positive statement of the result. The triumphant election of Wise, however, is indicated beyond a doubt."

FINE IN THE WOODS.—We hear of extensive spontaneous combustion going on in the woods and swamps of the Cotile country, in Livingston, also of the fences around plantations in this parish being destroyed by fire. Upon the Cotile, we learn, the fire has been raging every week, burning the grass, pens and even large trees; the explosion of the cane being heard for the distance of five miles, more or less, like the continuous roar of musketry. A dispatch of the 19th from Wilmington, Del., says:

The Rev. Theodore Parker, of Boston, addressed a large audience here last evening in Odd Fellows' Hall. His subject was slavery. This was the first appearance of this champion of freedom in a slave State, and his discourse was listened to with the closest attention and most deep interest. The lecturer was greeted with frequent applause during the delivery of his discourse, and at its conclusion the audience complimented him by a vote of thanks also.

Mrs. Blaeque, daughter of Dr. Mott, of New York, and wife of the interpreter to the Turkish Legation in Paris, recently died suddenly, in consequence of the reception of a letter from her absent husband, in which he stated that he had married another wife (a Greek lady,) as it was his clear right to do according to his religion and the customs of his country. He added that he had no desire ever to see her again.

New Orleans Money Market.

Wednesday Evening, May 30.

Long dated paper was easier for sale to-day at the rates prevailing on Monday, say 9½ to 10 per cent., with some few at lower. A transfer in the neighborhood of 8 per cent. was effected. As a general question on the greater part of the paper appearing on the market 10 per cent. approximates the closest limit of operations. 12 to 12½ for good second grades. There is no probability of the banks extending their load whilst the current low and then no more very strong paper, consequently the market outside of it and will be for another month well supplied with various grades of factors' acceptances.

FULL PARTICULARS.

The U. S. mail steamship Baltic left Liverpool at half-past one o'clock, P. M., on Saturday, May 3rd and arrived at New-York at six o'clock on the afternoon of the 13th, having experienced strong westerly gales during her passage. The news by this arrival will be found highly interesting.

Throughout England a strong feeling against the ministry is being manifested; "indignation meetings" regarding the conduct of the war have been held in Derby, Sheffield and other places.

The Emperor of the French narrowly escaped assassination on Saturday evening, April 28th.

Lord John Russell and M. Drouyn de l'Huys, have returned to London and Paris, the negotiations having failed.

There is some talk of a mediatory proposition on the part of Austria, with the consent of Prussia, being likely to be accepted.

With regard to the seige of Sebastopol, no advantage decisive enough to warrant an assault has been gained, and it is generally believed that the seige operations must be abandoned for the present.

The position of the Allied forces in the Crimea is exciting the greatest anxiety and apprehension at home.

Immense Russian reinforcements are spoken of as hovering near Sebastopol, ready to throw themselves at any time along the whole line of Allied operations.

The fire of both the English and French armies had been continued before Sebastopol; but, though superior to that of the enemy, Lord Raglan admits that it had not produced that effect which might have been anticipated from its continuity, power and accuracy.

The Russians have been making fierce and vigorous sorties, and the fighting has been severe on both sides.

Telegraphs from Sebastopol to the 28th ult. state that on that day the Allied commanders had suspended their fire, so as not to exhaust their ammunition, and that they were awaiting reinforcements, which were hourly expected.

General attack has yet been made by the fleet on the seaports, though each night a single steamer has been enabled to approach sufficiently near them to throw both shot and shell to advantage. The siege before Sebastopol is in good condition; the troops are healthy, well-fed, housed and clothed. Enough reinforcements were constantly arriving up to the latest dates, the Allies were feeble, numerous enough to sufficiently well provided to undertake a long campaign in the interior of the Crimea, with a much reserve of 60,000 men at Marshall, near Constantinople, it was expected, would be transported to Sebastopol as soon as transports could be found. There is some talk in Paris about the recall of General Canrobert, to take the place of General Pelissier as Minister of War. General Pelissier would, in that case, succeed Canrobert in the Crimea.

A Russian dispatch, however, dated the evening of the 29th, says: The fire of the enemy is moderate. Their approaches progress slowly. We have established, at 100 yards from Bastion [illegible] a line of rifle pits which serve to form a [illegible] communication.

The [illegible] and French and English accounts of [illegible] are, in some instances, widely various. The following is Prince Gortschakoff's Account.

The Invalide Russe publishes Prince Gortschakoff's account of the bombardment to the 15th, and by telegraph the Russian official accounts are brought down to the 24th of April. Prince Gortschakoff describes the cannonade which was opened by the allies, on the 9th, as tremendous, its object being evidently to dismount the Russian guns. The besieged replied with smoke, and on the 16th in less than four hours, silenced [illegible] of their opponent's guns. From this circumstance Prince Gortschakoff judges that the loss of the enemy must have been considerable. Some of the Russian guns and gun-carriages were dismounted, but were immediately replaced by others, and all the damage done to the [illegible] and batteries was [illegible] succeeded.

The [illegible] sustained by the garrison from the 9th to the 15th of April, is set down at [illegible] subalterns, and 435 men killed, and 6 superior and 34 subaltern officers, and 1899 men wounded. In his dispatch of the 24th, Prince [illegible] says: The fire of the enemy [illegible] slacker. The damage done to our [illegible] and the lines of the garrison, are [illegible] in proportion.

English and French Accounts.

The official dispatches from Lord Raglan come to the 17th April only, and from General Canrobert to the 16th. Lord Raglan states that the condition of the army before Sebastopol continued to improve, and morale from the [illegible] The correspondence [illegible] hay [illegible] given a [illegible] Turkish troops. The North Fork—A Gentle Mint.

The correspondent of the Morning Herald, writing on the 15th, says: "Fort Constantine, and the forts north of the harbor, for the first time took part in the contest to-day, firing clear across the harbor and town into our own and the French lines. Their shot appeared to be of immense size, and their guns of considerable range, as to entire elevation, apparently, was given. About 500 rounds were fired. Our fire was taken in a gentle line that, even after morning, the south side will be formidable while the north remains in [illegible]

During the last week of [illegible] English trenches alone fired away between fifteen thousand and seventeen thousand 32 and 68 pound shot and shell; 2,800 thirteen-inch shells, and 4,500 ten-inch shells; making in all about 2,200 tons of shot, and five hundred tons of powder. The English trenches mounted on the 15th, 154 guns and mortars: the French 230; so that during the first week's bombardment about 6,000 tons of shot and shell, and 1,500 tons of powder were expended.

The Vienna Negotiations

The veil has been lifted a little off the Vienna negotiations. It appears that the Allies mildly proposed to Russia two alternatives—one that the Euxine should be declared a neutral sea, open to the commerce, and closed to the ships of war of all nations; the other that the Russian force in that sea should be in some degree limited. The Russian plenipotentiaries abruptly rejected both these propositions, and afterward made some counter propositions of their own, which England, France and Austria unanimously agreed were inadmissible. These propositions were to the effect that the Dardanelles should be closed; that the Black Sea should be navigated solely by Russian and Turkish ships, without any surveillance by their powers; and that the treaty of 1841 should be modified to that extent; that Turkey, if menaced, might call upon the other Powers for assistance.

According to the latest advices from Vienna, Austria has, with the support of Prussia, made a mediating proposition which the belligerent powers are likely to embrace. According to this plan, (says the Daily News,) Russia would be entitled to restore her Black Sea fleet to its former strength, each of the Allies to maintain half as many ships there as Russia during the process. It is reported that if this proposition be not accepted, Austria will at once commence active hostilities. It is positively announced in the Constitutionnel that Austria signed the military convention with the Western Powers on the 26th ult.

The English Baltic Fleet was about to quit Kiel, according to the last accounts, and the French fleet about to sail from Cherbourg. Later advices by telegraph announce the sailing of the British fleet from Kiel.

Great Britain.

The Budget may be said to have virtually passed both Houses with little opposition, and little modification. The Loan Bill (£16,000,000) was read a third time and passed on the night of the 1st, by the Commons, and on the same night was ordered to be committed by the Lords.

The long-drawn Army enquiry by Mr. Roebuck's committee, is still proceeding. The most important evidence adduced is that of Lieutenant General Sir John Burgoyne, who had charge of the engineering works in the Crimea at the period under enquiry. It was never contemplated, he said, that the Allies would have to winter before Sebastopol; the opinion of the military authorities being that the place would have speedily yielded. When the army landed in the Crimea, Lord Raglan and every other officer were ignorant of the Russian strength. Sir John admitted that the whole of the military organization connected with the troops in the field was inefficient. There was a great deficiency of engineers, and a great want of sappers.

A terrible domestic tragedy had occurred at Wheelock, a village in Cheshire. Mr. James Sproston, a cabinet-maker in respectable circumstances, having slaughtered his wife with a sword, and afterwards blown out his own brains with a pistol. Unfounded jealousy, which amounted to monomania on the part of the husband led, to the deed. So far as could be ascertained by the neighbors, the parties lived together on the happiest terms, except during these fits. Both the murdered wife and the suicide were prominent members of the Wesleyan body. They had been married 14 years, but had no children.

France.

PARIS, Sunday, April 29, 1855.—At about half-past five yesterday (Saturday) evening the Emperor was proceeding at a slow pace up the grand avenue of the Champs Elysees, accompanied only by his aide-de-camp, Count Edgar Ney, and Col. Valabregue. It was a chilly evening, and there were not many people on the parade at the time. When nearly opposite No. 146 in the Champs Elysees, an assassin, leaning against a lamp-post to steady his aim, fired a pistol at his Majesty. The Emperor slightly ducked his head and spurred his horse. An instant afterward the man rushed forward, and when within a few paces of him, some say ten or twelve paces, others four or five, fired a second shot. The ball is said to have passed through the Emperor's hat.

Immediately after the second shot was fired the regicide was seized by two men in blouses, who looked like operatives, but were, in fact, agents employed by M. Balestrino, the director of the secret police. Almost at the same moment a gendarme, a native of Corsica, named Alessandrini, who, in the capacity of what is commonly termed a "bull dog," was following the Emperor in a brougham, accompanied by M. Hirvey, a commissary of police, rushed out of the carriage with a drawn poinard, and slew the murderer, who, it appears, resisted violently. Whether as a means of disabling him, or whether accidentally while laying hold of him, may perhaps be doubtful—but the fact is certain that Alessandrini wounded the man with his poinard. His wounds were however not serious; for he was able to answer the interrogatories of the magistrates a short time afterward. Immediately after the second shot the Emperor made his horse caper, and raised his hat several times, smiling, to show he was not hurt.

A few minutes after the event Liverani was placed in a hack carriage and conveyed to the guard-house outside the Barrier de l'Etoile.

The Emperor proceeded on toward the Bois de Boulogne, and a few yards outside the Arc de l'Etoile he met the Empress in a carriage. He turned his horse and accompanied her back to the Tuileries down the grand avenue to the Champs Elysees. The Empress did not appear to comprehend the meaning of the unusually loud cheers which greeted the Emperor as he passed along, and from her apparent gaiety people supposed that the Emperor had not told her what had passed.

The prisoner was taken to the Prefecture of Police, and there interrogated. He expressed his regret for his crime. He denied that he had any accomplices, but said that numbers had sworn an oath to do what he only had the courage to attempt. He declared that he had nourished the project ever since the siege of Rome.

The Daily News correspondent, writing on the evening of Monday, the 30th, says: "The real name of the assassin is not Liverani but Pianori. He had procured a passport in a false name. He was, however, as I stated yesterday, a native of Faenza. He was a volunteer at Rome under Garabaldi. Since the taking of Rome by the French, he has principally lived in England, and I am told, he belonged to the sect of Italians who renounced Catholicism. It is further stated that he has spoken at Protestant meetings in Exeter Hall. Pianori is now at the Prefecture of Police. He wears a straight jacket. A jailor sleeps at the foot of his bed to watch him. A hole has been made in the wall through which he may be seen as he lies, and several persons of note have been to-day to look at him. He lived in two well furnished rooms in the Faubourg St. Honore, the rent of which he had paid for a month beforehand. A considerable sum of money was found in his room. His pistols were of a costly description, and were well made. The "instruction" is, I believe, finished. Nothing further has been elicited from him than what I stated yesterday. It is thought that he will be tried in the ordinary assize court, and not by the High Court of Justice.

The Emperor has declined to receive formal audiences of congratulation, though an exception has been made in regard to the British residents in Paris. A crowded meeting of British residents was held on Wednesday (23) in the ball-room of the British Embassy, under the presidency of the Earl of Denbigh, and there an address, moved by the Earl of Donoughmore, and seconded by the Earl of Mayo, was unanimously adopted. The Corporation of London have also adopted a similar address.

The organs of the Fusionist and Orleanist parties have not said a word in condemnation of the crime, but have published the official account from the Moniteur without comment.

It is said that the Queen of England, accompanied by Prince Albert, will visit Paris in August. The Emperor, it is now understood, will not proceed to the Crimea.

Latest from the Crimea.

A sharp engagement took place on the night of the 1st, in the front and left attack. The whole of the Russian rifle pits were taken, eight light mortars, and 200 prisoners.

On Wednesday night last the French, under General Pelissier, having taken up a position before the quarantine bastion, attacked the advanced works the Russians had raised to protect it, and carried them at the point of the bayonet.

Twelve mortars were taken from the enemy. The French have established themselves in the conquered positions.

On Thursday night the Russians made a sortie to regain those positions, and, after a sanguinary encounter, were driven back.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

LUDICROUS MISTAKE.—Mr. Joseph Gilbert, who was too much attached to the astronomical service in Capt. Cook's expedition to observe the transit of Venus, and whose name was conferred by the great navigator, on "Gilbert's Island," resided at Gosport, where, according to the fashion of the day, like the Count d'Artois, he wore very tight leather breeches. He had ordered his tailor to attend one morning, when his grand-daughter, who resided with him, had also ordered her shoemaker to wait upon her. The young lady was seated in the breakfast-room, when the maker of leather breeches was shown in; and as she did not happen to know one handicraftman from another, she at once intimated that she wished him to measure her for a pair of "leathers," for as she remarked, the wet weather was coming, and she felt cold in "cloth." The modest tailor could hardly believe his ears.

"Measure you, Miss?" said he with hesitation.

"If you please," said the young lady, who was remarkable for much gravity of deportment, "and I have only to beg that you will give me plenty of room, for I am a great walker, and I do not like to wear anything that constrains me."

"But, Miss," exclaimed the poor fellow in great perplexity; "I never in my life measured a lady: I——," and here he paused.

"Are you not a lady's shoemaker?" was the query calmly put to him.

"By no means Miss," said he, "I am a leather breeches maker, and I have come to take measure, not of you, but of Mr. Gilbert."

The young lady became perplexed, too, but she recovered her self-possession after a good common sense laugh, and sent the maker of breeches to her grandpapa.

PRESENCE OF MIND.—A lady was one evening sitting in her drawing-room alone, when the only other inmate of the house, a brother, who, for a time, had been betraying a tendency to unsoundness of mind, entered with a carving-knife in his hand, and, shutting the door, came up to her and said, "Margaret, an odd idea has occurred to me. I wish to paint the head of John the Baptist, and I think yours might make an excellent study for it. So, if you please, I will cut off your head." The lady looked at her brother's eye, and seeing in it no token of a jest, concluded that he meant to do as he said. There was an open window and a balcony by her side, with a street in front; but a moment satisfied her that safety did not lie that way. So putting on a smiling countenance, she said with the greatest apparent cordiality, "That is a strange idea, George; but would it not be a pity to spoil this pretty new lace tippet I have got? I'll just step to my room to put it off, and be with you again in half a minute." Without waiting to give him time to consider, she stepped lightly across the floor, and passed out. In another moment she was safe in her room, whence she easily gave alarm, and returned when the madman was secured.

GUNPOWDER.—Some of the effects of ignited powder are wonderful. When it is heaped up in the open air and inflamed, there is no report, and but little effect is produced. A small quantity open and ignited in a room forces the air outwards, so as to blow out the window; but the same quantity confined in a bomb within the same room, and ignited, tears in pieces the whole house. Count Rumford loaded a mortar with one-twentieth of an ounce of powder, and placed upon it a twenty-four pound cannon ball; he then closed up every opening and fired the charge, which hurst the mortar with a tremendous explosion and lifted up its enormous weight. He also put twenty-eight grains of powder in a cylindrical space, which it just fitted, and upon being fired it tore asunder a piece of iron which would have resisted a strain of four hundred thousand pounds.

UNIVERSALISM.—A certain preacher of Universalism had been preaching in a country school-house for several successive Sabbaths, to convince the people that there was no hell. At length it was announced that at his next meeting a collection would be taken for his benefit. The day arrived, and the collection was taken up in a hat. When the "deacon" had passed through the congregation, and given all an opportunity to contribute, he returned to the desk and gravely emptied the contents of the hat upon the desk before the preacher. And such a "collection!" A few coppers, with old buttons, pieces of tin, broken jewsharps, horse-nails, and almost every other worthless thing that a man could carry to church in his pocket! The preacher was thunderstruck; but, recovering his self-possession in a moment, and gazing upon the "collection" before him, exclaimed, "Well, I am not so certain whether there is no hell or not, but I am certain there ought to be one for such fellows as you are;" and taking his hat left the house.

The Norfolk Herald gives an account of a party of six gentlemen of that city, who made an excursion to Cobb's Island, in Northampton county, Va., to shoot birds. They killed, in eight days, 1605 birds, consisting of the following varieties: The common sand bird, ring-necks, brown backs, plover, bishops, curlew, (long bill,) do., (short bill,) willits, bitterns, (two varieties,) red hills, or sea crows, sedge hens, ducks, gulls, etc. In addition to this they gathered large quantities of birds' eggs, which were quite a delicacy when fried. They also caught a number of terrapins, and gigged and captured an enormous black drum weighing 90 pounds.

From the Sandwich Islands.

Dates to the 16th ult. from the Sandwich Islands have been received in San Francisco.

The Legislature commenced its session on the 7th of April, His Majesty opening the same with the usual speech.

We learn from Honolulu, that extensive forgeries had been discovered in whaler's bills drawn last fall; over $50,000 have been protested. These forgeries have been committed by the firm of Swan & Clifford, ship chandlers, both of whom have sailed in separate vessels, fitted out by themselves a la Meiggs, just previous to the return of the drafts. It is estimated that the amount of these forged bills will exceed three hundred thousand dollars.

On the 16th inst., the British frigate President, Admiral Bruce, arrived at Honolulu, 31 days from Callao. Besides the President, H. B. M. steamer Brisk, and sloops of war Dido and Rattlesnake, were in port awaiting the arrival of the French fleet to proceed North, and the U. S. sloop of war Decatur, Capt. Sterrett.

The Polynesian gives the following news in reference to the auxiliaries to the allied Pacific squadron:

"The Monarch, 84, Capt. George Patey, the new sag ship, and the Brisk, 13, screw steamer, Commander Alfred Curtis, are daily expected. French frigate Alceste, 50 guns, was to leave Calao on March 14, for Honolulu. A French corvette was to follow the Alceste from France."

Rear Admiral Deepointes, who was in this port during the winter, in command of the French squadron, died of dropsy.

A LADY'S POSTSCRIPT TO A CRIMEAN LETTER.—"I send you, Dear Alfred, a complete photographic apparatus, which will amuse you, doubtlessly, in your moments of leisure, and if you could send me home, dear, a good view of a nice battle, I should feel extremely obliged."

P. S., No. 2.—"If you could take the view, dear, just in the moment of victory, I should like it all the better."

This reminds us of the description by "John Phœnix" of a night in San Diego, where he speaks of "the soft notes of the pistol and the pleasant shriek of the victim."

Agricultural.

MORE CORN AND LESS COTTON.—This advice cannot too often be impressed on the minds of our planting friends. Many have been compelled to purchase grain in large quantities this season, at prices almost ruinous, and we fervently hope that a lesson has been taught them which will not easily be effaced. True, economic policy demands that every article of food which can be ought to be raised at home. If this policy were general, provisions would be cheaper and cotton would be dearer; there would be less indebtedness to the merchant, and more peace of mind and absence of corroding care. Oh! the luxury of well filled corn cribs, the delightful aroma of a well stocked smoke-house, particularly if the same has cost nothing but our own labor. And, in regard to large crops of sweet potatoes and cowpens, the trouble of raising them is a mere trifle; the satisfaction of feeding the surplus to our horses and hogs, and in winter, cows, is great. No better food to produce good milk and butter in the winter can be found than cowpeas and corn, ground together in proportions of one-half each.

A Geological Discovery.

Last Saturday, in the excavation of the bank at Bennett's Cave, in Bangor, on the surface of which was the old burying-ground, the workmen turned up a variety of bones of an animal whose race is now extinct, of huge dimensions, and undoubtedly of the Saurian tribe.

The first discoveries consisted of vertebræ of various sizes, and from one foot to two inches in breadth, and of a series varying not more than a half an inch in diameter. These resemble in shape and appearance the sail-block of vessels, being of similar shape, and each perforated with two holes, and each provided with a cap, like the knee-pan, for either side of the bone, fitting perfectly and with many indentations. A number of these vertebræ have been found, and are in the possession of various individuals. Several of these may be seen at the store of L. & E. W. Gordon, on Main street. Dr. Mason has several in his possession, and other individuals have one or more of each.

Hearing of this discovery, Dr. A. C. Hamlin set to work excavating the deposit of clay in which they were found, and has succeeded in bringing to light the entire bones of one leg, and various other bones, which may be seen at his office. Among these is a part of the pelvis, or perhaps, the ossa innominata, whose largest breadth is near two feet, and the series of bones in the leg make the entire length of that limb not less than ten feet. If this animal can be assimilated to the remains of the megalosaurus or the plesiosaurus found in other localities, the whole length of the animal would reach fifty feet, with a height of not less than fourteen feet.

Of the teeth, not enough has as yet been discovered to determine whether the animal was carnivorous or only graminivorous. If predaceous, he must have been an ugly customer to meet with of a morning, and if ichthyosaurian, his presence would have been considerably annoying to boys in swimming.

It is advisable that the bones which are in the possession of various individuals, should be collected together in one place, and an attempt made, under the direction of some competent naturalist to reconstruct the whole animal. The separate bones are of no value to any body. The skeleton of the animal entire would be a sight to see. All those having fragments of this huge antediluvian should hand them over for this purpose.

The deposit in which these remains are found is black clay, above which marl is seen. The investigation is still going on. The bones are, some of them, in an excellent state of preservation. Indeed, what seems to be the marrow is found in many of them, and one lump of clear marrow, weighing some two pounds and preserving the impression of the bone which contained it has been found, and may be seen at Dr. Hamlin's rooms.

That these bones belonged to some animal whose race is now extinct is clear. Thousands of years before man inhabited the planet, these animals bestrode the earth, or lumbered with their forms the sea. They conform to none of the shapes of animated nature as are now seen, and are more like the shapes seen in some distempered dream than any thing that now has existence.

The deposit in which these remains are found, a soft, carboniferous clay or mud, is doubtless of great antiquity, long antedating the coal formation, and many of the upper strata. "The waters of the ocean," says Sir Charles Lyell, "were rolling over the highest peaks of the Alps when the marine mud on which London is built was slowly forming. [Bangor Mercury, May 14.

Sir David Brewster makes the following remarks relative to the structure of the sun: So strong has been the belief that the sun cannot be a habitable world that a scientific gentleman was prevounced by his medical attendant to be insane, because he had sent a paper to the Royal Society, in which he maintained that the light of the sun proceeds from a dense and universal aurora, which may afford ample light to the inhabitants of the surface beneath, and yet be at such a distance aloft as not to be among them; that there may be water and dry land there, hills and dales, rain and fair weather, and that as the light and seasons must be eternal, the sun may easily be conceived to be by far the most blissful habitation of the whole system. In less than ten years after this apparently extravagant notion was considered a proof of insanity, it was maintained by Sir William Herschel as a rational and probable opinion, which might be deducible from his own observations on the structure of the sun.

THE BIGGEST TRAIN YET.—A freight train, consisting of one hundred and forty-four cars, sixty-one of which were loaded with cattle, the balance with miscellaneous freight, left this city for the East, over the Central Road, on Saturday. Seven locomotives were employed in the drawing process. Can this be beaten? [Buffalo Express.

Probably it can, be, with a few more cars and locomotives.

The agricultural division of the Patent Office at Washington publishes that, in view of the strong properties of guano, it never should be placed in contact with seeds; for all seeds in the process of germination give off a greater or less quantity of carbonic acid and vinegar; and these acids, having strong affinities for the ammoniacal portion of the guano, are apt to attract it so powerfully as to check and even destroy vegetation.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

DR. JOHN BECKWITH,	WILLIAM MCNUTT,

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and mote well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be. A. H. McLEAN, Rutherford county, Tenn.

THE METHODIST DENOMINATION has long felt the need of a suitable Music Book, for Church, Conference, Social and Camp Meetings; one of suitable size, to be conveniently handled, and one which should comprise the best Hymns, familiar to the denomination, set to appropriate music. We have the pleasure of announcing that such a book has been prepared, with much labor and care, by S. Hubbard, Esq., author of "Songs of Canaan," Musical Gems, Temperance Melodist, etc., etc.; assisted by Rev. W. McDonald, of the Maine Conference, author of the Wesleyan Minstrel. The book bears the title of

THE WESLEYAN SACRED HARP.

The authors say in their preface: "Our object in compiling this book, is to supply a denominational want which is felt, and often expressed by our preachers and people. * * * We commit the work to God and his children, praying that all who sing from those pages on earth, may sing the new song in Heaven forever."

We are pleased to know that so far as it has been examined, the Harp meets the strong approbation of the denomination, and we trust that it will soon be in general use.

Zion's Herald, Boston, speaks thus of this work: "This book is, without doubt, one of the very best of its class. We like it because its pages are not disfigured by the light doggrel which sometimes finds its way into similar works. The hymns in this volume are mostly from our own hymn book. We cheerfully recommend it to all who feel the need of such a work."

From the Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati, Ohio: "We commend the Wesleyan Harp most cordially to the singing members of the church, especially all such as believe in praising God."

Price single, 50 cents; half bound, 60; cents full cloth. Also, per hundred, $40 half bound, $50 full cloth.

"Capital truths are to be narrowly eyed; collateral truths and circumstantial deliveries not to be strictly attended. And if the substantial subject be well forged out, we need not examine the sparks which irregularly fly from it."—Ex.

Nothing in criticism shows a more defective spirit than its excessive attention to minute considerations. One can understand what torture is saved by the want of microscopic power in the eye, but the analogy is rarely transferred to the intellect. There is a sort of Pharasaeism in the mind that tithes "mint and cummin." It is a conscience of trifles, that blunts the sword to sharpen a pin-point. Men soon learn to take pride in little things, and, ordinarily, it turns out that such attachments weaken the higher forces of thought. The most of our sympathies enfeeble us. This is clearly seen in the fact that small "nicetics" in literature, where they engross the skill of writers, never fail to reduce their admirers to the same level with themselves.

We are not to confound this habit with exactness of thought and statement, in all those matters that concern the delivery of the truth. Accurateness of perception and perfect propriety of expression ought to be adhered to; for in such instances we have the responsibility of copyists, and a faithful duplicate must be given. But while a literal conformity to facts is essential to the rootidea of reason and to the trustworthiness of those logical forms that convey its ideas, the whole mind is not to be restrained by such conditions. A large class of subjects provide for our freedom from these limitations. Nature, in certain departments of her work, confines the principle within the fact, and allows no privileges to her agent, intellect. Here, again, she puts it on higher ground; credits it as a principle, and yields it a free and fearless range.

Minute rules enslave our best faculties; they ruin functions, instead of functionaries. We have known many men who were mere sticklers for technicalities, and they were insufferable. Technicalists could have been endured, but when living souls brought down to the level of grammars and dictionaries, every page of their conversation a row of columns or an epitome of punctuation, was past forbearance. Not a few books are in the same category. Blair's Rhetoric may be admirable nourishment in cases of plethora, but in souls of ordinary blood it is a potent method to destroy all bold and earnest energy. Works on style, and similar topics are usually a long-drawn series of negatives, a mountain-range of objections and intsreceptives, to frighten the sensitiveness of young authors into despondency or despair. But there is a better way. Men learn good manners in the intercourse of society. A chance hour in an elegant drawing-room is worth more than a thousand dead Chesterfields. Conversation disciplines us by the indirect action of other minds, and behavior insensibly conforms to the standard present. Taste and skill in intellectual effort come in the same way. The putting forth of the power ought never to be anticipated by a directive formalism. Let the waters gush from the fountain, the stream will meander in beautiful progress to the ocean, and the simplest laws of matter will trace its course with more grace than an angel's hand could draw.

A great deal too much is claimed for art. It has a certain space in nature to occupy, but freedom of the universe is not granted. Civilization, studies, refinements, are fast making it up as an universality. There is a mania for art. We have artistical shovels and tongs, tea-kettles. Our kitchens are museums. The tin-shops and hardware stores are temples of the reigning fashions. And the same morbid passion vitiates our educational systems. Literature is reduced to the rules of bricks and mortar, or, perchance, brick and cement. The man for the age is a rhetorician. He takes the head of the table in the uppermost seat in the synagogue of the world. If I wanted to gain a reputation for honors, I should labor to be great in little things; to be a whirlwhind in the centre of crossing streets; to play leviathan in a mill-pond. But the universe scorns the low ambitory. It is no mole-hill. It loves ants and bees as ants and bees, but as nothing else. Mountains, oceans, skies and worlds were made for men, and they must come up to the measure, or lose brotherhood in the system. The common misfortune is, that we look to law for power. But power flows from another source. Heaven has superadded a higher economy to law. Christianity is a type of the new spiritual influence that mind is now destined to experience. Outside of art, we acquire strength to practice art, as outside of the moral law we find the gracious help of Christ to obey the commandments. Nature is a teacher, but no pedagogue. I find the best men are only drill-sergeants, but she inspires. I walk with her, and am never weary; I sleep on her bosom, and dream of Jacob's ladder, with its ascending and ascending angels. She leaves spontaneousness as free as air, and I am not troubled to know where she ends and I am to begin. But in the same gentle way that soothes me in sweet mystery, I find the light in me is the sunshine of her orb, and my voice the continued strain of her own utterance.

IDEALIST.

FASHIONABLE CHURCHES.

The following extract, from a new pamphlet, lately published in New York, contains some wholesome truths, fearlessly expressed. Let it fly:

"Protestantism seems to have no machinery to reach the poorer classes. The most that has been done in England or in this country has been done by Methodists. But the spirit of our Churches, generally, is worldly, self-seeking. They court the rich. The ambition of a Protestant minister, even in democratic America, is to be at the head of an aristocratic congregation. The Churches themselves are a kind of religious aristocracy. In New York, for example, what a rivalry as to what congregation shall be most exclusive. The very buildings in which they worship are constructed as if on purpose to shut out the poor. They are arranged just like a theatre, in boxes, which are held at such a price that the poor are almost, as a matter of necessity, excluded.

A fashionable church is about as sacred a place as a fashionable theatre. One is as much devoted to the god of this world as the other. Both are fitted up with gay and gaudy decorations. Both are resorted to by very fashionable audiences, for curiosity or display. The principal feeling excited or gratified is poor, pitiful human vanity. In church, as in the theatre, the audience are entertained an hour with public speaking, in which there is an occasional religious reflection or sentiment, about as solemn, though by no means as eloquent, as the moralizing of Hamlet. From both places the public, or the poorer portion of it, are strictly excluded.

How Christianity is to penetrate the whole mass of society by the agency of such Churches, passes my comprehension. Sad would be the fate of the world if its moral condition and happiness depended on those fashionable Christians, who are giddy with folly and dissipation half the year, but religiously abstain from the opera during Lent."

LYING AND LAYING.

Will you allow me to make a suggestion that I think will be useful to the coadjutors of the press in general, and especially to their reporters and not a few of their correspondents, who ought to feel a common obligation to preserve their mother tongue in all its purity and precision? It is this:

"Hens lay, but they do not lie. Hens sit, but they do not set. You can set a hen, if she is inclined to sit, but you cannot make her set."

Again:

"Ships may lie at anchor or at a wharf but they do not lay in either of those situations. Those on board may set sail, but they cannot sit sail."

Attention to these suggestions seem to be demanded by the fact that scarcely a day passes without instances of the gross misuse of the above mentioned verbs in some of the dailies, and occasionally in books.

Let it be remarked that lay and set are active or transitive verbs, and must always have an object, expressed or understood. Lie and sit are neuter or intransitive, and therefore do not admit of an object. The only real difficulty arrises from the fact that the past tense of lie, when used without an auxillary, is the same as the present of lay. But a little attention will obviate this.—[Ex.

THEIR POND SOON RUNS OUT.

A clergyman, not long since, remarked to us, "What a book the Bible is! And yet," said he, "How soon the pond of its knowledge and spirit runs out with many preachers. I feel," said he again, "that I could preach fifty years from a single book." His was an impassioned and spiritual soul. He read and investigated his Bible with the abiding conviction of its divinity and goodness. Such a minister prenches. He feeds and nourishes his people. From his pulpit the voice of God is heard. How different from another class who assume to be ministers of the Most High. To them, labor for souls and reading the Bible is an irksome and unrelishable task. The fleece, and not the flock, influences most. Their pond soon runs out.

All virtues are in agreement; all vices are at variance.

The Bible—this oldest book is always new.

The best evidence of strength in grace is to bear much with those who are weak in it.

GOD'S WILLINGNESS TO SEND THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Christ has demonstrated this divine willingness, by comparing it with the willingness of a parent to bestow good things on a child; with that affection which does more for others, and more cheerfully, than any other human affection. For what affection, in effective working, equals parental love? What mental principle will incite one to toil, to make sacrifices, and wear one's self even into the grave, like a mother's love for her child? And yet Christ declares that the Divine willingness to give the Holy Spirit is greater even than this; saying, "How much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him." "How much more" willing is the thought in this passage demanding our attention. To evince this, Christ reasons out the case by a direct appeal to the human heart. "If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is his father, will he give him a stone?" a gift which would only mock his gnawing hunger; "or, if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent?" a loathsome, if not poisonous reptile; "or, if he ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion?" not to relieve his wants, but perhaps to destroy his life. Every parent would be horror-stricken at the bare suspicion of such unnatural acts. Thus Christ reasons, drawing their parental affections, and then presses the application, "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him? How feelingly and touchingly has Christ, by this appeal, demonstrated his Divine willingness.

To impress this interesting truth on our hearts, let us dwell a few moments on the same illustration. We all know the strength and workings of parental love, as developed to our observation in others. More than this, some of us have felt it; and as Christ appeals to the parental heart, let me appeal to the same. Let me urge you who have experienced this strongest human affection to look within, and learn there by the throbbings of your own breasts, God's willingness to bestow his Spirit. Your own heart tells you how willing you are to do for children; how cheerfully for them you contrive and toil, endure watchings and privations. You live for your children. You never find it in your hearts to deny their requests, when possibly consistent to comply. You even love to surprise them with favors unasked. If they are in want, if in pain and sorrow, how do you fly to their relief. You know that the feelings of Hagar, when she laid her boy, dying of thirst, under one of those stinted trees of the desert, and stood a good way off, unwilling to witness his anguish, able only to lift up her voice and weep; that the sorrow of Moses' mother, when she could no longer conceal her dear babe from the bloodthirsty executioner, and weaving an ark of bulrushes, she leaves it on the river's brink, hoping that it may be found by one whose sympathies will be touched by the forlorn sight; that the bursting of David's heart, when he exclaims, "O, my son, my son, Absalom! would to God I had died for thee! O, Absalom, my son, my son!" were all natural; and that under the circumstances you would have felt as strongly as they. You may, indeed, actually have experienced similar yearnings of soul over suffering children. You may have watched over a sick child, have bathed his heating temples and moistened his feverish lips, attempted to soothe his piteous moans, till your heart has almost burst with sympathetic pain. More, you may have even stood over a dying child, witnessed the dying struggles, closed the eyes in death, dressed the cold yet precious form for the grave, and laid it in the coffin; while parental love has worked and wept in your heart till almost broken, and you have felt that you could give the world to bring back that child to life. You know all these tender, absorbing feelings by experience. Go, then, to your own hearts, and learn there God's good pleasure to grant his Spirit to the humble petitioner, and realize all the riches of Christ's declaration, "if ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them ask him." Think of this when you lift up your hearts to God; when you enter your closets, O, think how willing you are to benefit your children; that nothing would more revolt every feeling of your souls than to offer a stone, a serpent, a scorpion to your hungry child, craving for food. Your whole hearts tell you that you could not mock him thus. Much less will God thus mock his needy children. Think, then, of this when you pray, and let it strengthen your faith. For a parent's love is but a faint emblem of God's love to call upon him for his Spirit, and he will grant it them.

How great, then, the sin of unbelief, when praying for the Holy Spirit. Let us meditate on its enormity till our hearts are broken, and rise in humble, agonizing supplication that God would revive his work, both in us and in others.—Puritan Recorder.

Verily, the eye that sees all things sees not itself.

OUR ENGLISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Premier and the Diplomatist.

A few years ago, an erect, burly form might be seen in the House of Commons, and a sonorous but flexible voice might often be heard, which never failed to produce deep, definite and durable impressions on every gazer and listener. No one was a neutral observer: some admired, many hated, more feared him. That form and voice swayed mobs, even as it had transfixed Senates. We refer to Daniel O'Connell. His form moulders in the tomb; his voice is hushed forever. Nor St. Stephen's, nor College Green, shall hear or see him more. The House used to brand him, and thunder at him, and hiss him, and laugh at him, as if he were a felon and unfit to live. But O'Connell was strong, because he denounced proven wrongs; he was as immoveable as the woes of his countrymen were undeniable. Many a time did Lord Palmerston meet him in battle. O'Connell struck the heavier blow; Palmerston gave the keener thrust. The latter had usually a host of backers.

The debate of Friday week very much reminded us of the scenes referred to. Mr. Layard, the patriot and diplomatist, had made certain statements at Liverpool, involving certain principles, as affected by military promotion, and illustrated by the way in which Lord Hardinge's son and others did get promotion free, whilst others, who ought to have gone up by years and services, had either to endure the dead level of a given status, or buy elevation. Mr. Layard was, we think, right in his principles, but wrong in his facts. A want of careful discrimination, too narrow a range of information, too much reliance on the statements of others, an indignation which, in this instance, overleapt caution, brought the honorable member into difficulties, and called down on him such a torrent of virtuous denunciation, that he will be long before he shall fail to feel or forget it. Civilians and military poured out on him their vials of wrath. Three men only ventured to question the prudence, the policy of multiplying the long string of bitter epithets, the scorn with which personal friends and officials assailed the member from Aylesbury. He has, however, outlived the shots fired and the shocks endured. He might have fancied for the time that the monsters of Old Nineveh had taken possession of Mr. Evart, Gen. Peel, Col. Lindsay & Co., and were doing vengeance on him for disturbing their long, deep sleep beneath the mountain mounds, on which even hoary time glanced heedlessly, as if he had forgotten those who reposed beneath through many centuries. Be it so. Mr. Layard had less trouble with winged bulls of stone than he has with the facts and fallacies of our military system.

Had Mr. Layard been a shallow, feeble-minded man, he would not have been deemed worth so much powder and shot. Had the "service" been free from grounds of just imputation, we should have had less than five columns of alleged vindication and genuine vengeance, according to the measure of the Times. Let it be borne in mind that the substance of what Mr. Layard said at Liverpool has been asserted and reasserted for months by the Times. But there is this difference between it and him: The Times falls short when it is proposed to deal with the system; whilst Mr. Layard would not merely denounce, but he would seek to rectify what he denounces.

We believe that perhaps the most undeniable attribute to the power of Mr. Layard is to be found in the speech of Lord Palmerston, the speech which closed the battle of many against one, designed to crown the victors with honor, and to cover the vanquished with infamy.

We can fail to remember Lord Palmerston's treatment of Mr. Stafford, when the noble Viscount's mercy looked more like that of a partial patron than that of a man? His lordship was forbearing to a fault there; he is relentless and remorseless here. Had Mr. Stafford done so much, and has Mr. Layard done so little for his country? Was the former characterized by so many, and the latter by so few official virtues, that the difference may be thus accounted for and justified? Lord Palmerston's tribute to Lord Hardinge's bravery was graceful, and, we believe, just; but then Mr. Layard never questioned Lord Hardinge's bravery. Whether Lord Hardinge may arregate the "trumpery of personal affection and political influence" in selections for promotion, is another thing. It is not impossible that habit may have unhinged thought, as it often does with most men. Certainly, we think that, as to the case of Lord Hardinge's son, Mr. Layard has the worst of it; and every patriot would rejoice greatly should the course of investigations in which he must evidently shortly enter serve to illustrate that the Horse Guards are, in many particulars, everything but what they are said to be. Ambition and envy lie at the root of much of the censure which is unjustly and unwarrantably heaped on public men. High office and odium would seem to be all but essentially allied. Whether plebeian or patrician possess power, such is ever the case. But it is to the point which Lord Palmerston used for the promotion of his brief, bitter speech, that our attention is chiefly called. He accuses Mr. Layard of bringing a "charge against a class," of saying that the army is filled with the sons and relatives of the aristocracy; and that it is a shame it should be so. "I," said his lordship, "say quite the contrary. I say it is an honor to the aristocracy of the country that they are found enrolled in the ranks of the army and navy; that, when danger is to be courted and the safety of the country to be defended, they are the foremost in the field to defend and uphold the honor of the country. And depend upon it, when the day arrives—if it ever shall arrive—when the aristocracy of this great nation shrink from partaking in the dangers and honors of its defence, and seek in the pleasures of private life to pass their days in luxury and idleness, instead of encountering the dangers of battle and submitting to the fatigues of the campaign—whenever the country arrives at that condition, then, indeed, you may predict its fall—then, indeed, you may raise your voice against the aristocracy, as undeserving the respect of their country—then, indeed, you may say abuses exist, and that the cry of popular odium ought to be raised against the aristocracy. But I am bound to say that that reproach cannot be cast upon the upper classes of England; and so far from being of opinion that the acts to which the honorable gentleman referred are acts which imply a censure upon the aristocracy, for my part, I accept them as so many testimonies of the public spirit and manly feeling which characterize the gentlemen of this great country."

We give this at length. Surely Mr. Layard never impugned the bravery of any class of his countrymen. He never complained that the aristocracy and gentry were in the army. He complained of what every mind unbiassed by prejudice, or power, or party, complains of—viz.: that the path of honor is not open to merit, the merit of capacity, diligence and integrity—that the path to power is barred against bravery and learning, even if allied with principle, should the brave, learned and good be poor. These wretched appeals to class against class are our curse. Mr. Layard, the diplomatist by profession, damaged a good cause by mistaken facts. Whatever odium might be cast on him by Lord Palmerston, the nature of his lordship's peroration indicates the sting of Mr. Layard's speech. We grieve that on the side of the latter there is cause of complaint, and in the heart of the former a seeming disposition to elevate the claims and to extol the character of the aristocracy and the gentry at the expense of the people; and glorify a class to the abrogation of a country. It was of this, and this mainly, that Mr. Layard complained.

LEEK, May 10, 1855. X. Y. Z.

"THE GERMAN REFORMATOR."

There is henceforth no doubt about the establishment of this paper. The Missionary Board have made the appropriation, and the type is ordered from New York and now looked for. We cannot precisely say when we shall issue the first number; but we shall commence as soon as we are fully prepared. Brother Mülling is industriously getting ready. The Missionary Board recommended us to adopt the cash system, and in obedience thereto we have adopted it. They are unwilling to engage in the support of it otherwise, and we cannot risk it by ourselves. We will therefore send the Reformator one year to every person who sends one dollar; or when preachers send the names, we will credit the subscriber and look to the preacher for the money. We trust, however, that the preachers also will send the money in advance whenever practicable, as it will be needed, as we wish to establish the paper upon a safe basis.

We respectfully ask all our Church papers, and the Christian Apologist, at Cincinnati, to publish this notice, and call attention to it. Address Rev. Peter Mülling, and send in your names and money.—Tex. Ch. Ad.

A HEN NURSING CATS.—We saw at the house of F. F. Parker, Esq., a large Shanghai hen, that has been sitting for several weeks upon her eggs, has three small kittens also under her protecting wing, of which she seems to think quite as much as she does of her chickens, a part of which have broken their way out to daylight, and commenced their journey upon the "peeping" stage of life. The old cat, who is a general favorite among the hens, made her acquaintance with the Shanghai, and for several days they have dwelt in harmony together, except when pussy came late at night—then her majesty Shanghai manifests a little jealousy, that the kitten portion of her charge is to be called for, and taken by the nape of the neck to parts unknown. Can any professor in zoology, or ontology, give a Shanghaielogical or catagerical explanation of the matter.—Detroit Advocate.

THE FRENCH CRYSTAL PALACES.—The two buildings erected for the World's Exhibition in Paris, cover an area of 662,000 feet, or more than twenty-two acres. This is 32,000 square feet larger than the London Crystal Palace.—The great hall is three-quarters of a mile long (3,960 feet) and is the largest in the world.

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP PROMETHEUS.

The steamship Prometheus, Capt. Henry Churchill, left New Orleans, May 26, and arrived in San Juan, May 29. After a detention of 4 hours, during which time she discharged her freight and exchanged passengers, she left the latter and arrived at the Balize, at 6 o'clock, P. M. June 3.

The Prometheus' passengers came down the Pacific on the Company's magnificent steamship Uncle Sam in less than ten days, making the entire trip through, from city to city, in 18 days.

The Sam had 750 passengers and one million of specie on freight, besides an untrunal quantity of treasure in the hands of passengers.

The Northern Light, the New York steamer, had not arrived when the Prometheus left San Juan.

The English steamer Clyde was the only vessel in port.

Affairs have not changed in the interior. Gen. Munoz, at the head of 1800 men, is still waiting the arrival of Kinney and Walker, who are hourly expected in Nicaragua.

All the passengers by the Nicaragua route concur in praising the admirable arrangements now in operation for passing the Isthmus. The river is in the best boating order, the climate fine, scenery delightful, and fruits delicious and plenty.

By this arrival we have received files of papers up to the 10th, one week later, but we find not much news of interest. We extract the following items from the San Francisco papers:

Monetary and general affairs are steadily improving in California. The returns of gold from the mines are increasing, and the largest shipment of gold ($1,404,201 58) since February 1st, went forward on Tuesday, in the Golden Gate. The fine weather following the late copious rains has enabled the miners to pursue their labors with renewed advantages. In a word, we are hopeful enough to believe that the "hard times" of our much abused State are fast giving way to a better and more favorable state of affairs.

Wm. Molitor & Co. have commenced issuing their fifty and twenty dollar pieces, at the rate of $35,000 per day. The coin is above the United States standard and is confidently received throughout the State.

The steamer Golden Gate carried nearly 1000 passengers for the Eastern States on the 1st of May. The Sonora arriving from Panama the same day, brought 820, among whom were 120 United States troops.

The arrival of the steamship Sonora, with the news of the second failure of Page & Bacon, caused some consternation in business circles here.—Page, Bacon & Co. opened their bank the next day and paid out all the cash on hand, and at about 11 A. M. shut up never to open again. A great deal of indignation is felt here towards the house of Page & Bacon, it now appearing that some two millions have been taken from the house here to sustain Page & Bacon. The senior partner, Mr. Page, is severely censured, it being charged upon him that he kept the other partners of the house here in ignorance of the affairs of the parent house, refusing to let them see the correspondence with the Eastern house. It appears to be a most deliberate and systematic attempt to rob the people of California, and the feeling against Page & Bacon is very great. The house here will not probably pay one cent on the dollar.

No progress has yet been made in settling the affairs of Adams & Co., nor can any idea yet be formed as to what per cent. of the debts will be paid. The assignees are employed in action by the creditors in the interior, who refuse to order the transfer of the funds in the country offices into the hands of the assignees.

A wonderful clock, without machinery, has been invented in San Francisco, keeping exact time and showing no mechanism beyond a sheet of glass, a pivot and two brass hands. The invention excites much attention among mechanics.

The log books of the ships Westward Ho! and the Neptune's Car show the following passages:

The former from Boston 100 days and 18 hours, and the latter from New York 100 days, 23 hours and 30 minutes. The first arrived here on the 24th, and the last on the 25th ult.

But two of the promised nine grand operas at the Metropolitan were given, owing to some trouble between the management and the troupe. It is evident, from the short experience we have thus been favored with, that the Italian opera cannot and will not be supported in San Francisco.

A Jockey Club, on the most approved English style, has been organized in this city.

We continue to receive very encouraging accounts from the various mining districts of the State. In the vicinity of Weaverville and along the Trinity river come quite surprising instances of good luck are recorded. The permanency of the gold diggings and their inexhaustible character has now become a fixed and incontestable fact.

The far-famed gambling saloon, the El Dorado, forming a feature in the rise and progress of San Francisco, was finally closed on the 9th inst., a stringent gambling law having been passed by the Legislature.

A newspaper printed in English and Spanish is to be started at Santa Barbara, by Thomas Dunlap, to be called the Santa Barbara Gazette.

The Know-Nothing organ, entitled the Oltizen, is to appear on the 15th inst.

The following vessels have recently arrived at San Francisco from the Eastern States: Barque Orestes, Follansbee, 116 days from Boston; Elizabeth F. Willetts, 118 days from New York; ship John Land, 119 days from Boston via Tahiti; ship Mountain Wave, 109 days from Boston, via Rio de Janeiro.

The Land Commission at San Francisco, on the 15th, confirmed the claim of John A. Sutter, to 33 square leagues of land, situated on the borders of the Sacramento, American and Feather rivers. This decision, it is said, will have the effect of shaking in some measure the anxiety and uncertainty with regard to land titles in the State.

A fellow had hoaxed the people of Stockton by announcing that at a certain hour a Mr. John White would fly, with wings, from the top of the St. Charles Hotel. An immense crowd assembled to witness the exploit, and the joker then let loose from the top of the house a white goose, and made his escape through the sentrie of the crowd. The multitude, finding themselves sold, became enraged and broke into the bar-room, where they seized a person whom they supposed to be the chap—but who was not—and ducked him in a horse-pond.

Under the head of "Strange Article of Export," the Transcript says:

The ship Sunny South cleared on Monday for China, with a freight of seventy dead Chinamen. The Herald says that a company of Chinese are at work in San Francisco, who make profitable wages in disinterring the dead bodies of those Celestials who have died here, and sending them to their friends in China.

An attempt was made, on the 12th inst., by some convicts, to escape from the State Prison. Two managed to get off. A third was shot dead by the guard. On the 12th and 13th, extraordinary rumors circulated in San Francisco. It was said that all the Guards (about thirty more or less) had been killed, and that 300 prisoners had escaped. The same rumors went over a great part of the country. In consequence of these reports, a large body of soldiers proceeded from Benicia to the State Prison, to secure the country, and also to Martinez, where it was believed most of the fugitives had landed. The public had been gloriously hoaxed on the occasion.

A very rich silver mine is said to have been discovered in Sonora, which belongs to a company organized in San Francisco. The name has not yet been fixed, but it will be either the New Potosi, or the New Coson Island.

LOUISIANA.—A heavy rain fell at Baton Rouge on Thursday last. The same shower appears to have visited many parts of the State among others, Franklin parish of St. Mary. Previous to announcing the fact the Banner says:

A gentleman well conversant with agricultural pursuits, and who travels much throughout the parish, informs us that the late bright or ten days have caused more alteration in the appearance of both cane and corn than all the previous dry weather had done. Many planters, he says, who crop, now despair of making half their expenses. The cane is not only small and stunted, but completely wilted in many places, and the corn, to all appearance, is do-ing would now be useless to a large proportion of the crops of either cane or corn, as much of them are completely dried up and past recovery.

We learn from the Iberville Gazette that on the 25th an affray occurred about a mile below Bayou Goula, between Mr E. G. Wing, overseer of Mrs. Vaughan's plantation, and Mr J. A. Devore, a teacher on the plantation of Mr. Dubuclet, in which the former was dangerously stabbed with a sword-cane. Mr Devore and two sons of Mr. Dubuclet were arrested, the latter as accessories.

LOUISIANA.—The Natchitoches Chronicle complains of the great heat, and states that the thermometer has lately ranged as high as 90 degrees in the shade.

The editor of the Mansfield Times has made a trip through the country, and thinks the crops are suffering more from the drouth along the river than on the uplands.

The Concordia Intelligencer of Friday last has the following.

On Monday, the 28th inst, cotton blossoms were brought into our office by Messrs. R Alexander, overseer of Miss Pauline Davis' "Lake Place," and John Tucker, overseer of the "Vidalia Place," belonging to the same lady. We hail this early promise of an abundant harvest on our river bottoms, where the late dry season has not done the damage that is apparent on the hill lands.

The Intelligencer says that just sufficient rain to lay the dust had fallen on that place.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

The United States Mail steamship Mexico, Capt. Lawless, arrived on Saturday morning from Indianola and Galveston, bringing dates from the latter city to the 31st ult. The Galveston News of that date says:

Our interior exchanges speak more cheerfully of the prospects of the crops. A favorable change has taken place in most parts of the State within a few weeks, and it is admitted, we believe, that although a disastrous season seemed imminent, the planters were worse scared than hurt.

The weather here, up to this morning, had been very dry, but a gold shower has laid the dust, and we trust, for the benefit of vegetation, as well as our exhausted cisterns, that the rains will continue for a time.

At the District Court in Waco, W. P. Long, charged with killing Mr. Miller, was acquitted. The killing was confessed.

The Indianola Bulletin, of the 24th ult. says:

At no previous period has the amount of cotton received been so great as within the last three weeks. We have not been able to ascertain the exact number of bales but, judging from the constant stream of wagons loaded with cotton passing, it must be large.

The ordnance, belonging to Wm. G. W. Lamb, arrived April 18.

The Episcopal Convention met at Seguin on the 17th of April. There was a full attendance of the clergy. Rev. George Rattenbury and H. Pratt were ordained Priests, and Rev. H. S. Dixon, Deacon. The Convention adjourned on Sunday, April 21.

The Brazos river rose on the night of the 24th eight inches.

The Ingrange paper acknowledges the receipt of cotton blooms from three different plantations.

The County Court of Fayette county has appropriated fourteen thousand dollars for the erection of a new Court House.

"Many Citizens," through the columns of the Lagrange paper, threaten lynch law to those who persist in trading with slaves, and selling them liquor.

The Dallas Herald learns that the Hon. John Hancock, Austin, will be a candidate for Congress. The State Times says ex-Governor Wood is spoken of as a candidate for Governor, and Judge Oshlitree, Hon. Edward Clarke, of Harrison county, has been called on to run for the gubernatorial chair.

A paper, to be styled the Texas Episcopalian, devoted to the interests of the Episcopal Church, will be issued in Houston about the 15th July—so says the Telegraph.

The Matagorda Chronicle says:

We have just heard that Capt. W. S. Baker, a late resident of this county, on the Colorado, a few miles above the plane, was shot last night in his bed. The coroner of this county, with a jury, have gone up to hold an inquest on the body. We have not learned any particulars of the foul deed. The information was given by one of his engross. There was no other white person on the premises but Capt. Baker.

A large number of people assembled at San Jacinto on the 20th and 21st, to celebrate the anniversary of the great battle which broke the Mexican yoke in Texas. To avoid the danger of desecrating the Sabbath, which followed the 21st, the balls commenced on the evening of the 20th. Several hundred persons were present, many of whom were from Houston and Galveston, and though the three largest rooms to be had in the village of San Jacinto were filled in repletion by the dancers, the number of persons outside exceeded those within the ball rooms.

The glue-houses of Col. James P. Taylor, of Harrison county, was lately destroyed, with 20 bales of cotton.

The order of the Iron Heels is established at Bastrop.

Gen. Wood is out in a letter in opposition to the Stein plan of internal improvements. Rumor says his friends intend running him for Governor.

Judge Mills, says the Dallas Herald, is a candidate for Congress in Eastern Texas. There will, probably, be several candidates in the field.

The Ranger states that the Brazos River Improvement Association, which met on the 23d ult., resolved to hold a convention at Washington on the 17th inst., to which all persons interested in the navigation of that stream are invited. Ample provisions will be made on the day proposed for the accommodation of visitors, and a barbecue will be given.

A few days since a difficulty occurred at a magistrate's election in Hays county, in which Mr. J. B. J. Oliver was stabbed by Mr Thomas. Mr. Mayfield was also wounded in separating the parties.

The Central Texian anticipates much benefit to result to Grimes county from the Galveston and Red River Railroad. The President and Directors having contracted with Mr. S. H. Wells, of New York, to finish twenty-five miles from Houston by the first of January next. The road will reach Cypress Mayo, in the most thickly populated portion of Harris, and thus pass over a great deal of the low prairie which is now so formidable an obstacle to communicating. The amount now necessary to pay the contractor is $110,000, and it is proposed to raise part of this in Grimes.

GREAT FIRE IN BALTIMORE.—On the evening of the 28th ult., a tremendous fire occurred in Baltimore which, according to the Patriot, destroyed property to the value of $150,000 or $200,000. The fire commenced in Baillie, Massie & Co.'s wholesale clothing warehouse, on Baltimore street, next to Howard, and soon spread to the Imperial dry goods warehouse of Devries, Stephen & Thomas, on the corner, and thence to Howard and Baltimore streets, destroying the warehouses occupied by Nonin & Caldwell, grocers; T. S. Banty, wholesale shoe house; E. Bennett and Mayer & Bros., importers of fancy goods. The fire was checked at the warehouse of H. Garrett & Sons, on Howard street, and at the large fire-proof warehouse on Baltimore street, occupied by Joice & Baugher, shoe dealers, and Fisher & Lloyd, dealers in dry goods. Both of these warehouses were badly damaged. The owners estimate the loss on goods at $118,000, on which there was $150,000 insurance in Baltimore offices—principally the Firemen's. The loss on the buildings is $31,000, and the insurance $23,000. The losses on the stocks were all more than fully insured, the fire occurring at the time of the busy season.

LAFOURCHE ITEMS.—From that excellent paper, the Thibodaux Minerva, of the 2d, we clip the following items of intelligence:

Rain! Rain!!—Thursday last was a happy day to our planters and all those employed in tilling the soil. Their morning were turned to gladness in witnessing the end of the long continued drouth. They looked upon the soft and delightful shower as a discovered boon to the parched and watered the parched earth, causing the whole face of nature to wear the smile of contentment. Both man and beast seemed to enjoy it, and could scarcely welcome it with subdued and well-bred complacency. Oh, how delightful was it to hear the rumbling sound of the distant thunder, and then, soon after, the dark vault of the heavens opened, pouring down its liquid contents, making old trees fairly weep for joy. Nature was never more opportune, nor one so much needed as at the present. It has been productive of immense benefit to all classes, besides exerting the most salutary hygienic effects. The effects will look promising, and we hope to continue our remarks in our next issue.

Melancholy Occurrence.—Mr. James M. Bescon, of this place, a highly deserving young man, and nephew to our fellow-citizen Esq. was instantly killed on Sunday last, by a horse. In fact, he was literally kicked to death. Truly may it be said that "in the midst of life we are in death."

Dick, a negro boy belonging to the estate of the late Jake Weber, was shot without a cause or provocation, as we are informed, in the Parish of Assumption on Tuesday last. The perpetrator of this diabolical deed is said to be a Frenchman.

RISE IN THE ALABAMA RIVERS.—The Mobile Register of Sunday says:

Intelligence received yesterday more than confirmed the late news, previously had, of a rise in the rivers. The Warrior, from which reliable information has been received, is in fine boating order, and this presumption is reasonable (though we do not learn positive advices to that effect not having reached us) that the upper Bigbee, is also once more in navigable plight. As a consequence of this news there was a general firing up of the steamers yesterday evening, and last night a number of them put off ... for the interior. Those of our merchants who have ... in the Tombigbee above Demopolis, ... Bigbee has risen, the "good time" ... for the transportation of the ... at the proper time, ... lying on its ... boats now ... suffered severely by the failing.

And to the planters whose cotton has ... since last fall. With the strong forms of ... on our waters. It is estimated that the whole of the cotton ... can be brought down in three weeks.

SINGULAR.—The New York correspondent of the Charleston Courier says as follows, with what truth we know not:

The Freeman's Journal, the Roman Catholic organ of Archbishop Hughes, is about to be discontinued. The reason assigned is the want of encouragement—that is, pecuniary aid," according to Kossuth's interpretation. The Freeman's Journal is not popular even among Catholics. Not long since it was published semi-weekly, but changed to but one issue a week. The quarrel Mr. McMaster, its editor, had with Meagher, the popular Irish patriot, did much to destroy its power for good. The "rebels," as a general thing, have no sympathy with it whatever.

DEATH OF AN OLD COMMODORE.—We regret to learn, says the Baltimore Sun, of the 25th inst., that the veteran Com. Henry D. Ballard, U. S. Navy, died at his residence, near Annapolis, on Wednesday night last. He was over seventy years of age, and had been in a delicate state of health for some time past. Recently he recovered from a severe attack of pneumonia, but suffered a relapse, which caused his death.

Com. Ballard was a native of Maryland, and entered the service on the 24th of April, 1804, over fifty-one years ago. He received the commission which he held at the time of his death, as the 24th of March, 1825, and served eighteen years and eight months at sea, and fifteen years and eight months on shore duty. He had not been at sea since 1830. As an officer, he stood high in the estimation of all connected with our gallant navy, and was universally esteemed as a man and a citizen.

HAIL.—We learn that a very severe hail storm passed over a portion of North Mississippi, in the vicinity of Cold Water and Panola, on Sunday week, destroying the wheat, corn and cotton crops, and doing immense damage. The hail stones, we are informed, were as large as hen eggs.

HEALTH.—There is no diminution of the disease, epidemic cholera, as far as we can see. It is still most prevalent in the upper part of the city and the outskirts, towards the swamp.

GOLD DOLLARS.—We have doubted their use; but doubt no more. We never lose anything by discount on gold dollars sent to us, and they come very conveniently. Wrap them up in a slip of paper, and fasten the ends of the slip to the letter by wafers.

THE CHURCH IN THE WILDERNESS.—It is a gratifying fact, says the St. Louis Advocate, in connection with the present emigration to Kansas, and one which should give additional energy to our exertions in reference to our operations in that Territory, that a large number of the people going there are members of our Church. We are informed by Rev. Goode that nearly every company which has come under his observation contains a fair representation of members of the Meth. Episcopal Church. A company came around from Cincinnati last week, and while on the way a class was organized among them of twenty-six members of the M. E. Church. After organizing, they had an addition of one on probation. The example of these brethren and sisters is worthy of imitation.

UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA.—The names of two gentlemen have been mentioned for the presidency of the Alabama University—them: Poole Garland and Turwiller, Daniel Chandler, of Mobile; Wm. R. Yancey and Rev. Dr. Lipscomb, of Montgomery; Hon. [illegible] Cross: thus it would be impossible to make a bad selection.

TALLADEGA, ALA.—We have been informed that Rev. Daniel Kelley, of the Georgia Conference, has been elected President of the Alabama Conference Female Institute, Talladega, and will open on the 1st of October next.

The American and Foreign Bible Society, a Baptist organization, is turning its attention with more earnestness and comprehensiveness to the Spanish-American population of New Mexico and the Spanish-American States.

JEWELRY.—A Methodist minister in Washington, while reading the Discipline to the congregation, paused to suggest that if any of the congregation will continue to wear jewelry, the number of rings on the finger be not more than five, nor the breastpin larger than a good sized turnip?

Diocese of Mississippi.

The late Protestant Episcopal Convention presents the following summary of parochial reports:

Whole number of families reported	618
Baptisms—infants	302
" adults	176—538
Communicants reported by bishop	492
" reported	512

The Church Herald, though firm and unwavering in its duty to the Diocese, and editorially [illegible] has fallen about 200 short of paying expenses. This deficit has heretofore been made up by a gentleman whose generosity has been more than [illegible] for other Church purposes.

From the state of this denomination in the smallest sect in Mississippi, gives an encouraging item:

Local Preachers.

We have never known this class of Methodist preachers more active or doing more good than now. The system of the preacher in charge planning out the work and assigning to all regular appointments in connection and cooperation with his own, is good. In this city we have four or five local preachers, with regular and well understood appointments. Without them it would be impossible to supply the preaching places. Some of these appointments have been blessed with revivals, and all are in a healthy condition.

The sum of $15,000 has been raised to endow the Episcopal Theological School of Virginia. This institution has given a bishop to the Diocese of Louisiana, and missionary bishops to China and Africa, has furnished clergymen for every diocese in the Union, and has sent forth all the American Episcopal missionaries to foreign lands.

The Canton Debate.

The Canton (Miss.) Commonwealth gives the following account of the pitched discussion:

"The debate between Eldor J. R. Graves and J. L. Chapman, which commenced in this place on the 2d inst., was terminated on the evening of the 9th. Our engagements did not allow us to hear much of the discussion, but it was sufficiently obvious, even to a casual observer, that both of the learned and able disputants were masters of the several topics connected with the subject of baptism. It is always gratifying, under any circumstances, to witness the truth-evolving conflict of great intellects, fully prepared for the contest; but it becomes intensely interesting, when the subject under consideration is of such vast and vital importance.

The questions discussed by Messrs. Chapman and Graves were:

1. Professed believers are the only Scriptural subjects of baptism.

Mr. Graves, on the part of the Baptists, affirmed, and Mr. Chapman, for the Pedobaptists, denied.

2. Affusion is the only Scriptural mode of baptism.

Mr. Chapman affirmed, and Mr. Graves denied.

As the conductor of a political journal, it does not become us to play the partizan in this controversy. It would neither be agreeable to our taste nor conformable to our views of right. So thinking, we shall attempt no review of the debate on baptism, nor hazard the expression of a useless opinion. Both parties, Baptists and Pedobaptists, were entirely satisfied with their respective champions, and with the results of the discussion. Each claims the victory, and rejoices in its coming fruits.

But whilst we assert the doctrine of non-interference in regard to the question of baptism, we deem it no infringement of our neutrality to express our gratification at Mr. Chapman's success in vindicating the Methodist Episcopal Church government against the assaults of its enemies. So far as we have heard an expression of opinion on the subject, the claim of his Church to be republican and Scriptural was fully sustained. His facts and expositions, his arguments and eloquence, are regarded by all unprejudiced persons as convincing and overwhelming.

We have never had occasion to look into the Methodist Church government; but we have never doubted the triumphant vindication of its claims to republicanism. The members of no church are freer from the fripperies of fashion, and from aristocratic pretensions of every sort, than the Methodists; and we have never allowed ourself for one moment to credit the despotic character ascribed to their Church government. The earnest and self-sacrificing soldiers of the cross who march beneath the Methodist banner wherever there is a soul to be saved—the men who have ever been the first to plant the cross in our border settlements, and encounter the dangers and privations of frontier life, such persons, distinguished for their simple manners and unostentatious lives, would not endure the existence of a despotic church government.

We rejoice, most heartily rejoice, in the triumph of truth and justice. We hope to see this vile spirit of detraction and intermeddling by the members of one church with the affairs of another put down and placed under the ban of public reprobation. Let them learn, instead of seeking captious objections against their neighbors, to keep themselves clean before the Lord."

New Publications.

A HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, By Dr. Charles Hase, Professor of Theology in the University of Jena. Translated by Charles E. Blumenthal, Professor of Hebrew and Modern Languages in Dickinson College, and Conway P. Wing, Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Carlisle, Pa.; 8vo., 720 pages. Appletons, New York.

For some time this book has been on our table, reserved for a more extended notice than even now we can give it. The translators' preface leads us to expect more than we find. Its small and crowded historical portraits made a more distinct and connective impression on those who labored over it than on a mere reader. We like his spirit, and that which every German author has—his "standpoint." We do not like his characterization of Methodism. By the way, there has been in this country much groundless alarm about German rationalism, and needless exhortations for our preachers to study their practical studies and prepare to meet it. It is meeting itself. Dr. Hase presents Christianity as a law of life, derived from Christ and propagated by the Spirit, and developing mankind. The different denominations are but phases or expressions of it, under different times and influences. For sale by J. D. Steel.

WOMAN IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.—By Margaret Fuller Ossoli. J. P. Jewett & Co., Boston: 1855.

An introduction by Horace Greely. Notwithstanding this unlucky accident, the book is quite above the range of our ordinary "woman literature." Margaret Fuller was indeed strong minded. What she wrote was worth reading. We prize this volume. For sale by J. C. Morgan.

LIFE OF SEWARD AND SELECTIONS FROM HIS SPEECHES. Redfield, New York: 1855.

The best comment on this bundle of paper and pasteboard would be to copy (if we had them at hand) the remarks of the London Athenæum—that it is twice the size of Tacitus' Life of Agricola, four times longer than the Life of Cyrus, &c., &c.

A vein of gold, it is said, has been discovered near Pleasant Gap, in Pittsylvania county, Va. It is supposed that an examination of the premises will develop something valuable.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

PLAINS STORE, EAST FELICIANA, LA., May 30, 1855.

Mr. Editor—Although personally a stranger to you, I take the liberty of addressing you a few hastily written lines, for the purpose of informing you of what the Lord has graciously done for us. In the month of December of last year, a few devoted citizens of this neighborhood, seeing the great want of another public house of worship, set to work to remedy the matter. One of the number, Capt. R. W. Newport, who formerly lived on the Comite, had there erected a large and commodious church for the use of the Baptist denomination, of which he is a member; but having since moved to another parish, but still in the neighborhood, voluntarily came forward and made a donation of the building to the Baptist and Methodist congregations, with the privilege of tearing it down and erecting it elsewhere. The matter was immediately taken in hand and pushed to a successful completion. The building is now situated in Bubla Plains, on the Redwood Road, at about eighteen miles from the city of Baton Rouge, in the midst of a grove of magnificent oaks, the monarchs of the forest. As you have seen the location, it is useless for me to describe it.

The pulpit is now regularly supplied by different ministers; the Methodists have the services of Bro. Jones on the second Sabbath, and Bro. John C. Miller, President of Centenary, on the fourth Sabbath of each month. The Baptists take the first and third Sabbaths. Such is the rule agreed upon, and, thus far, has worked harmoniously. The congregations are large and increasing.

There was a two day's basket meeting last Saturday and Sunday, when a Methodist society was regularly formed. Bros. Jones and Miller were in attendance. There were two sermons preached each day. On Sunday the doors were opened, and an opportunity offered those who wished to cast their lot with the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus—He who took upon himself the form of man, and ignominiously suffered death upon the cross, that we might have life eternal. Some nine or ten were united with the Church. Many are earnestly seeking their soul's salvation. The prospects, thus far, are truly encouraging, and I trust soon to see a mighty outpouring of the Spirit of God hereabouts.

A great deal has been said in relation to the motives which actuated those who were instrumental in establishing this church—which, by the by, is called the Union Church. Some have said that it was their intention and desire to break up the congregation which has so long worshipped at the Presbyterian Church. How any sane person could for a moment entertain such an idea is passing strange to me. I have heard some say that the establishing of another church would have a tendency to corrupt the morals of the community. Such language is only given utterance to by those whose hearts have never felt the soothing influence of the Holy Ghost, and are themselves the greatest enemies to genuine morality. I deeply regret to say that even professors of Christianity have been heard to indulge in sarcastic allusions to the members of the Union Church. Apropos to the subject is a short paragraph from the writings of Hannah Moore:

"There has seldom been a period in which there was more talk of religion than that in which we live; and we are disposed to believe that the abundance of the heart in this instance produces its effect upon the lips. But it must also be observed, that in an age of much vital religion, as it must be acknowledged this is, there will naturally be not a little false profession, or at best, in many professors, more external show than internal piety, a religion that is sometimes more distinguished by peculiar phrases and hot contention about opinions, than by much devotedness of heart and life."

These remarks are applicable to many professors, not only here, but elsewhere; those whose religion consists more in a sort of spiritual gossipping than in holiness of life.

Around the sacramental table, on the Lord's Day, we were rejoiced to see members of the different congregations, as a band of Christians, humbly kneeling together to commemorate the death and burial of the Saviour, Christ Jesus.

This neighborhood is richly blessed as regards the preaching of the gospel, as there is regular service at the Presbyterian Church every Sabbath, by their pastor, Rev. John M. Geary. He is a man of talent, a consistent Christian, and I hope and believe that his labors will meet with great success.

I believe that godly piety has been revived in our community, and that the hearts of many have felt the hallowed influence of the pardoning power of God.

But I must close, as I am aware that editors are desirous that their correspondents should be as brief as possible.

That Wine Bridge.

Dr. McFerrin turns to good account a typographical error that befel our Editorial Correspondence. He is entitled to the benefit of it:—

"Brother McTyeire, alluding to our humble cottage, says—or his types make him say—we live "across the wine bridge." No, Bro. McT., it is the wire bridge. Not so bad a mistake, however, after all. We do live across the wine bridge; we have passed over, and stand secure on the other shore. No wine or strong drink; cold water is our motto. Beautiful and healthy country on this side. No paupers, no jails, no murders, no disturbers of the peace. Across and beyond the wine bridge we have peace, plenty, pleasure. We are striving to induce many to emigrate to our side, and we hope to be successful."

Sanctified Affliction.

An esteemed minister writes us as below. Our readers will thank us for the aroma of this bruised but submitting heart:

"My dear brother, my heart and house are sad just now. Our sweet little babe, whom you saw when here, was buried last Saturday. I could not believe the death of a child would so affect me. Yet it is being sanctified. I feel that it has broken down some of the barriers that fenced me in from the world, and that I am now, more than ever before, a partaker of the common sympathies of my race."

"SALVATION."

We cannot safely entertain an idea in any measure disparaging to the super-eminent perfection and glory of what our Creator hath wrought.

Such a thought excites painful uneasiness in proportion as the conviction is awakened that we know so few things perfectly well.

Yet to honor our salvation and its triumphant author we should know, and are required to know, with complete assurance, all that relates thereto. It is not meant that perishable or imperishable books should contain it, and we be satisfied therewith; but that each subject of this great salvation should be able to comprehend it in its perfect fullness as the product of boundless compassion and infinite love. Nor is it meant that we should know it to waste our breath and time in controverting the obstinate and bolstered opinions of others, but to know it as a salvation our gracious God hath wrought in our souls; as a beautiful, constantly developing and everlasting life; individually know it as a new life, with new susceptibilities, new joys, new motions, new fruits; as the immediate creation of God, therefore a great salvation, anticipating all wants, circumstances and conditions of our being; a salvation containing "grace" and "more grace," "faith" and "faith made perfect," "hope" and "hope confirmed," "love" and "rooted and grounded in love," "knowledge" and "excellency of knowledge," "life" and "eternal life;" a treasury of wisdom incomparably superior to the accumulated wisdom of all ages. We are to know this, and know it entire. We are not introduced in to the garden of the Lord to regale ourselves with a few first blooms; there is neither interdicted fruit nor flower. Delighted we are to inhale the odor, see the beauty and taste the sweets of all. We are not brought thus near the heavenly harpers to hear one swell-note and no more; but to compass the hymn and commune with the "guileless spirit of the lovely sound." We are not even to linger in the morning twilight of this new life, but to follow in the circuit wake of the "Sun of Righteousness," with increasing capacity and relish to gather the unfolding treasures of eternity. No deficiences can be extenuated while it is written, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth unto all men liberally and upbraideth not." The incitement is, "Ask, and ye shall receive," "Seek, and ye shall find," the command, "learn of me." The issue is not whether we have discovered in ourselves capabilities of such high knowledge, but whether the great Teacher recognizes such in us. This is the import of Inspiration, else what means, "Ye are the light of the world," "the salt of the earth," "thus these greater works shall he do?" Not that the light, salt and works, so called, of this world are needed to show to advantage or enforce with greater effect the heavenly light. Among all these ye are the only positive light of the world. We are reassured at every step taken that much is given, and therefore much is absolutely required. We are not to be mere passive recipients of endless blessings, but stewards of the manifold grace of God. "To him that hath more shall be given." It is an egregious mistake to suppose that we can learn a little of each section in the divine science, and thus, without the expense of much application, enjoy a general though superficial knowledge of the whole. Such is the wise and strict economy of the institution that neither right words or true tokens can pass us to higher degrees without unquestionable proficiency. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked." We are to learn a little at a time, and that little well, and continue to learn until we are graduated. No one is so blind but sees the huge impediments to the acquisition of precious knowledge; yet he must be sadly deaf who hath not heard that "grace is sufficient for thee." While we can do nothing of ourselves, we can accomplish all things through Christ strengthening us. The ignorance, indolence and aversion of our fallen nature does not offer insuperable obstacles to the celestial temple. Faith, thought and labor will overcome all, and nobly, signally triumph. The blessed immortality of man does not depend upon his writing a book, an essay, or the fluency of speech, but upon, when all things are done, he can stand, can hear the soul, thought, motive, life-work inspection of the great Judge. 'Tis salvation continued when 'tis said, "Well done good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few, be thou ruler over many things." One living Carvosso is worth a thousand biographies. One working, thinking Wesley is worth all the libraries in the world. The world is cordoned with sciences, but there is only one worth knowing: "For what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" Our excellent discipline says it is a good thing to gain knowledge, but saving souls is better. Here we converse in the literature of experimental religion—the only true belles lettres. We are told we must learn botany, chemistry and astronomy, at least, to resolve the beautiful figures of Scripture; but Christians remember this, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth." So is every one that is born of the Spirit. That which is paramount in importance to every child of man is contained in no science. God envelopes the conception and regeneration of the soul in impenetrable mystery, the fact only he is pleased to reveal to faith, and faith to sense. Man, to preserve some respect for the lace and ribbon affairs of this world, beguiles us in a thousand ways. Let us beware lest that which appears to be of intrinsic worth does not in the end prove an instrument of torture to our memory. It is difficult to snatch the diamond from the burning, or sift the little wheat from the mass of chaff of this world's inventions. There may be much that is worth having of this world, but the gathering may cost too much—may cost the soul. This is too much to risk, too much to lose. But, reader, if you and I must lose the whole world, and can reach the City of the New Jerusalem, think you that either of us could spare a moment's bliss, though eternity be ours, to regret our loss, to recur to our bitter existence in this poor world? Is there ought that we would wish to remember? Bunyan, after his release from prison, may have remembered with some pleasure his improvement of time, the birth of his immortal Pilgrim and his progress; but was his pleasure enhanced by the recurrence to his prison bars and cruel keepers? But if to the beginning of faith power is given to become the sons of God, what must, by purity, be the inheritance of faith made perfect? "All things," saith the word of inspiration. Then reader, whatever be thy lot in life, whatever of advantage or disadvantage encompass thy wasting span, with however much of bitterness thy thin breath is blown out, have faith in God; be rich in faith; for without doubt faith is the greatest riches, the truest and purest knowledge. If we remember, through this our Father communicates his life to us. The path of faith to thee may be tearful and checkered; others have traveled it, declaring they were strangers and pilgrims. It may be to thee toilsome and gloomy; we seek a city out of sight, whose maker and builder is God. It may be from laboring to suffer our light afflictions, which are but for a moment, shall work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. It may cost thee much that is valued from apparent or intrinsic worth; we count all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord. You may be deserted by the gay world; "When thy father and mother forsake thee, then I will take thee up." Thy present lot be hard, how different thy lot of love with the sanctified. Men may not see and know the struggle it costs you, but angels will know by your robe and crown that you have come through great tribulation, washed your robe and made it white in the blood of the Lamb. Each trial made it whiter and whiter. Kings and princes may not know or despise you now, but when the laborers are called to receive their hire, "they will offer you their crowns and claims for your shepherd's crook." Let us be wise unto salvation.

Missionary Reports.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

DAYTON MISSION, ALA. CON.:

We now send you our report of this Mission for the first and second qrs., and we are glad to be able to report favorably. There were nine preaching places, accommodating fourteen plantations, when we took charge of the work. It now embraces sixteen preaching places, serving twenty-one plantations, besides one new and one old appointment given off to the Prairie Bluff Mission, which shows a net gain of seven preaching places, and the same number of plantations. Truly some of the places taken in are missionary ground. At our first appointment for one of these places some of the servants had never heard a white man preach before, and from the manner in which they stood around the house-corners and peeped through the shrubbery in the yard, we judged so. May we have favor and success among them, and may Heaven reward the overseer and his pious wife, through whose influence we have gained access to them, for the interest taken in the well being of those committed to their charge.

One comfortable frame church has been built by Bro. J. L. Terrell. Its dedication came off in becoming order. Such preparations were made and service had as became the occasion.

A two days' meeting was appointed; the futlings were killed and well barbecued; the people assembled, overseers and servants, and together waited upon the ministry of the Word, and in turn, under the spreading branches of the native oak and cedar, partook of the thank offering. The opening sermon was preached by Rev. J. E. Newman, of Dayton; a well timed discourse, and was blessed of God to many of the congregation. The result of the meeting was eight conversions and two accessions. O that we could have a few more similar occasions! The spiritual condition of the Mission is good; only one has been expelled, a number have professed conversion; sixty-five have joined on probation, and twelve by certificate. One has died—a woman, fifty-odd years of age. She was not fully satisfied as to her acceptance with God the first of her sickness; but the day before she died deliverance came, her faith got the victory. But she remarked to the pious wife of the overseer (thank God for pious overseers and their pious wives, who care for the souls of their servants) that she would like to see her minister and hear him sing and pray once more. This privilege she enjoyed, when she spoke confidently of being in Christ, and prepared for the will of God, whether to live or die. The next day, while her minister was preaching, and unfolding the grace that provided for the salvation of all, her sufferings ceased, and doubtless her happy spirit soared to its place and portion among the blessed. May her example prove a blessing to her fellow-servants. Amen!

PRAIRIE MISSION, ALA. CON.:

Dear Brother—I now transmit to you the report of my Mission for the first and second quarters of the current year. The state of the Mission is quite encouraging. Several have professed justifying faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. Sixty-one have been added to the Church, four expelled, and twelve children baptized.

CHILDREN OF THE CHURCH.—The Board of Education, in submitting their report to the General Assembly, say:

"The Presbyterian Church exhibits her concern for her children and youth in a parental inspection of their conduct, in appropriate acts of discipline, and in inviting them to partake of the Lord's Supper when they have sufficient knowledge to discern his body. Our standards fully recognize baptized children as members of the visible Church."

From the same report we learn of improvement in the department of theological schools. The number of new candidates is 125, which is the largest number of any year since the division of the Church. The number last year was 104, and in late years it has sunk down to even 60. The total number of candidates on the roll this year is 364, against 342 of the previous year.

THE REPUBLICAN ELEMENT IN ENGLAND.

It has been several times stated on authority apparently reliable, that the Queen of Great Britain is annoyed by two great fears, the one personal, the other political; the one affecting herself only, the other her kingdom. She fears for herself that she will die in child-bed; and for her kingdom that the royal throne will be changed to a republican chair. Her Majesty's very considerable experience in child-bearing would seem to be a strong argument against the justness of her personal apprehensions. The history of the last quarter of a century, clenched by the occurrences of the two years just closed, are to some extent arguments in favor of the justness of her political conclusions.

From a day previous to that on which Macaulay, rising before an astonished Commons to advocate a bill urged by the people and opposed by the aristocracy, thundered out the memorable menace, "either through this House or over this House the bill must pass," down to the present day, there has been a steadily growing sentiment in the minds of the intelligent men of England that some fundamental change must take place in the government of the nation. The enterprise, the intellect and all the real vitality of the empire has been in the possession of the middle classes, but the honors, the rewards and the offices have all belonged to an effete aristocracy. The country has been governed by men whose principal qualifications were that they were the elder sons of an Earl or a Duke, although the real wheel-work of the coach has devolved upon men like Pitt, Peel, Brougham, D'Israeli, Hume and Cobden, who came up from the masses and could understand the work they were called upon to perform.

It has been only by this transfusion of vulgar blood and brains into the patrician body—as Boyle transfused the blood of youth into the veins of age—that the present English Government has been enabled to continue alive in its existing state. The nation has needed a change and has variously sought to effect it. The great Chartist movement sprang out of this want of conviction, though Chartism was moderate and even conservative in its doctrines and demands to those that are being put forth now and defended by the wealth and intellect of the nation. Chartism had some timid hereditary notions concerning the divine right of kings and the sacredness of nobility. It was not for tearing down in order to reconstruct, but for adding in order to improve. It would allow a man to be Premier by reason of title and old blood morsly; it would lop no privilege from lordly prerogative; it would allow close boroughs and horse guard sinecures. It only asked that the right of suffrage should be extended, and that they who paid the taxes should have some voice as to their appropriation. Meek enough, surely, but indignantly denied. Perhaps it would have been well for the permanency of the existing customs of the country, for the continuance of its old feudal corruptions, for its patronage of titled nothingness and contempt of plebsian strength, if something had been conceded to the Chartists.

The demands made by the English people on the English aristocracy are far broader, more general and more determined now than ever before. The conviction has ripened among all classes beneath the aristocracy, that the Constitution so highly extolled by Coke, Littleton, De Lolme and Blackstone, may be materially improved in its workings if not in its construction. The people, finding themselves both physically and intellectually as strong—even stronger—than the rulers whom tradition has foisted on them, finding that to themselves and the whole nation hereditary rulers had been and were a nuisance and brake; that lords make foolish and expensive wars, and equally foolish and discreditable conclusions—have become indignant and begun to cast about for remedies. All the elements of republicanism and democracy that have been for long years gathering and collecting among the English people are now beginning to work. They were sure to bring forth fruit in due season; but the notable imbecility of the administration of the war in the Crimea; the immense expenditure of blood and treasure without avail, and for objects not known nor believed to be feasible, have hurried the seed to an unexpected maturity.

The manufacturers of Sheffield and Manchester, whose business has been seriously injured; the merchants of London, whose trade has been partially ruined; the operatives, agriculturists, and small property-holders, all of whom are suffering under a state of affairs brought about by no fault of their own and utterly beyond their control, begin to cast about for aid and reformation; to hold meetings, pass resolutions, and take preliminary steps towards some sort of action. A meeting was held in the city of London but a few weeks ago, composed—not of demagogues, not of party politicians, not of schemers—but of the strongest and most reliable and commercial business men of the city. The well and calmly expressed object of the meeting was to effect an alteration in the management of public affairs—the overthrow of the existing system of government, and the introduction of a new order of things.

But stronger than even this demonstration of republican tendencies—more open and undisguised is that made in the April number of the Westminster Review, in an article entitled the "Administrative Example of the United States." The paper to which we refer evidently comes from the pen of a scholar and thinker. It is more correct concerning the affairs of this country than the history of De Tocqueville, or any other trans-Atlantic traveler who has written concerning us, and it is decided in its recommendations that many of our institutions should be granted on to those of England. The writer says that—

"England is little aware how very far she is behind the United States in solving the greatest problems of the day. Her constitution riveted the power of the aristocracy, and gave rise to evils and a struggle, which, since the accession of George III., has been going on continuously.—Our present problem is "The Condition of the People."—Our Executive has recently exhibited an amount of imbecility and folly, alike in its policy and in its management, for which it is hard to find a parallel in the pages of history. All England is groaning with the sense, that the noblest soldiers and sailors, the bravest inferior officers, and the best ships, are all unavailing, and are but exposed to destruction, if supreme command is given away to incompetent men. Our nation, under the pressure of events, is opening its eyes to see the painful fact, that the action of Parliament is difficult, uncertain and impossible, in the extreme. The disease is discerned, but few can discern the remedy.—Never, we believe, since the beginning of the world, was a great and vigorous nation, abounding with intelligence, enterprise and experience, made a sport of by the cliques of so very feeble and contemptible an oligarchy. Some forty men in the two Houses of Parliament, of whom not half a dozen possess any marked superiority in talent, genius, energy, wisdom, knowledge or goodness to men who can be picked up by the score in every man's acquaintance—handy the government of England backward and forwards between them—In what details the reform should consist we do not think it requisite to enforce minutely; but the broad principle is this—new life and popular sympathies should be infused into the House, and new power as the result".

These are some of the evils pointed out and explicated at too great length for quotation by us. Per contra, glance an instant at the republican tendencies revealed and the republican remedies recommended:

"Henceforward, it is no longer England, but the North American Republic that has become the pole-star to which, from all sides, the eye of struggling nations turns. . . . There are those who fancy that under mere democracy, energetic diplomacy and warlike success are impossible; let us for a moment attend to the facts concerning the United States. . . . They nobly earned their independence; they assumed the aggressive against England; they made a plain declaration of war on France if payments conceded to be due the United States were not paid by a certain near day; since these there have been the war of Texas and the Mexican war, and in the Mexican war one knows not what is most to be admired; the facility with which an army of volunteers submitted to discipline; the perfections of their weapons—new inventions of America—handled with a skill previously unknown; the goodness of their commissariat, in a wild and vast country; or the flexibility of their mechanical talents as to repairing, providing and communicating forward. . . . For fifty years past, the merchant service of the United States have notoriously been far better than those of Great Britain. . . . No one can pass with communic energy and success. This is brought about mainly by the influence of the Senate on foreign affairs. We have no corresponding organ. . . . Against these principal sometimes necessary . . . new privileges shall be for life only; 2. that no one shall be created without a concurrent vote from the Commons; 3. that the Queen shall have the right of admitting every minister, during his tenure of office, to sit and speak in the Upper House, but without a vote. Reformers will do well to inscribe on their flag, that reform must take the direction of America, not of Europe."

We have often copiously from this paper indicative of the upheaval of that Republican sentiment which has been so long slumbering in the English mind, and which, sooner or later, is bound to rise to the surface and rule over the ruins of the present effete and worthless system—a system which Diogenes has ridiculed effectively, perhaps, as the Westminster has exposed:

> My Lord to the Peers will take his place;
> Her Majesty's message his words will grace.
> Office he'll hold, and patronage sway;
> For times and laws he will vote away—
> And what are his qualifications?—One!
> He's the Earl of Fitzdotterel's eldest son!

In the House of Lords, too, the following extraordinary language was used by Lord Ellenborough:

"My Lords, how can we, sitting here by the hereditary right conferred, for the most part, upon our ancestors for their services to the State, for time immemorial, in employment, how can we refuse to adopt that principle? It is the principle of our own origin. (Cheers.) For because my father was a great lawyer, not because he was a party man, that he was selected as Chief Justice, I had no family; no connections; he rose altogether by his fitness. It was not favor; it was fitness that made Mr Yorke Lord High Chancellor and an Earl.

It was not favor, it was fitness that made Sir [illegible] Harris, the great diplomatist, Earl of Malmesbury. It was not favor which raised the father of his noble opposite (Lord Cannlog) to that office, the jewel which was the peerage which the noble Viscount holds. It was not favor whatever raised the brothers to be Ministers of Elizabeth and James, and the heads of two great families.

We are here for the services of our ancestors. It is on them, who sit here by that right, and enjoy dignity, honor by reason of their services and their [illegible] public employment—to turn round and say, [illegible] about merely by the influence of the Senate on foreign affairs. We have no corresponding organ. . . . MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

A German pamphlet on the Eastern war recounts the following: A young Zouave, who had joined as a volunteer, had excited by his wonderful gymnastic performances the astonishment of some English officers. One of them asked him why, gifted with such a marvellous agility, he had volunteered as a private soldier, when he might have earned twenty times as much in a circus? The Zouave cast upon the officer a look of ineffable contempt, and with a glance of wounded pride, said: "Because I expect, sir, to die a French General, and not a circous director: for the French soldier has more than money." So saying, he plunged his hands into his capacious pantaloons, and ran away. Nothing could again induce him to display his agility before English officers.

In the commune of Saint Helaire de Villaille there was celebrated the extraordinary marriage of a man named Jean Laplerre, 109 years of age, to a woman named Petronille Bonneville, aged 86 years. The civil marriage of the parties had been contracted more than seventy years ago.

Viscount de Nugent, of France, has been sentenced to two years' imprisonment and a fine of 5000 francs, for speaking disrespectfully of the person of the Emperor and the Empress. This, perhaps, the severest sentence that has been inflicted for the many similar offences committed since the establishment of the Empire.

Late news from Newfoundland informs us that all the sealers had returned, and that there was about one-third the usual fishing. Captain H. During the absence of Mrs. Day from her house in the evening, it took fire, and six children, five boys and three girls, perished in the flames.

One of our Nebraska exchanges boasts of having a turkey, or a part of one, which measured five and a quarter feet from tip to tip of the wings, stood forty-eight inches in his stockings, and weighed between twenty-five and thirty pounds. "The deceased appeared to be in the spring-time of life, the pin-feathers of its wings were just giving place to the gaudy plumage of fully developed and matured turkeyhood, when he met his enemy and was laid low. But having aided in removing the corpse, we can say no more; we eat too much."

Two young men named James Wesley Bryant, of Cincinnati, and Benjamin Dodge, of New York, were drowned in the Miami canal by the capsizing of a skiff a few days ago.

REMARKABLE.—All the foreign vocabulary distinguished note have very romantic personal histories, are members of noble families, of better duys, support their fathers and mothers, women very beautiful, ludiss all in love with the men, etc. Bah!

"The Balance of Power of Europe" is the title of a cerloature representing England, France on one end of a pole, and Russia on the other, the centre resting on the bank of Austria with Prussia and Austria near the Muscovite shoulders.

HORRIBLE DEATH.—Dr. M. P. Morgan, of Jefferson county, Indiana, came to his death on the 15th ult. under the following circumstances. He came home intoxicated, and his wife and three children went to a neighboring house. Shortly after the house took fire, and he perished in the flames.

It will be long before we shall see the like of the funny things related of Foote, the [illegible] Aristophanes. The following is not bad:

When on his way to France in 1777, he [illegible] helted at an inn at Dover, and, going into the kitchen to superintend the dressing of a favorite dish, the cook, understanding that he was about to cross the Channel, began to say, that for the part, she was never out of her own country.

"Why, cooky," said Foote, "that is very extraordinary, as they tell me above stairs that you have been several times all over Europe."

"They may say what they please," said the cook, "but I never was ten miles from home all my life."

"Nay," answered Foote, "that must not be for I have seen you myself at Spithead."

A sally which set the whole kitchen in a roar.

The editor of the Southern Democrat says that he is "acquiring flesh." If he is, we suppose he steals it from the butcher or from his neighbor's meat-house. [Louisville Journal.

An Irish soldier before Sebastopol writes as follows: Every one goes on his duty as a matter of course, caring no little for Russ or his bells as they call it, for the football they kick for sport. An illustrative of this, a few nights ago, while the Royal Irish were going down the ravine that leads to Greenhill battery, they being for the night duty, a son of Erin thought he would make himself with one of his native airs, when he was reproved by an officer for daring to whistle in the ranks and while going to duty. Turning as the officer spoke, one of Russia's balls came whistling over the ravine. Pat cocks his eye upwards it and quietly said "There goes a boy for duty, and hy jabers how he whistles!"

The highest human graces that woman can won have but ensnared her soul in vanity and sin, and wrought destruction, through their attractions, for the souls of others. And intellectual powers and intelligent gifts, not subjugated to the providential orderings of God, chastened and controlled by His renewing grace, are at this time, unsexing women, and threatening on the astonished world a race of monsters in that Amazonian crew who clamor now for "Woman's Rights," such as no mythology ever dreamed or heard of.

Deaths.

Departed this life, May 12, 1855, in this city, Mrs. ALICE H. DAMERON, in the sixty-first year of her age. When fifteen she professed conversion. Soon after she was married to Mr. O. S. Dameron, of Norfolk, where they resided until 1848. That year they removed to this city to spend the rest of their days with their sons, who had settled here. This wedded pair of saints are not divided in the memory of any who ever knew them. They both joined the Church in their youth, and walked together in the ways of the Lord blameless; they reared, with slender means, a large family of children, to honorable and useful manhood and womanhood. For many years the pure and constant lustre of their Christian example shone with blended power. The Methodist Church saw them her living patterns of faith, consistency, gentleness, and of entire sanctification. Brother D. preceded his wife to heaven by three years; when dying, he said, "My cross, it is nothing to die." True enough, when we live as they, it is nothing. So, doubtless, she found it; and, though inexcusible to us, felt it "sweet to die" and go to these dear children and that dear companion who awaited her coming at the margin beyond. Her sons and daughters rise up and call her memory blessed; and so do all who ever came within the circle of her active, gentle kindness, her firm and holy life.

MARTHA J. GILMER, wife of Francis M. Gilmer, Sen., was born on the 26th of November, 1790, joined the M. E. Church in 1809, removed from Broad River, Ga., in 1818, to Montgomery county, Ala., where she lived a consistent Christian until the 20th May, when she died in perfect peace.

Revival Intelligence.

SOMMERFELD, ALA. CON.:

Some ten days ago we commenced a meeting in this place, which—to the praise of God be it said—has resulted well. Twenty-four have joined the Church, and not less than thirty-five converts up to this time. For the meeting has not yet closed. We have had us happy a church, and I think as strong, if not the strongest faith I ever saw.

The power of God has been wonderfully displayed in the congregation, both on saints and sinners.

The drought has been severe. On last Friday our good people proclaimed a fast. All business of every sort stopped, with the exception of one shop, and all went to the house of prayer. We convened at 8 and continued until 1 o'clock. While we were together God metus in power. He gave us a gracious shower of grace, which made the Church happy and converted some penitents.

Our good people made a contribution to feed the poor of $113 in cash, or to be handed in in a day or so. We left the church thanking God for happy souls, if our bodies were worn down with labor and hunger. By 4 o'clock we had a heavy shower of rain. This constrained all to say God hears prayer, and answers, too. This day (Thursday) the rain is abundant. Thank God for his goodness. Oh! that all the people would praise him. J. W. STARR.

BIG SANDY CT., ALA. CON.:

Our Second Quarterly Meeting for the Big Sandy Circuit was held at the manufacturing village of Scottsville, Bibb county, Ala., on the 12th and 13th May, and was protracted with interest until Wednesday, 16th, at night. Our Presiding Elder, Bro. Koger, was at his post, as is usual, laboring successfully. Result of the labors—ten persons professed to have found "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." W. C. HEARN.

SEA COAST, MISS. CON.:

Please say that the Lord is graciously reviving his work on the Sea Shore Circuit. We had a meeting five days at Oakville Church. Thirty-eight were gained, and many more made happy in Christ.

ALLEN CASTLE.

May 15, 1855.

CRYSTAL SPRINGS CIRCUIT, MISS. CON.:

Our church has a membership of about six hundred; with one or two exceptions, comfortable houses of worship; and large congregations at all our Sabbath appointments.

When I came on the work I found most of the societies divided in sentiment, and consequently, in harmonious in action; and, like the Corinthians, adhering to the interests of particular ministers. Some saying, in effect, at least, "we are of Paul," and some, "we are of Apollos." There was but little interest manifested in the cause of Sabbath schools, there being but one of denominational character within our bounds, and but one union school. To correct the evils of division and unite the Church in bends of love, and to awaken an interest in behalf of Sabbath instruction for the children of the church have been the aims of all my efforts, public and private. Purty zeal is abating, and I pray that it may die so completely as never to be revived again. "Who is Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, but ministers by whom we have believed?" They are all ours in Christ Jesus. How are Christians, then, to glory in any of them, and not rather to glory in the Lord. If this abatement of party feeling continues, we are sanguine in the expectation of the out-pouring of the Holy Spirit throughout the entire charge; but not otherwise. For where there is division, there is envy and strife, and every evil work.

The choice of Sabbath schools is looking up. I have organized four new schools since our first quarterly visitation. The superintendents are men of tried integrity, the teachers efficient; so that we may indulge the hope that the schools on this work, five in number, will become what the institution was designed to be, the nursery of the Church; that hundreds of young immortal souls may be so indoctrinated and disciplined that they will be prepared to fill responsible stations in the Church, from the command of which the present incumbents are being called, and will soon all be gone to their rewards on high.

At some future time I will defend the denominational character of our Sabbath schools against the attacks of some members of other denominations; in which some of our own members, also, join.

B. B. WHITTINGTON.

GLENNVILLE, ALA. CON.:

Some complainte of destitution, and some apprehension of suffering for the want of bread; but our wealthy citizens and good livers are acting nobly towarde relieving the destitute.

Our village and vicinity have been visited with some sickness, and there have been several deaths. But we rejoice that the work of the Lord is beginning to revive in this portion of the Conference. Bro. Hurt has had a blessed work of grace at Spring Hill, Barbour Ct. We are holding religious exercise in this place. Signs somewhat encouraging. J. W. SMONES.

LOUISIANA.—We find the following paragraphs in the Piney Woodsman, Livingston parish:

We have had a shower of rain at last, but not enough as yet to be of much service to the crops. We hope, however, that it is the beginning of a good supply. But the sky is again as clear as ever, with a dry wind from the Northeast. The only advantage as yet is a few degrees less of heat in the atmosphere, and some disposition in the dust to lie still.

A friend who arrived here this week from the coast informs us that cholera and typhus are so prevalent that the people are leaving the coast in great numbers.

The cicolion for a Chief Justice has been advertised for a week in our paper, and is to come off on the 25th inst., but as yet we have not a word from our sources concerning a candidate. If somebody don't announce himself pretty soon, we shall put a pluey woodsman.

The Pointe à la Hache National has the following:

The heat continues excessive. All canals, ponds and wells, being now dried up, and fears are entertained that this want of water should be injurious to the great herd of cattle in this parish.

Our parish, usually so lively, looks desolate. And we have full cause not to be joyful; our corn and cane crops are suffering and Hagerin, and will be of no benefit to us.

Many fine planters have built flooding machines on their land, so that at least a part of the rice crop will probably be saved.

The offer made by Robert Johnson, Esq., having been accepted, and all the necessary deeds having been perfected, the Quarantine is now decidedly established in this parish.

Foreign News by the Pacific.

FULL PARTICULARS.

The War in the Crimea.

The last news from before Sebastopol renders it evident that a change of operations had been decided on, and that new plans of warfare were to be adopted as soon as the reinforcements expected from France, Egypt, Sardinia and England should have arrived.

Gen. Canrobert, before resigning his command, had announced that 50,000 more troops would come from France; 10,000 were expected still from Lombardy, 10,000 from Egypt, and Omar Pacha was rapidly organizing a Turkish force at Eupatoria. The Allied forces would then amount to nearly 90,000 men.

The health of the army was good, the greatest enthusiasm prevailed among the troops.

The latest news from Eupatoria was to the 20th of April. A reconnoissance had ascertained that the neighboring village of Gval contained 25,000 Russians and large quantities of warlike stores. It was talked of occupying the village.

The Russians were erecting batteries on the route from Eupatoria to Sebastopol.

The Paris Moniteur's latest dispatches, via St. Petersburg, are as follows:

St. Petersburg, Saturday, May 12.

Prince Gortschakoff has sent dispatches from Sebastopol, dated May 7. The Russian General says:

In the evening of May 3, the greatest part of the Allied forts put out the sea, having on board, it is said, ten thousand men, numbering from 10,000 to 15,000 troops. The next day these troops passed before Yalta, proceeding, it was supposed, towards Anapa.

From the 5th to the 6th of May the Allied armies occupied themselves principally in augmenting their batteries and reinforcing their approaches against the central bastion. Accordingly, their fire, which has become more active, has been directed against the flag-staff and central bastions and the Selinghinsk and Volhynia redoubts. The garrison replied.

In the nights of May 3 and 4 the besiegers sprung two mines, one of which ruined the old counter formed by previous explosions. The garrison made use of several coups de fois.

In the nights of May 5 and 6, we made a little sortie, and on that occasion we took an English officer and three English soldiers prisoners.

Three powder magazines in the batteries of the Allies blew up.

A dispatch from St. Petersburg, dated one day later, is to the following effect:

Prince Gortschakoff writes from the Crimea that to the 8th of May, in the evening, nothing important had taken place before Sebastopol. The 8rs of the Allies was moderate.

The Allied fleet, which went out on the 3d instant, proceeded until off Kertch, and then returned. A part of the troops disbarked appear to have been put ashore in Kamiesch Bay.

A dispatch from Sebastopol says:

That the expedition of the Allies (mentioned in two of Prince Gortschakoff's dispatches) was composed of 8000 French and 5000 English, under the command of Bosquet and Georges Brown. It left Balaklava on the 5th, having Kertch for its destination.

Journal of the Siege.

CAMP BEFORE SEBASTOPOL, May 2.—There was a very brilliant exploit performed by seven battalions of French infantry, in which the 46th regiment were particularly distinguished, last night, the 2nd and this morning. They advanced before midnight, and forced on the Russian sentinels under a heavy fire. The impression came out to meet them in force—a tremendous conflict ensued, in which the French used the bayonet in repeated charges, and at last they forced the Russians back into the works, followed them, stormed the outworks of the batteries centre, and took off eight cohorns which they brought in to Gen. Pelissier. In this gallant affair, which lasted till 2 o'clock in the morning, the French had 63 killed and 210 wounded, and 9 officers put hors de combat.

The obstinacy of the fight last night and this morning was sufficiently evident from the spectacle presented by the ground between the French lines and the batteries de center. The space of rubbish, broken earth, ruins of batteries, and shelters of outworks, was covered with gabions, fragments of affuts and dead bodies, and the Russians were busily engaged in burying those who had fallen inside their lines. The firing on the left was incessant and exceedingly heavy, and the Russian artillery did their best to avenge the loss of their comrades, but probably not with much effect, although the air was obscured by the clouds of dust arising from the shower of cannon balls which tore along the surface, marking their course as they ricochetted among the batteries by pillars of earth dashed up by the concussion. The French replied with vigor, and from dawn till now the fire continued between the artillery and the riflemen in front of the flag-staff battery. Our batteries all day maintained a most profound silence.

On the extreme right again the French batteries fired pretty frequently at the Inkermann batteries. Early this morning a little flotilla of some 25 or 30 French vessels sailed from Kamiesch, and stood away to the south-west, with a gentle breeze. Several French men-of-war accompanied them. It is supposed that these vessels contained a portion of the troops and stores of the secret expedition. At 2:30 a body of Russian troops, in three divisions, each about 2500 strong, were seen marching into Sebastopol from the camp over the Tchernaya. A very large convoy of carts and pack animals also entered the town in the course of the day, and an equally numerous string of carts and horses left for the interior. The troops marched along by the road at the head of the harbor on the north side, and were lost to sight at 3 o'clock, behind the rise of the cliffs on the south of the road. A smaller body of troops subsequently passed out from the town, and marched up toward the camp of the Belbek, taking a road more to the north than that by which their comrades entered. Most probably the movement of troops only indicated a relief of soldiers in garrison.

About 4 o'clock this morning it was observed on the right that the enemy's battalions were forming in columns in the rear of the bastion du mat, and in a few minutes afterwards about 2000 men, who were most likely volunteers, made a desperate rush out of the works close to the battery centrale, and with a loud cheer flung themselves on the French advance. For a moment their numbers and impetuosity enabled them to drive the French out of the imperfect works and ambuscades as far as the parallel, but not without a desperate resistance. The smoke-fire was so heavy that the smoke soon obscured the scene of the conflict from sight, but the French could be seen advancing rapidly along the traverses and covered ways to the front, their bayonets flashing through the murky air in the sunshine, and in a few moments the Russians were driven back by the cold steel, and forced to fly hastily behind their entrenchments, which instantly opened a heavy cannonade and volleys of grape to check the pursuit of the French.

Our allies fought splendidly, and chastised the audacity of the enemy with much severity. Several Russian officers and once were taken prisoners, and the enemy, with great diligence, succeeded in carrying off most of their killed and wounded, but left several of both on the ground. While this affair was proceeding our races were going on in a hollow behind Cathcart's hill.

The preparations for the secret expedition absorb the camp completely. Sir George Brown, who is to command the British troops, has been waiting all this afternoon to see them embark. The expedition will consist of the Roy d'Aimer, Princess Royal, Moorhouse, &c., and all the heavily armed light steamers of both fleets; and the troops are to be the 42d, 71st and 79th Highland regiments, 700 marines and 24 batteries of artillery. The men take their tents, and suppers and blankets and transport animals will also be sent with the expedition. The guards and 3d Buffs take the place of the Highland brigade. Intelligence has reached us of Capt. Christie's death at Kamiesch.

Tuesday, May 8.—There is said news to-day for us, and more glory for our allies. Lieut Carter, R. E., was killed by a round shot in front of left attack this morning. The same shot struck Lieut Curtis, 42d Highlanders, and killed him dead. The French attacked the batteries on the centre again, stormed one face of it, and captured it, he said eight mortars. Lord Raglan visited Sir George Brown last night, and came down to Balaklava, and remained for some time on board the Caradoc with Lord Stratford today. The expedition starts this evening. The Furious, Gidon, &c., are out side.

Peace Negotiations at Vienna.

The latest official statement respecting the diplomatic relations of the Allies with Russia and Austria, is contained in the following vague answer of Lord Palmerston to Sir H. Willoughby, in the House of Commons, on the 17th inst.:

Sir H. Willoughby asked the First Lord of the Treasury if any propositions for concluding the war in the East have emanated from the Austrian Government, or have been transmitted through the French Government, since the last protocol of April 25 1855; and whether the documents containing such propositions, if any, can be placed on the table of the House?

Lord Palmerston: I think I answered the same question not very long ago, and the answer I then gave I will now repeat. That there have been informal communications passing between the Governments of England France and Austria, but that we have had no formal communication upon the subject to which the honorable gentleman adverts, such as could properly be laid before Parliament.

THE AUSTRIAN PROPOSITION.—Of the last Austrian proposition put forward since the disembodiment of the conferences, for giving effect to the third point, a correspondent at the Independance Belge gives the following account as reliable:

The Austrian proposition for terminating the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea, proceeded less upon the principal of a reduction than upon that of equalizing the forces on the sides of Russia and Turkey respectively. It limited the forces of Russia in restoring them to a figure which, it is true, was very little lower than that at which they stood before war; but it assured to Turkey, by means of her own resources and those of France and England, her allies, forces constantly equal to those of Russia. Thus it had neither the inconvenience of the absolute principle of mare clausum, which by opposing the Straits to the Russian fleet, would have permitted this to exercise a powerful and continuous influence in the waters of Greece and the Adriatic, nor the inconvenience of the principles of mare liberum which would have left Turkey to contend with her own forces against Russia. In fact, it would have opened the straits only to the fleets of France and England in the proportion necessary to maintain the forces required for the protection of Turkey at the level of the Russian forces which might menace her. Russia was ready to engage that if these conditions were accepted by the Western Powers, and rejected by Russia, she would at once take part in the war.

All sorts of rumors prevail respecting the probable policy of Austria. One day it was asserted that the Emperor himself was to leave Vienna for Gallicia, and to put himself at the head of the army on the Polish frontier; the next it was believed that the Court of Vienna believed that the concessions made by Russia ought to have satisfied the Allies, and that in conjunction with Prussia she would maintain the neutrality of Germany. The following extract from a letter from Berlin, dated May 11, explains the feeling on the subject in that capital:

"The position of Austria remains as before. Count Esterhazy has returned here without being instructed to make any communication as to the intentions of the Cabinet of Vienna; and this uncertainty is quite as disagreeable to the Cabinet at Berlin as it is to those of Paris and London.

"Nevertheless, the position of matters will be soon clearly defined. As I have several times observed, Austria is unable to take the field for the present, without incurring the most serious danger. Her treasury is dry; her army has been decimated by an epidemic disease; and she will require at least six weeks to be in a position to declare war.

"Austria has demanded from the Western Powers an army at least as strong as her own, and subsidies beside. Upon a demand naturally proceeds unconditional; and thence the present attitude of Austria is simply dictated by necessity.

"It is said that there will be a meeting of the members of the Vienna Conference to draw up a protocol by way of reply to the Russo-Austrian propositions. The programme of this protocol already agreed on, is a simple recapitulation of the principles already laid down, that the Four Points of Guarantee are indivisible, and that one is not to be accepted apart from the others. This is, in truth, the very basis of all the protocols of Vienna and the Treaty of the 20 December. And that which Prince Gortschakoff was vainly attempting to batter to fragments."

VAST LOANS.—From Vienna, under date of Thursday, the following has been received:

"Austria has agreed with the western powers on an ultimatum to be presented to Russia. If this desperate final attempt for peace should fail, Austria promises that she really will resume a decided attitude.

"A fresh circular from Count Nesselrode has arrived here. It merely consists of a full acceptance of the negotiations of conference drawn up in a Russian sense."

Prussia.

German papers mention a conference held at Berlin on the 10th, between M. Manteuffel, President of the Prussian Cabinet, Count Esterhazy, Ambassador of Austria, and M. Bismark, who represents Prussia, at the Germanic Diet. A private letter says the Conference was of a very important character. A union between Prussia and Austria for an armed neutrality is even hinted at, beginning peace-like, and that Prussia, with a view thereto, will support the proposition which Austria is about to make in the Diet for the mobilization of the Federal Contingents. There is said to be some prospect of an interview, towards the end of the present month, between the King of Prussia and the Emperor of Austria.

Great Britain.

The most important news from England is the insurrections of the Palmerston Cabinet. Lord John Russell is back with us here once more, become the source of discord and trouble among his colleagues. The papers say he "resigns" continually. The Ellenborough motion, notice of which was given in the papers received by the Asia, has been made, and resulted in a majority for the Government. The gist of the motion was, that an address should be presented to the Queen, to the effect that gratified as the nation is with the French alliance, bravery of the army and principles of the war, yet that the manner in which it has been conducted,

"Is calculated to create dissatisfaction, and given rise to just apprehension; and that we most humbly pray her forthwith through the Majesty our death, to call upon that House to give effect to such measures as may be found necessary to the safety and honor of the country, and to the successful prosecution of the war."

Many conflicting works which enfolded the country, have been considerably published, and a general sense prevailed that the besieged are reduced within a narrow circle.

The last parallel is only twenty-five yards of the Redan works, and the most advanced sentry misses. A siege scraper at the salient of operations is constantly arrested by the destruction of the works of the besiegers or by the necessity of making a new one. Several shows

DEGENERACY OF THE POTATO.—With respect to the potato, nature seems clearly to have made provision for the permanent health as well as the productiveness of her own offspring, in the seed contained in the berry which the plant produces from its stalk; and consequently, by our endeavoring to perpetuate any particular sort of potato, by continually cutting and planting its tubers, it is reasonably to be expected that we shall injure its general properties and powers, and thus gradually render it unfit for food and more liable to disease. It would follow that, in order to be as certain of obtaining a good crop of potatoes as it is possible to be, the ground, before being planted, should be thoroughly pulverized, the manure should be well fermented, the sets should be whole potatoes, and never deprived of its first shoots, nor allowed to ferment; and, lastly, that a constant succession of new sorts should be raised from the old ones. The newly raised sorts will doubtless admit of being cut with safety for several years, and would be but little affected by other external injuries, unless peculiarly delicate, as they would possess all the health and vigor of a plant propagated according to nature's laws.

By attending to these few suggestions, which experience warrants, a full crop of potatoes may, under ordinary circumstances, be secured.

Songs of the Peerage.

BY LORD TOMNODDY.

My Lord Tomnoddy's the son of an earl,
His hair is straight, but his whiskers curl;
His temper's by no means the mildest in life,
But there's plenty of room for the brains inside.
He writes his name with indifferent ease,
He is rather uncertain about the "d's,"
But what does it matter, if two, or one,
To the Lord Chancellor's eldest son?

My Lord Tomnoddy to college went—
Much time he lost, much money he spent;
Rules and windows, and heads, he broke—
Authorities winked—young men will joke!
He never peeped inside of a book—
In two years' time a degree he took;
And the newspapers vaunted the honors won
By the Earl of Fitzdotterel's eldest son.

My Lord Tomnoddy came out in the world,
Whisk'ers were tightened, and ringlets curled.
Virgins languished, and matrons smiled—
"He's true, his lordship is rather wild;
But very quiet places he spends his life;
There's talk of some children, by nobody's wife;
But we mustn't look alone into what is done
By the Earl of Fitzdotterel's eldest son.

My Lord Tomnoddy must settle down—
There's a vacant seat in the family town!
(Little he cared about the eccentric cats)—
He hasn't the time nor the wit to apply for votes;
He can not even learn his meeting speech,
Three phrases he speaks—a mistake in each!
And then broke down—but the borough is won
For the Earl of Fitzdotterel's eldest son.

My Lord Tomnoddy prefers the Guards,
('Tis Home is a bore; no!—it's on the cards!
My Lord is a gourmet at twenty-three,
A major at twenty-six to be—
He never sees sword except on drill;
The tricks of parade he has learnt but ill—
A lieutenant-colonel at thirty-one
Is the Earl of Fitzdotterel's eldest son.

My Lord Tomnoddy is thirty four;
The Earl can last but a few years more.
My Lord in the peers will take his place;
Her Majesty's counsels his words will grace.
Office he'll hold, and patronage sway;
Fortunes and lives he will vote away—
And what are his qualifications?—One!
He's the Earl of Fitzdotterel's eldest son!

Later from Havana.

The U. S. mail steamship Columbia, Capt. Shufeldt, arrived on Saturday last, from New York 25th, and Havana the 31st ult. From the latter place we have, by this arrival, little of interest or importance. The Island was quiet, and no apprehensions of invasion were felt. The health of the city and shipping was good.

The U. S. steam frigate San Jacinto, Com. McCauley, arrived at Havana from Matanzas on the 30th ult. The U. S. steamer Fulton, Capt. Mitchell, had been in port since the 27th. The Cyane, Capt Wilson, was cruising off San Antonio. The Princeton was daily expected.

A British squadron, consisting of the ship Euryclus and the steamers Termagant and Medea left Havana on the 30th on a cruise. The commanders of the n vessels, together with Capt. Mitchell, of the Fulton, (the only United States vessel then in port) were present at a very splendid dinner and evening party given by the Captain General, on the 29th ult.

By royal charter, a bank of discount, deposit, exchange and issue is to be established at Havana, with a capital of $3,000,000, and to go into operation as soon as the same is subscribed for. Its issues are to be predicated upon the capital paid in; one-half and one-third the amount thereof to be in specie in the vaults; further issues may be made to the amount of the deposits of bullion. Discounts of paper are to be made for three months only, and may be renewed after payment. Interest is to be allowed at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. Bills of the bank are to be of no less denomination than fifty dollars. The charter seems to provide all needful restrictions for protection of the people and its especial creditors by depositors. The expectation is entertained that it will be of great commercial utility.

The Havana papers inform us that much alarm is felt in regard to the yellow fever, which prevails to a great extent throughout the Island. The system of inoculation for this disease, originated, we believe, by one Dr. Hemsbidt, a learned physician at Havana, has proved a failure, many having died of the fever after inoculation.

SPLENDID PAINTING OF THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.—After an assiduous labor of more than ten years, a private artist, Mr. Charles F. Fisher, has executed one of the most truthful and elaborate view of this great battle that has ever been spread upon the canvas. He has been assisted by nearly all the surviving veteran officers of Jackson's ever memorable lines on the 8th of January, 1815. Its details are so accurate, and the high finish of each individual figure among the many thousands represented render it a wonder of artistic skill. Jackson's entrenched lines, fourteen hundred yards in length, are represented in the painting in the foreground, and every corps that defended them in position and repulsed the British is represented in the painting in when the [illegible] of the two great sharpshooting companies of Tennessee and Kentucky riflemen are in conflict with the batteries. It was a pleasing fact that we have still in Natchez where the painting has been on exhibition the last and a part of the present week, three eminent survivors of the [illegible] who shared in the battle—Col Henry Chotard [illegible] one of Gen Jackson's aids in the battle; Capt John B Nevitt, one of the naval officers in command of the Marine Batteries, whose terrible fire flanked the British columns from the opposite side of the river; and Col Adam D. Bingaman, an officer of the Natchez Rifle Corps (Kentucky Intelligencer.

The Intelligencer has the following description of a similar [illegible]

The Man-Monkey of Brazil.

The captain of the French schooner Adrien, who last summer was stationed at Hernambuco, Brazil, gives us the following sketch of a tame monkey.

A short time ago, I dined at a Brazilian merchant's. The conversation turned upon the well tutored chimpanzee of Mr. Venneck, a creole gentleman, whose slave had brought him the monkey, which he had caught in the wood. Every one praised the accomplished animal, giving accounts of its talents so wonderful, that I could not help expressing some incredulity. My host smiled, saying that I was not the first one who would not believe in these results of animal education until he had seen it with his own eyes. He therefore proposed to me to call with him on Mr. Venneck. I gladly consented, and on the following morning we set out. The house of the creole lies on the road to Olinde, about an hour's ride from town. We proceeded along splendid hedges of cactus, shaded by bananas and palm trees, and at length observed the charming villa. A negro received us at the entrance, and took us to the parlor, hastening to tell his master of our visit. The first object which caught our attention was the monkey, seated on a stool, and sewing with great industry. Much struck, I watched him attentively, while he, not paying any attention to us, proceeded with his work. The door opened, and Mr. Venneck, reclining on an easy chair, was wheeled in. Though his legs are paralyzed, he seemed bright and cheerful; he welcomed us most kindly. The monkey went on sewing with great zeal. I could not refrain from exclaiming, "How wonderful!" for the manner and proceeds of the animal were those of a practised tailor. He was sewing a pair of striped pantaloons, the narrow shape of which showed that they were intented for himself.

A negro now appeared, announcing Madame Jasmin, whom Vanneck introduced as his neighbor. Madame Jasmin was accompanied by her little daughter, a girl of twelve years, who immediately ran to the monkey, greeting him as an old friend and began to prattle with him. Jack furtively peeped at his master, but as Mr. Vanneck's glance was stern, the tailor went on sewing. Suddenly his thread broke and he put the end to his mouth, smoothed it with his lips, twisted it with his left paw and threaded the needle again. Mr. Vanneck then turned to him and spoke in the calm tone in which he had conversed with us, "Jack, put your work aside, and sweep the floor?"

Jack hurried to an adjoining room and came back without delay, a broom in his paw, and swept and dusted like a clever housemaid. I could now perfectly make out his size, as he always walked upright, not on his four hands. He was about three feet in height, but stooped a little. He was clad in linen pantaloons, a colored shirt, a jacket and a red handkerchief. At an other hint from his master, Jack went and brought several glasses of lemonade on a tray. His first presented the tray to Madame Jasmin and daughter, then to us, proclaiming like a well-bred footman. When I had emptied my glass, he hastened to relieve me from it, putting it back on the tray. Mr. Vanneck took out his watch and showed it to the monkey; it was just three. Jack went and brought a cup of broth to his master, who remarked that the monkey did not know the movements of the watch, but that he knew exactly the position of the hands when they pointed three, and kept in mind that it was then his master wanted his luncheon: If the watch was shown to him at any other hour, he did not go to fetch the broth, while if three o'clock was passed without the luncheon being called for, he got fidgety and at last ran and brought it, in case he was always rewarded with some sugar plums.

You have no notion, said Mr. Vanneck, how much time and trouble, and especially how much patience, I have bestowed on the training of this animal. Confined to my chair, however, I continued my task methodlessly. Nothing was more difficult than to accustom Jack to his clothes; he need to take off his clothes again and again, until at last I had them sewed to his shirt. When he walks out with me, he wears a straw hat, but never without making fearful grimaces. He takes a bath every day, and is, on the whole, very cleanly.

"Jack," exclaimed Mr. Vanneck, pointing to me "this gentleman wants his handkerchief." The monkey drew it from my pocket, and handed it to me.

"Now, show your room to my guests," continued his master; and Jack opened a door, at which he stopped to let us pass, and then followed himself. Everything was extremely tidy in the small room. There was a bed with a matrass, a table, some chairs, drawers, and various toys; a gun hung on a wall. The bell rung, Jack went and re-appeared with his master, wheeling in the chair. Meanwhile, I had taken the gun from the wall; Mr. Vanneck handed it to the monkey, who brought the powder-flask and the shot bag, and in the whole process of loading acquitted himself like a rifleman. I had already seen so much that was astonishing, that I hardly felt surprised at this feat. Jack now placed himself at the open window took aim, and discharged the gun without being in the least startled by the report. He then went through the sword exercise with the same skill.

It would be too long to jot down all Mr. Vanneck told us about his method of education and training; the above facts, witnessed by myself, bear sufficient evidence of the abilities of the animal, and its master's talent for tuition. We stayed to supper, to which there came some more ladies and gentleman. Jack again exhibited his cleanness, in waiting at which he acquitted himself as well as any man servant. Going home, my companion missed a small bottle of sweets, out of which he had regaled the monkey with almonds. Jack had managed to steal it from the pocket; and on being convicted of the theft, he was severely punished by his master.

SCENE IN THE CAUCASUS—Delivery of Schamyl's Son to his Father by the Russians.—The Caucasus, a newspaper published at Tiflis, contains a communication respecting a recent exchange of prisoners between the Russians and the Chief of the Circassians. On this occasion Schamyl received back one of his sons, who, having been taken away in his boyhood, had been educated in Russia, and even served in the army. The Caucasus says:

Last summer the Princess Tchattchavadse and the Princess Orbelain, with her children, were captured by some of Schamyl's bands. Their captivity lasted eight months, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Government and of their relatives. They at length succeeded, however, in inducing Schamyl to accept ransom from them to the amount of 40,000 silver roubles, together with the surrender of his son. On the 23d of March, both parties met for effecting this exchange, Schamyl to the last moment, was exceedingly distrustful, being accompanied by a body of six or seven thousand men, who brought with them some field-pieces. As soon as he had taken up his position on the right of the frontier river, the Mitschik, and the Russians on the left, he sent his other son, Kasi Muhammed, with thirty Murids as an escort to the carriage containing the prisoners, to meet the Russians. On the Russian side a party of riflemen crossed the river, accompanied by Major-General Baron Nikola, Prince Tchattchavadse and Jamal Eddin, Schamyl's son, that was to be exchanged.

When Jamal Eldin approached the ford of the river, thousands of voices repeated, in a monotonous chaunt, the words of Estipher Alla, which is a thanksgiving, when any enterprise has come to a prosperous issue. While the son was crossing the river, a dress was brought to him as a present from his father, which he immediately put on. As soon as he had assumed his new attire, being accompanied by the Russian officers, and his brother, Kasi Muhammed, he climbed the mountain where his father was sitting, surrounded by the Murids, while a mountaineer held over the chieftain's head a large dark parasol.

Schamyl is a remarkably handsome man, forty-seven years of age, with a very expressive face and prepossessing manners. When his son approached him he stroked out his hand for him to kiss, then embraced him and wept. After that he bowed in a friendly manner to the Russian officers, and requested them to thank Baron Nikolai for the kindness with which he had treated his son. After this he added, as if replying to his own thoughts, "I believe now in the honor of the Russians!" The story runs that he was a little afraid lest the Russians, after the exchange was over, should surprise him and carry back again the money, perhaps his son into the bargain. The report concludes with the remark that this interview is memorable, inasmuch as no Russian since the year 1839 had ever seen Schamyl.

The Speech of Mr. Wise in Washington.

We cut the following from the National Intelligencer of the 28th ult:

A professional and usually accurate reporter has presented to us the following sketch of the brief remarks of Mr. Wise, to which we give place, under the impression that it presents a faithful version of all that was said and done:

At nine o'clock Mr. Wise was introduced from the balcony to the auditory, and was greeted with applause by a portion of the crowd, and hoots and hisses from another portion. He commenced his speech as follows:

Fellow citizens of Washington: I never regretted more in my life than now that I have not more strength. It is not generous to trample on prostra tefoes. [Cries "good," and "hear," accompanied by groans and other noisy demonstrations].

But if ever a man might be allowed to put his heel on the neck of his enemy, I might be pardoned for doing so to-night. [Renewed interruptions.]

If there ever was an opponent domineering and dictatorial, it is that illiberal party which assumes now to rule America. "Sam" has boasted that he was the invisible invincible; but I have met the black knight with his visor down, and his shield and lance are broken! He had crossed the North, stumping his foot, so that the nations might feel the shaking of the earth. But he traveled in the night, with dark lantern in hand; and just before day, the darkest time of the night, to do his boasting. Men became appalled, their blood curdled in their veins, their muscles crowded on their bones, and fears came over the minds of the people. I had proclaimed that this invisible invincible was easily conquerable. I knew the rock of defense, and that rock was the indomitable Democracy. [Here, as at every preceding sentence, there was noisy interruption.]

Mr. Wise then briefly related the travel performed and the oratorical toils endured by him during the canvass in Virginia, and continued as follows:

Notwithstanding that Sam had achieved victories in the North, I knew he could not meet the masses of the people in their ordinary assemblages in Virginia. I know he could not stand before the pibroch and trump of liberty. He might live in the land of the secret ballot, but he could not survive the vivâ voce of the people of Virginia. By that voice Sam was overwhelmingly conquered in the Old Dominion. [Applause, cries of hurza for Sam, hisses, groans, etc]

That is a demonstration, I suppose, of liberty, of Americans ruling America. The ear of the people is not to be allowed to listen to the language of liberty. Not only are these Sams hurrahing for the destruction of religious liberty, but they would trample on the freedom of the pen and of speech. [Applause and disapprobation.]

I tell you, you have found your master in a purified majority, which consists in the conscientious and conservative men of both the old parties. [Renewed interruptions, mingled with cries for holy water.]

My friends, I would, were I one of the Lord's anointed, give you a little of the holy water you ask for. You need it. [Groans.] You who are crying out there for a little holy water are hypocrites. [Groans.] You don't mean it. You have joined the war waged by the Abolitionists on the institutions of Virginia. If you are sincere in desiring holy water, I will commend you to your own high priests, to the forty odd Protestant Popes of the Massachusetts Legislature. [Applause, mingled with cries of "Hurrah for Sam."]

Speaking ironically, Mr. Wise continued, being momentarily interrupted by cheers and other noises: I think I have made converts of you, judging from your cheering. I thank you from my heart for your decent, orderly conduct and behavior. You have demonstrated that you are worthy to be masters of this great country. What laws will guard us if such men as you rule the country? Discussion is not tolerated, speech is silenced. [Loud hurrahs for Sam and groans.]

My lungs are too weak for me to contend with a rabble like you. A mob of Know-Nothings has seized on the capitol of the country. I leave to conservative Whigs and indomitable Democrats to say whether this disgrace shall abide here. [Cries of "No, no," "Go on," "Hurrah for Sam," &c.]

I must thank you, my friends, for the compliment you intended to pay me. ["Go on!" "go on, go on!"] No, I shall not go on. My lungs won't permit it. And I will conclude by saying that here in Washington the freedom of speech is not allowed by a tyrant and dictator and dark-lantern oligarchy, which ever seeks to oppress.

Mr. Wise then withdrew, and crowds of his political friends rushed into the hotel to congratulate him.

BURNING A NEGRO ALIVE.—Some time since, we published an account of the murder of Miss Thornton, an interesting young girl residing near Gaston, Alabama. Immediately after the murder and detection of the negro, his immediate punishment was seriously contemplated by the people of Sumpter county, but after maturu deliberation, the law-abiding citizens delivered him into the custody of the proper officers, and he was committed to prison.

At the late term of the Circuit Court of Sumpter county, the attorney appointed by the Court, in the discharge of his duty, moved for a change of venue to Greene county. The Judge, as the motion was sustained by the proper affidavits, sustained the application.

On Wednesday last the citizens of South Sumpter assembled en masse at Mr. William Mobley's, and unanimously passed a series of resolutions, reflecting seriously upon the conduct of the Judge, and, after having pledged themselves to sustain each other, a portion of them proceeded to Livingston, and took the miserable criminal, by force from the jail where he was confined.

On Friday last, after due preparation, they carried him to the spot where he had so cruelly murdered his innocent victim, and burnt him alive at the stake. About 3000 persons were present, who witnessed, with various emotions, the dreadful spectacle. We were present, but hope that we will never again witness a scene like it. The pyre was composed of several cords of light-wood, in the centre of which was a green willow stake, selected in consequence of its indestructibility by fire.

On the top of the pile of light-wood, the criminal was placed and securely chained to the stake. While in this situation he confessed his guilt, stating that he had no accomplices, that he was actuated by lust alone, that he had attempted to violate her person, but had failed, and to conceal the attempt he had cruelly murdered her by beating the poor innocent creature with a stump, that while he was doing this she implored him to carry her home to her father, and that she would conceal the violence he had inflicted. He then left her, but soon returned, and after again beating her, he concealed the body in the very hole where the stake was planted to which he suffered.

After this confession was made, the match was applied, and in a few moments the devouring flames were enveloping the doomed negro; his fearful cries resounded through the air, while the surrounding negroes who witnessed his dreadful agony and horrible contortions, sent up an involuntary howl of horror. His sufferings, though excruciating, were short; in a few minutes the flames had enveloped him entirely, revealing, now and then, as they fitfully swayed, hither and thither, his black and burning carcass, like a demon of the fire, grinning as if in hellish triumph at his tormentors.

Soon all was over, nothing was left but the burning flesh and charred skeleton of this human devil, who could thus deliberately perpetrate so foul a crime. The horrid outrage was fearfully avenged, and though the heavens were reeking with the stench of burning flesh, yet justice was satisfied; the law of retaliation was inflicted as nearly as it could be, while the example made of this wretch had, no doubt, a salutary effect upon the 2000 slaves who witnessed the execution. [Lauderdale (Miss.) Republican, 28th.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—The extensive flouring establishment of F Schaaf & Son, situated in the west part of the town of Jeffersonville, Ill, was destroyed by fire on Tuesday morning, 29th ult, and one of the sons of the senior partner perished in the flames. Two of the sons of Mr. Frederick Schaaf, and another young man were sleeping in the mill when the fire broke out. The young man and one of the brothers effected their escape from the burning building, though not without serious injury from the flames; but the other brother was unable to escape, and was burned to ashes.

THE BULL DOG.—The bull dog is the most brutal and the least intelligent of its species. Its depressed forehead, its underhanging jaws and blood-shot eyes, unite in forming the very personification of the savage. Although capable of some attachment, it can not be relied upon as a friend. So utterly without intellect is the courage of the bull dog, that it will attack anything that gives offence. This dog has never been a pet in the United States; but in England, among a large class of citizens, it is carefully reared, and employed is bull-baits. In these bull-baits, the dog, while fastened to the nose of some unfortunate bull, has had one leg after another cut off with a knife to test its courage; and this display has been hailed by the pinudits of the "rural population," and the encouragement of the scions of nobility! History relates that Alexander once witnessed a bull dog attack a famed lion, and being willing to save the lion's life, ordered the dog to be taken off; but the labor of men and all their strength could not loosen the fireful and deep-biting teeth." The dog was then mutilated by its keeper, and not only its limbs, but its body were severed from its head; "whereat the king was wonderfully moved, and sorrowfully repented his rashness in destroying a beast of so noble a spirit;" a very natural feeling, one would suppose, to every generous mind.

Many years ago an English ship was at one of our docks, on board of which was a bull dog. The animal was so ferocious that he gained an extensive reputation. Chained at the gangway of the ship, he spent all the livelong day in the hopeless task of springing at every person who passed along, either on pleasure or business. The owner, first mate of the vessel, would sit for hours and detail the wonderful deeds of this mighty dog. Crowds of idlers daily collected and there stood the hero, or rather, there raved the insane creature of the multitude, each individual indulging the vague hope that he would presently break loose and pitch into somebody, and thus show his powers.

Among the idlers was an Indian who occasionally visited the city and made a few pence by shooting an arrow at pennies stuck in the end of a stick. Upon the very appearance of the Indian, the bull dog was particularly violent, greatly to the amusement of the fellows, who took a malicious pleasure in irritating the animal. The mate finally interfered, and told the Indian to go away, lest the dog might break loose and eat him up. The Indian, not the least alarmed, in broken English, announced to the crowd that if the dog was brought down to the ground, and chained to a post, he would for five dollars fight the dog with nothing but his hands and teeth. The money was raised, and the mate, after expressing much reluctance at the idea of having the Indian killed, brought the dog down from the ship, and fastened him to a post. The Indian put away his bow and arrow, his knife, laid his neck bare, and rolled up his shirt sleeves. A ring was formed and the battle commenced.

The Indian approached the dog crawling upon all fours, barking and growling, as if he was one himself. The bull dog mean while jumped and fumed at the mouth, while his eyes beamed living fire with irritation. The Indian, however, kept up his pantomime, and gradually brought his face in fearful proximity to the dog's teeth. The mate now interfered, for he felt confident the Indian would get killed; but the crowd had become excited, and insisted upon "seeing the thing out." A mutual silence ensued between the combatants, the dog straining his chain in his anxiety to reach the Indian, until it was straight and solid as a bar of iron. Suddenly the Indian seized the bull dog's underlip between his teeth, and in an instant whirled himself with the dog over on his back. So unexpected was the attack, and so perfectly helpless was the dog, with his feet in the air, and his jaw imprisoned, that he recovered his astonishment only to give forth yells of pain; whereupon the Indian shook him a moment as a cat does a mouse, and then let go his hold. The dog, once so savage, putting his tail between his legs, retreated from his enemy, and screamed with terror to get beyond the reach of the chain.

LATER FROM EL PASO.—Arrest of the Mexican Commissioner—Capt. Bread, with G. H. Giddine's mail train from El Paso, arrived in San Antonio on the 25th ultimo, only fifteen days from El Paso, in good order. They report that they saw no Indians, but say they had information that there was much Indian disturbance in Mexico.

The San Antonio Ledger has the following letter from El Paso, dated May 9th.

Our town was thrown into great excitement last evening, by the arrival of Col. Sambee, out four days from Chihuahua, with orders from Santa Anna to arrest Mr Sallsar, the Mexican Commissioner. The work on the line has been, in consequence, suspended, until the new Commissioner, who has also left Mexico arrives.

Mr. Sallsar, it is understood, will be allowed a few days for preparation, and then, under a strong guard, taken to the city of Mexico.

The charges against Mr. Sallsar are. I understand, disrespect towards his superior, and want of energy, or neglect in pushing the work to a conclusion. It is notorious here, that the government did not supply him with means to take the field, and that he borrowed money on his own private account to carry the work on the part of Mexico.

Mr. Sallsar is one of the most talented and gentlemanly men in all Mexico. During his previous sojourn and the present, he has gained the respect and confidence of all.

Santa Anna has directed his thunder against this gentleman; how it will end, there is no telling. No honest, virtuous man man is allowed to hold office. Under those circumstances, can Mexico prosper? The situation of affairs there will reflect the U. S. Commissioner, Col. W. H. Emory, who, with his usual energy, is pushing the work to a conclusion. It would not surprise us to see him back here soon.

MISSISSIPPI.—The rain-storm of the 28th was quite heavy at Vicksburg.

We find the following paragraphs in the Natchez Courier of Saturday last:

A fire occurred several days since on the plantation of Col A. H. Pegues, of Lafayette, Miss, by which a negro cabin and a colored woman and her three children were burned. The fire originated in this singular manner: The negro man, whose wife and children were asleep in the cabin, was very much annoyed by fleas, and supposing they were in great numbers under his house, he concluded he would destroy them with fire, without doing any other damage, and, accordingly, he went and procured an armful of shucks, and raising a plank in the floor of his cabin, scattered them on the ground, under the floor, and set fire to them. There being much combustible matter about the cabin, because of the very dry weather, it was but a moment being enveloped in flames. Thus the whole family perished, except the man, who barely made his escape.

Mr. Green, Chief Engineer of the Mississippi Railroad expresses very confidently the opinion that, by the 4th of July next, the cars will be running to Holly Springs. On the first day of January next, the contractors will commence laying down the rails from Holly Springs, in the direction of Oxford, and at the same time from Canton, in the direction of Lexington. On the first day of April next, saving accidents, the Central Railroad will be in operation from Memphis to Oxford.

The Jackson Mississippian, of the 1st inst., says:

After a drought of nearly two months, we have had, during the last three days, a succession of delightful and refreshing showers. Crops of cotton and corn were suffering immensely for the want of rain, and though it is too late to expect full crops, these showers have added immensely to the prospects of planters, hereabouts.

The Lauderdale Republican says:

We have no rain in these diggins, yet the mercury stands at 97, and the cotton crop is next to nothing. Gardens are literally burnt up; yet, strange to say, the corn crop looks remarkably well, and promises an abundant harvest. Our wheat crop is first rate, and if the wells and springs don't dry up, we can manage to do without rain for some time yet to come.

THE WASHINGTON UNION AND THE MORMONS.—A recent original communication on the Mormons, in the Washington Union, published, we presume, by and with the advice and consent of the Administration, expresses the following just opinions of this heathenish community at the Great Salt Lake:

The case of the Mormons may serve further to illustrate our idea of the rights of conscience. Without questioning their right to believe in the divine mission of Joe Smith or Brigham Young, or to have as many wives and concubines as King Solomon or the Grand Turk, we certainly do deny their right, as members of this confederation, to set up the inspirations of their prophet in opposition to the constitutional powers of the President of the United States or any other branch of the Government. Nor do we think their privileges extend to a violation of those laws and institutions which are the basis of our manners, habits and morals. Polygamy, however sanctioned by the example of the patriarchs, is a criminal offence in every State of the Union, and a community in which every man may have as many wives as he pleases, can no more assimilate with those who admit of but one than if it sanctioned the commission of murder or any other crime against the laws of nature and society.

Coming at length to the main question, the writer further informs us that—

As might be expected, since they became Territorial members of the Union, they have placed themselves in direct opposition to the legitimate authority of the Government of the United States, by rejecting its officers and refusing to recognise any authority but that of their inspired prophet. In this we think, very unfortunately, they were humored by Mr. Fillmore, who conferred on D. Young the office of civil Governor in addition to that far higher station he held, as the oracle of the Divine will. Thus Governor Brigham Young now combines in his person the sanctity of a representative of the Divinity and the temporal authority of an officer of the Government of the United States. The association is supremely absurd, if not absolutely blasphemous.

A colored man in Dover, Delaware, murdered his two children on the night of the 24th ult., in the most brutal manner.

LATER FROM TEXAS.—The steamship Louisiana, Capt. Talbot, arrived Tuesday from Indianola and Galveston, bringing papers from the latter place to Saturday last. There is but little news.

The editor of the Houston Telegraph, writing from the country, says that the cotton and corn crops are very promising in Fort Bend, Austin and Washington counties. There is very great increase in the amount of corn grown this year, and the prospects are good for the largest crop which was ever made in Texas.

The editor of the Telegraph estimates the receipts of cotton this year at Houston, at 45,000 bales.

The Chronicle says that news has reached Matagorda that Capt W. S. Baker, on the Colorado, a few miles above that place, was shot in his bed, a few nights since. The Chronicle had not learned any particulars of the foul deed. The information was given by one of his negroes there was no other white person on the premises but Capt. Baker.

On Monday, the 21st inst., the citizens of Fayette county assembled at Lagrange, for the purpose of appointing delegates to represent them in a Railroad Convention, to be held at Columbus on Monday, the 28th ult., to take into consideration the subject of uniting with the Harrisburg Railroad Company, for the extension of said road in the direction of the Colorado valley. After organization, a committee was appointed to draft resolutions. Three resolutions expressed the favorable sense the meeting held of the proposed extension. Twenty-one delegates were appointed.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed poss

HOMER COLLEGE, LA.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire:

Dear Sir—Previous to seeing your letter to Rev. J. C. Blackman, President of the Board of Trustees for Homer College, I had intended, as Secretary, writing to you in regard to the doings of the Board and the prospects of the college. A just appreciation of the solicitude felt by yourself and other best friends of the enterprise in its success, demanded something of the kind before this. But surrounding circumstances, of which we all, to a greator or less extont, the creditors, have prevented it so far.

The peculiar embarrassments under which the people in this section of country have been laboring this year, have presented many obstacles to the Board of Trustees in the commencement of the enterprise. It is a matter of general notoriety that our river has not yet yet opened, nor is likely to do so this season, so as to enable the planters to ship their cotton and bring up the usual return supplies. To this very great inconvenience has been added the most unprecedently dry spring over known in this country; and with the two the greatest scarcity of the necessaries, not to say anything about the comforts of life. Indeed, up to a recent date, the distress (mostly in anticipation, however) was very great.

But now "the latter raine" have come to our great relief, and the whole country is now rejoicing in prospect of an abundant crop, for which the prospects were never more favorable. Had we now any means of transporting our cotton to market all would be well. This inconvenience we bear the more patiently, however, since the prospects for the early completion of the V. S. and T. Railroad are so flattering, to which we look with much interest.

Yet, notwithstanding all these embarrassments, the Board has not been idle. It has met already three times, and I am proud to say the members manifest the most commendable zeal for the success of the enterprise. Revs. J. C. Blackman and R. Randle have been appointed on behalf of the Board traveling agents to solicit subscriptions and donations to the building and endowment funds of the college. Each member of the Board is also a special agent to receive such contributions.

At the first meeting a most eligible and beautiful lot, consisting of twenty-seven acres, was selected as the site for the college building; the purchase of which, however, has not yet been effected. It is now the purpose of the Trustees to call another meeting and set out the making of Brick, &c., and to take other active measures for the speedy erection and completion of all the buildings.

By a resolution of the Board, any subscriber to the endowment fund who may send to the college, will be outitled to a credit on his tuition fees equal to the amount of the interest of his subscription for the time he may so send. But this provision can not take effect until $50,000 shall have been subscribed. Thus placing the college on high ground, and rendering it independent of contingencies that might retard its progress and cripple its energies, and at the same time extending to the subscriber that liberality so wisely recommended by the last Annual Conferences. The completion of a subscription to that amount at an early day is most ardently desired, that the college may open under prospects promising brilliant success.

The project has been well received on the part of the community generally. Did not some, from envy, jealousy, or some other evil spirit, or some perverted notions, object to or oppose the project, it would be an anomaly in nature, and so much out of the course of things that the friends of the undertaking might well be alarmed for its safety. The puny arm of opposition has been manifested in the public prints. But the shafts of the assailants, of their own inherent defects and want of soundness, fell broken at their feet, without harm to the assailed. The only opposing demonstrations that have been made publicly have failed to have more effect than to expose the bitterness of the motives that prompted them to the detestation of all who are influenced by a regard to truth and right.

Conference acted wisely in locating its institution of learning here. So far as healthfulness of location, eligibility of site and prospects of liberal patronage are concerned, (and they ought to have an influence on the prosperity of such an enterprise,) no place in the Southwest can surpass this. Pleasantly situated in the fertile pine lands, nearly equidistant from the rich valleys of the Red and Ouachita rivers, with the inducements afforded by an abundance of the best water that can be found anywhere, a salubrious atmosphere and consequent good health, Homer must soon become a place of summer resort for the wealthy planters of those rivers, if we offer them sufficient educational advantages. The fact, too, that the country around is fast being filled up by an intelligent, enterprising and prosperous people, generally able to educate well, and duly appreciating the advantages of education, gives much promise to the young institution.

I said above that the community generally have manifested a timely interest in our success. This is, I am proud to say, without regard to denominations or sects. This all may well do, because it is a desideratum in the country of which all may enjoy the advantages and participate in the benefits. Near by us our Baptist friends have a young and rising institution, of which, likewise, as citizens of North Louisiana, we are proud. Educational enterprises, however started, are, and of right should be, liberally regarded and patronized.

And while our Baptist friends have an especial pride and interest in their institution, so should we, as Methodists, take an especial pride and feel the deepest interest in ours. The one is under the fostering care of a Convention, the other under that of a Conference. Both equally laudable enterprises, and worthy the sanction of the high authorities by which they are endorsed, should never fail to meet with public favor and a liberal patronage. The Methodist, the Baptist, the Presbyterian, the whole community should rejoice to see measures being taken to promote the general educational interests of the country; and especially in whatever looks forward to the educational interests of the ministry, already too long and too sadly neglected. In anything that will tend to elevate the pulpit from its present condition to one commensurate with its high design and holy purpose, must be of the first importance not only to the Church, but to all the world besides.

Our college project, then, intends all this, and a great deal more. It proposes to afford the facilities of a thorough education, not only to the Church, but to the world also, on the best possible terms. The advantages are not to the few, but alike open to all who may choose to profit by them. And while our denominational pride should be justly interested in the success of an enterprise of our own starting, and prompt us to use our best exertions to promote its welfare, yet there is nothing in it that can be objected to by the most strenuous friend of any other branch of the Church.

I had well nigh forgotten to mention one fact which lies at the very bottom, not only of all successful educational enterprises, but also is a pre-requisite and sort of stepstone to every moral, social and religious success. We have at last, I think, successfully put down the liquor traffic within the limits of our corporation. The license system, in less quantities than twenty-eight gallons, is prohibited by a most decided majority of the votes of the town. The effect upon the peace and quiet of the place is beyond the most sanguine expectation of the friends of reform. The decided improvement cannot fail to convince all of the beneficial effects of anti license system, and bring to its support hereafter many new friends who doubted its effects before.

Very respectfully, Yours, &c.,

J. M. THOMASSON.

CORRESONDENCE UP THE RIVER.

NO. 1.

A Floating Palace—Steamboat Traveling—A Psycological Phenomenon—Steamboat Literature—Drouth—An Incident.

The John Simonds—she is a three-decker; that is, in house architecture, she is three stories high, besides hold and hurricane roof, answering to cellar and attic. Steamboats are called floating palaces. In some instances it is a shameful misnomer: rather call them floating taverns—floating ruins—floating hovels—floating anything. But in this instance we have a palace, indeed. Not marble, but castellated halls; gilded saloons, with arched ceilings. We walk on the thickest and richest of Brussells fabric, and sit down on the most luxurious cushions. Our table bewilders the appetite with its rare, varied and unpronounceable dishes. The palate grows nervous and the stomach sympathizes with it in the provoking indecision which the very variety excites.

What traveling is like unto steamboat traveling on the Mississippi river? What is there that at all equals it in comfort, in all the conveniences and appointments that make life pleasant away from home? Nowhere can you sleep and eat better. If you have your quill and inkstand along, writing is not only possible, but pleasant. If you are devout, you can meditate and pray, and read the Scriptures. There is no better closet than a state-room—and perhaps you would suggest no time when it is more expedient to pray than when you are in one. I wish never to get beyond the age of steamboat traveling. Railroads for business and necessity, but steamboats for pleasant transit at conservative rates of speed and fare.

Whether the peril of this mode of journeying be greater than any other it questionable; but the apprehension we feel when safe at home, in thinking of the danger and the quickening which our apprehension receives every time we read of an explosion a snagging, or a fire are felt by very few when actually on board, and steaming away at the rate of ten or fifteen miles an hour. Is it for the same reason that a soldier loses all fear in battle, or that a mariner forgets his peril on the sea? We usually attribute the latter to the force of habit or schooling. We think this is not satisfactory; for raw and untried volunteers are often as brave as regulars; and the superior firmness of the latter is rather to be attributed to discipline than battle experience. And so of the sailor. It is not the frequent encounter of danger that enables him to laugh at the storm, for many a novice, and the most of those that go down to the sea in ships exhibit quite as much courage, with the difference which position and discipline may make. To come back to the thing in hand. Force of habit does not account for the fact that he who trembles at the thought of sleeping over a burning boiler will yet sleep soundly and dream pleasantly, and walk about undisturbed by the certain conviction that he may at any moment be sent star-ward by that same hissing, boiling, restless caldron that boils beneath him. Habit does not account for it. What, in the name of psycology, is it? Have we here an instance of the wide law of adaptation, in accordance with which the physical man meets the climate of the poles or of the equator, and makes itself at home in either?

Reading is a steamboat institution, and steamboat literature has grown into a business with both authors and publishers. There is a cause in this. What we read in our homes and studies is not always adapted to this sphere of existence. It is not the moral or religious quality of books, or the absence of this quality, that fits or unfits a book for the cabin or the guards. It is rather the typography, the style and the subject, apart from this quality. We want clear, large type, pleasant covers, and luminous, sunshiny faces, that invite acquaintance by making the first bow, or almost talk to you of themselves. The style and subject must accord with your circumstances. There are several books you are reading at the same time—the men and women around you; the country and scenes you are passing. You glance at these, and those, and then your book proper. The first are read by snatches and glimpses, and the last must be read in the same way. Bacon's Organum or Locke's Human Understanding would not do. You are going fast, and you need the harmony of a fast book, a fast style, in the sense of shortness as well as otherwise. New things are everywhere about you, and you need a new book—new in its cover, fresh and reeking from the press, and new in its subject. You are prepared to read just such a book, and no other. Books of travel, in short chapters, and with illustrations of scenery, are specially suitable. Read Bayard Taylor's travels up the White Nile, and his travels in Egypt and Central Africa, on the guard of a Mississippi steamer, and then read that or another book of travels at home, and compare your impressions and pleasures. Read Gibbon's exploration of the Amazon, and Lieutenant Lynch's exploration of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, whilst you are steaming up or down our great turbid river. There is harmony in your circumstances, and your chapters and paragraphs now have association, comparisons and contrasts between what is within and what is without, and you feel that you are living just as good a book as has been written, and that the book you are reading and the book you are living have a oneness of spirit, and that it is meet they should be united on the altar of harmony, where the priesthood of harmony proclaims the buns.

Mr. Samuel Irenus Prime has been my reading companion on the river. It is a good steamboat book, having, for the most part, those features of suitableness just mentioned. Your pro tem. made a short notice of it, after a very partial and hurried glance at its contents. Such a thing is perhaps excusable in a mere pro tem., but had he opened to Chapter 11, in which our author visits the grave of the "Dairyman's Daughter," that notice would have been longer and better. I confess this Chapter 11 curled my heart, and my head refused the critic's office thereafter. It will bear reviewing, however, if any one has the heart to read such a book with a critic's eye merely.

Between New Orleans and Memphis the signs of drouth are everywhere. Along the banks of the river the negroes are engaged in hauling water; carts, barrels and buckets were observable on the water's edge, and the women and children of the plantations appeared to have their hands full in supplying this necessary circumstance of life. It is fortunate both for this city and this great alluvial valley that such an exhaustless tank of wholesome water is accessible. For more reasons than one it is desirable to live on the banks of the Mississippi. If the rivers supply the people with bread, the river will furnish drinking water for the world.

We came very near having an item to chronicle, such as appears in the reporters' columns, and such as they will not willingly suffer to pass unknown. In the lingo of the many-initialed James: On a bright Sunday evening, when the world had just been washed in a shower, nature, fresh and fragrant, breathed upon us from the river's banks, as it had been the breath of new mown hay; and the sun, like the Parthian archers, sent back his shafts of light as he beat his hurried steps towards the gates of the west. "There might have been seen," indeed there was seen, but a few hundred yards in advance of our gallant steamer, a tiny bark, in swamp parlance yclept a dugout. As it floated down with the current and neared our bows, a solitary passenger was revealed, lying in the bottom, fast asleep. Without coat or boots, with a brown apology for a hat depending from his left brow, with a half-emptied bottle between his legs, and with a nose that flamed like the red light upon a ship's binnacle, he lay, a taper taking his rest—so quizical, so ludicrous, and so serious withal, that the river, the sun and the State of Arkansas seemed to wink at each other, and smile and weep over the scene. Shouts and halloos rung out from the hands on deck, and he awoke a soberer man for his fright, and a safer man for paddling out of our way. But we make an end here. In our next, shall we not say something of Memphis, of the country, of thunder and lightning, of hurricanes, and of Pontotoc!

LUTHERAN CHURCH IN TEXAS.

From the reports of the first and second sessions of the "First Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Texas," we learn that they have nineteen congregations and nine hundred members, and ten or twelve ministers and preachers. Five congregations have churches, and two more are being built. This year, Rev. H. Wendt is President of the Synod, Rev. W. Strobel, Secretary, and Rev. J. G. Ebinger, Treasurer. The Synod contemplates taking steps to establish an institution of learning suitable to their wants in this country.

It seems that they have had some difficulties, as will appear from the following extract from the Presidents report:

"The unevangelical congregations in Fredericksburg and New Braunfels laid in complaints against us before the Consistorialrath of the Grand Duchy of Baden, and accused us of raising the standard of old Lutheranism in the most ultra manner, and exciting strife and discord in congregations that have already been organized, instead of preaching the gospel to the destitute.

Upon this I replied to the Consistorialrath of the Grand Duchy of Baden that those people who preferred those complaints against us would sometimes, indeed, adopt a Christian mode of expression, but that they all denied the great truths of Christianity, from which it is easy to see that a dark spirit, in the form of an angel of light, is intent upon traducing and treading down the truth. I stated that there were some honorable men among them, who doubtless had ignorantly taken this step, but that most of them exhibited a conduct that was anything else but Christian. That it was true that we had organized an Evangelical Lutheran Synod, but that we fight under the banner of the Lord Jesus Christ, and that our motto is, "We stand upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner-stone."

That we are no old Lutherans is sufficiently evidenced by the fact of our union with the General Synod, which embraces nearly twenty Synods. Of exciting strife and ill-will among the congregations we know nothing, upon the urgent invitation of about sixteen persons, who were dissatisfied with the conduct and doctrine of the Rev. Mr. Dangers, Bro. Zizelman went to Fredericksburg, and when I came to Galveston, I found no minister of our Church there, wherefore I could remain with a good heart and preach Christ."—Texas Christian Advocate.

OUTWARD UNION.

Connectionalism.

[Dr. Hodge, of Philadelphia, sets forth clearly and strongly the connectional character of the Christian Church, as opposed to congregational independency. He appeals to the common consciousness of Christians, as manifested in the whole history of the Church.—Ed.]

Everything organic has what may be called a nisus formativus, an inward force, by which it is impelled to assume the form suited to its nature. This inward impulse may, by circumstances, be impeded or misdirected, so that the normal state of a plant or animal may never be attained. Still, this force never fails to manifest its existence, nor the state to which it tends. What is thus true in nature, is no less true in the Church. There is nothing more conspicuous in her history than the law by which believers are impelled to express their inward unity by outward union. It has been manifested in all ages, and under all circumstances. It gave rise to all the early councils; it determined the idea of heresy and schism; it led to the exclusion from all churches those who, for the denial of the common faith, were excluded from any one, and who refused to acknowledge their subjection to the Church as a whole. This feeling was clearly exhibited at the time of the Reformation. The churches then formed ran together as naturally as drops of quicksilver; and when this union was prevented by internal or external circumstances, it was deplored as a great evil. It may do for men of the world to attribute this remarkable characteristic in the history of the Church to the love of power, or to some other unworthy source. But it is not thus to be accounted for. It is a law of the Spirit. If what all men do is to be referred to some abiding principle of human nature, what all Christians do must be referred to something which belongs to them as Christians.

So deeply seated is this conviction that outward union and mutual subjection is the normal state of the Church, that it manifests itself in those whose theory leads them to deny and resist it. Their consociations, associations and advisory councils are so many devices to satisfy an inward craving, and to prevent the dissolution to which it is felt that absolute independence must inevitably lead.

That, then, the Church is one, in the sense that a smaller part should be subject to a larger, and a larger to a whole, is evident:

1. From its nature as being one kingdom, one family, one body, having one head, one faith, one written constitution, and actuated by one Spirit.

2. From the command of Christ that we should obey our brethren, not because they live near to us; not because we have covenanted to obey them, but because they are our brethren, the temples and organs of the Holy Ghost.

3. From the fact that during the apostolic age the churches were not independent bodies, but subject in all matters of doctrine, order and discipline to a common tribunal.

4. Because the whole history of the Church proves that this union and mutual subjection is the normal state of the Church towards which it strives by an inward law of its being. If it is necessary that one Christian should be subject to other Christians, it is no less necessary that one church should be subject, in the same spirit, and to the same extent, and on the same grounds, to other churches.

Louisiana.

Dick, a negro boy belonging to the estate of the late Jake Weber, was shot in the parish of Assumption a few days ago. We learn no further particulars than that the perpetrator of the deed was a Frenchman.

The Iberville Times says that the annual meeting of the Louisiana Baptist State Convention will be held with Mt. Zion Church, Jackson parish, on Friday before the third Sabbath in July next.

We learn from the Opelousas Patriot that in the month of January last, a man calling himself Horace G. Loring arrived in that place and shortly afterwards united himself in matrimony to a respectable lady residing there. After living with her for about three months he decamped to parts unknown. The Patriot says:

Loring is about 5 feet 9 inches high, has black hair, very dark eyes, straight nose, rather long face, lively disposition, and pleasant and agreeable manners. He has a scar on one hand between the thumb and fingers, showing on both sides, which he says was caused by a small sword cane. He has another scar on the forehead, about an inch from the edge of the hair, and about an inch long. On the back of one hand (probably the right) he has a stain made with blue ink, about 2 inches in diameter, and a representation of the Frenchman, about 6 inches long, on the arm, between the elbow and wrist.

Loring represents himself related to the highly respectable family of that name in Boston, and says he was once a Midshipman in the U. S. Navy.

Editors throughout the Union would serve the cause of justice by giving publicity to this notice. It is supposed that Loring left New Orleans for Cincinnati about the middle of May, on the steamship Daniel Webster.

The St. Martinsville Gazette of Saturday last, says:

On Monday last Mr Jean Baptiste Berard, an old and respectable inhabitant of this parish, committed suicide by cutting his throat with a razor. For some time past Mr Berard had been returning under mental derangement, and in spite of the close watch which was kept upon him he was found locked up in his room weltering in his blood and breathing his last.

LOUISIANA.—The Thibodaux Minerva of Saturday last says:

Yesterday morning we had another fine rain, as well as a little shower on Thursday. The fears entertained for the corn crop are beginning to be dissipated—particularly for such as was planted late. Of course there is little hope for such as had the ears formed before the rain. As to the cane, we cannot expect a remunerative crop, although some pieces—on very high land—look quite promising. The health of our town was never better than at present.

We learn from the Calcasieu Press that a fine rain visited that parish on Thursday last.

The rains of Thursday and Friday last also extend to the parish of Plaquemine.

The Planter's Banner of the 7th has the following:

On the subject of the late drought one of our subscribers, a resident of this parish, informs us that a very old and respectable lady, who has resided in this neighborhood nearly all her life, and whose veracity may be fully relied on, witnessed in the year 1802 a severer drought than that of this year. She states that in the neighborhood of Franklin, for miles around, perhaps throughout the entire parish—a rain whatever had fallen from the month of October, 1802, until towards the end of the following June. Vegetation of all kinds was then completely withered, most of the early planted corn did not even vegetate, and after the rain had commenced the planters went to work in good earnest, plowed up the land they had already planted, again threw their grain into the soil, and an abundant harvest blest their labors.

FROM NORTHERN MEXICO.—Progress of the Revolution.—We find in the Galveston News the following letter from Brownsville, dated the 25th ult:

The agony is over, and the standard of revolt has again been unfurled to the "battle and the breeze" in the neighborhood of Monterey. That city is, by this time, in the hands of the revolutionists, as in the official communication I saw yesterday, they said that no opposition would be made in their entrance into it.

The movement was initiated somewhat sooner than its leaders had intended, but as they were betrayed, they escaped out of the place and proclaimed war against the tyrant in one of the towns near Monterey. The leader for the present is Don Santiago Vidaurri, for many years Secretary of State of Nuevo Leon under the federal form of government. Monterey is the most wealthy and populous city in Northern Mexico, and to this base self-preservation will induce its inhabitants to furnish the means with which to organize a force sufficient to successfully defy the despot and his minions. As I write the most intense excitement prevails among the numerous exiles here, and the leading men among them will soon be among the revolutionists, fully determined to do or die.

Before the present movement took place, all the artillery in and about Monterey, including all the guns in the celebrated Black Fort, had been removed into the interior of the country, and the very general belief is, that the few regulars in the city would not even attempt to defend it.

Gen Woll, Santa Anna's hangman at Matamoras, receives one or two expresses every day; but it is not to be supposed that this foreign blacking will be so verdant as to even think of venturing out in person, not even for the sake of gulling himself with the belief of the people, that for a quarter of a century have led and treated him as though he were indeed a dead lion.

Some people say some trouble the inquisitions in Zacatecas entered into an agreement with Santa Anna to export a large number of mules and it rests on the payment of a conventional export duty. On the faith of the agreement, they started for this frontier with some four thousand head of animals, but before their arrival a decree was published providing that not a single animal should be allowed to be brought out of the country, thereby causing the ruin of the poor fellows who were so silly as to suppose Santa Anna could act in good faith, or being guilty of doing an honest act in his life. The tyrant will violate freely all pledges, and the sacredly of the most solemn promises, if, by doing so, he can injure this frontier. His Coup solemnly against the people is the secret of his having sent back to Tamaulipas his bleeding minion, Woll, accompanied by the woman of ill-fame who is this scoundrel's chere amie.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FURTHER PARTICULARS BY THE AFRICA.

The New York papers of the 7th contain telegraphic dispatches from Halifax of the Africa's news more full than have been received here:

The Africa reports speaking, May 26, in the English Channel, the U. S. steamer Arctic from New York.

The Washington sailed from Southampton for New York on the 23d of May, with 260 passengers.

Reopening of Negotiations.

On the 16th of May, Count Buol on behalf of Austria, had an interview with Lord Westmoreland and Count Bourqueney, and suggested that the members of the Conference should meet again. The French and English Ministers could not give a reply, but it is understood that if they assent to a meeting, Count Buol will then again attempt to arrange the third point.

Berlin papers report that the Austrian mediatory proposals, is, that Russia and Turkey settle between themselves the number of ships they will keep in the Black Sea—England and France to keep each two ships therein, and Turkey undertaking not to enter into any treaty with Russia unless submitted to France and England.

According to Vienna papers the Conference will be reopened, and a meeting would be held Saturday, the 26th, without the Russian Plenipotentiaries, and another on Monday, the 28th, at which they would be present. Lord Palmerston's explanations in Parliament would authorize that these meetings are preliminary only.

The Austrian Envoy, M. Rechberg, leaves immediately for Frankfort, to urge the immediate mobilization of the German Federal forces. It is also further reported that Austria has sent secret circulars to all the German Courts, insisting that each State shall specify distinctly the line of conduct it means to follow.

The New Plan of Operations.

General Pellissier's appointment is immensely popular, and operations on a great scale are confidently hoped for. It is surmised that Pellissier will make a bold attempt to cut off Liprandi's army. The secret expedition which was recalled from Kerisch is reported to have again sailed, destination unknown. The recent arrival of three French Divisions under Generals Autelt, Bessillon and Angely, makes the Allied force in the Crimea about 200,000, viz: 120,000 French; 30,000 British; 40,000 Turkish; 11,000 Sardinian.

All the troops from the camp of Mealem have been shipped to the Crimea.

The Siege.

The correspondence from the English camp of May 8, says the army is well supplied with luxuries as well as necessaries, but some fever and cholera still prevailed. Many improvements have been made at Balaklava harbor. Hired labor is abundant.

May 10.—A severe combat took place during the night along the right attack, and the musket and bayonet were used for an hour and a half, when the Russians retired under cover of their batteries. The city and allied batteries then kept up a hot fire for two hours longer. The loss is considerable on both sides, but the number is not yet reported.

May 11.—Another Russian attack was made to-night. The night was very dark and the fight lasted half an hour.

May 12.—During a severe storm of rain and the darkness of the night, the Russians made another sortie against the left attack, charging clear up to the British trenches, and some of them leaping over the parapets, they were bayonetted. They fought most desperately. The rain having damaged their ammunition, they attacked with rookets. Their loss was severe. The British lost a captain and over a hundred killed and wounded.

May 19.—Gutschukoff telegraphs: The enemy's fire is weak. Our losses moderate. Both sides are repiering and erecting batteries. The battles before the walls are severe.

May 24.—Gneneral Pellissier telegraphs as follows: A very lively combat against our important position has lasted all night. We obtained a complete success. The enemy's loss was enormous and ours considerable.

The Paris Patrie gives further particulars, stating that the French attacked the Russian entrenchment camp near the Quarantine bastion on the night of the 22d, and again on the 23d when they carried it by assault. The battle was begun by the Russians.

Great Britain.

A great debate took place in Parliament on the evening of the 24th. D'Israeli brought forward a motion of want of confidence—expressing that Parliament cannot adjourn for a recess without expressing its dissatisfaction with the ambiguous language and uncertain conduct of the Government, in reference to the question of peace or war, and that under these circumstances the House feels it a duty to declare that it will continue to give every support to the Queen in the prosecution of the war, until in conjunction with her Allies, she shall obtain a safe and honorable peace.

Sir Francis Baring, on behalf of the Government, offered as an amendment, that the House having seen with regret the failure of the Vienna Conference, it will continue to give every support to endeavor the war until an honorable peace be obtained.

Sir Wm. Heathcote moved to alter the amendments by inserting the words, "and still cherish a desire that the communication in progress may arrive at that successful issue."

Mr Gladstone approved of the amendment of Mr. Heathcote.

D'Israeli and his supporters lashed the Government, especially Lords Palmerston and Russell.

Lord John Russell replied, defending his conduct at Vienna, when the debate was adjourned.

The debate was resumed on Friday evening, when the House divided, the vote being 310 in favor of D'Israeli's motion and 319 against it—a majority of 109 for the Government.

LIVERPOOL COTTON MARKET.—The week's business is the largest on record. Brown, Shipley & Co say: Since the departure of the last steamer there has been much excitement in Cotton—the business of the week reaching the unprecedented quantity of 153,000 bales, including 76,000 on speculation, and 7,000 for export, at an advance of fully a farthing on low and middling, and an advance on higher qualities of American. Fair Orleans 6¾; Middling 6⅜; Fair Mobile, 6¾; Middling 6 to 6 1-16; Fair Orleans, 6¾; Middling 5 15-16 to 6; Ordinary to good Ordinary, 6¼ to 6¾; Inferior 4 to 5¾. The sales on Friday, 25th, were 10,000 bales, one-half to the trade, closing very steady, but with less animation.

The first case in money, and the large purchases of the trade, who, on their part, have obtained an equivalent advance on yarns and goods, have given a confidence to operators, and it would not surprise us to see yet higher prices, although it appears scarcely probable that the trade, who are now wait in stock, will continue to take speculators with the same determination as has been apparent in the past week. Stock—569,000 bales, including 359,000 bales American.

Later.—Saturday, 27th, 3 P. M.—Cotton, to-day, is good demand. Sales (only 23,000 bales) at extreme quotations.

STATE OF TRADE—MANCHESTER.—The markets have been a good deal excited. Producers asked very high rates, which checked business, but where moderation was shown, buyers purchased pretty freely.

LONDON MONEY MARKET.—The money market continued abundantly supplied at very easy rates, &c. Consols steady. Deposits closed at 91¾ account; 90 money; dollars 4s 2d half penny; bar 4s 10½ d; doubloons, 76s. 3d.; ounce 76s. 2d. half-penny. Bullion in bank has increased £562,000. The payment of the two and a half millions loan on the new loan on the 22d, had no effect on the market.

Saturday, 26th.—Funds ¼ per cent. higher from the results of the ministerial debate. Consols closed to-day at 91¾.

AMERICAN STOCKS.—Hughes & Dever, London, report unchanged, but from the firmness of holders of State stocks, transactions had been chiefly in railways.

The Natchez Courier of Thursday last says:

We never had any weather more pleasant during the first summer month than we are at present experiencing. A cool breeze greets us by day and by night, while there is at present a prospect of another rain. The health of the city is now considered extremely good, no cases of severe sickness occurring and the excitement relative to cholera having entirely passed away.

The Hinds County Gazette of the 9th says:

Since our issue of last week, refreshing showers have visited our country throughout its ample extent. In some portions they have been copious—all seasonable, for the time, for the growing crops. Our own immediate vicinity, however, has been less favored, and the shower we have to-day will be hailed with joy. In view of the parched and dried up condition of the earth, to be anything like satisfactory we believe we may say that we still need rain, and that too in copious doses.

Col. Jefferson Davis arrived at Jackson on the 24th inst.

The Flag of the Union says:

He was formally received by his Excellency, Gov. McRae, in the evening, at the Hall of the House of Representatives, in a neat speech, before a large company of ladies and gentlemen, to which the colonel responded in his usual felicitous manner, in which, at such a social gathering, the subject of politics was with much propriety omitted.

Col. Davis looks to be in feeble [illegible] since the cares of office were making inroads upon his right frame; but as he now treads the soil of his native State, it is to be hoped that he shall recuperate, and return to his arduous duties in the federal city improved in health and renewed in energy.

The Port Gibson Herald of Friday last states that there have been many fatal cases of cholera at Fort Adams and on the plantations near that place. The disease was thought to be rapidly increasing.

The Flag of the Union says of the Democratic Convention which met at Jackson on the 4th inst:

The Democratic State Convention which assembled on Monday at the capitol, performed the object of its meeting by nominating the gentlemen now in commission for re-election, with the new feature of substituting for the office of Chancery Clerk, J. F. Simms, Esq., the present incumbent. A district convention for this (5th) district was also held at the same time and place, which nominated O. R. Singleton for re-election to Congress. Forty counties out of the sixty comprising the State were represented in convention, of which nine were by proxy.

MOBILE.—The Register, of Saturday last, [illegible] the following paragraphs:

The steamer P. Delmas arrived yesterday morning from Demopolis, with one of the largest loads of cotton received during the season—1,865 bales. The Delmas reports it at the river had fallen six feet at Demopolis, but the hope is indulged that the late rains may have the effect to rise it higher than it has yet been during the season.

The circular says: "The trustees embrace this opportunity to state that since the last meeting of the stockholders, the contract for making the railroad track ready to be laying fallen through, a new contract for that purpose has been entered into by the railroad company with, as it is believed, a responsible party, subject to the subscription of $100 per mile to the stock of the company. The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Christian Advocate.

Terms: $2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1855.

HEALTH.—Improved: for the week closing on Sunday 381 deaths, of which 201 were from Cholera. We don't think this week's report from Cholera will reach 50 deaths.

HARPER.—The June number was laid on our table by McGinnis, 36 Camp st. The leading Editorial of Harper is always worth the price 25 cents.

ARMAGEDDON.—A copy of this book has been laid on our table, and "a few more of the same sort" are to be had of McGinnis.

MAILS.—By the kindness of the late Post Master, Mr. Kendall, and of Mr. Bender, the Clerk, we have completed a new Mail schedule.—Such as the Delta has. Putting the Advocate in bags at the office, and giving them the directest route to subscribers, will improve the regularity and quickness of reception. If your paper is slow or irregular let us know it, and a change may be made for the better.

MARRIAGES.—Something of an epidemic, (very pleasant one) is prevailing among the junior members of the Mississippi Conference.

PAID THE DAMAGES.—The American missionaries whose houses at Shanghai have been damaged and destroyed by the war have been paid for them by the Chinese Government. The Imperial General found it to his advantage to pull down all the bridges and stop the paths near to the city. He therefore told the Consul he would pay for the houses if the missionaries would desert them entirely. This they readily agreed to do. He afterwards tried to avoid payment, but Consul Murphy made him stand to his bargain.

DISCUSSION.—The Macon (Miss.) Beacon says:

"The debate between the Rev. W. P. Harrison, pastor of the M. E. Church of this town, and the Rev. E. H. Lake, Universalist, commenced on Wednesday and closed on Friday night."

Mr Harrison is one of the growing men of the Church, and we predict an honorable and useful future for him. The Beacon sums up:

"Both the reverend gentlemen are men of acknowledged ability, and sustained their respective doctrines with considerable learning and ingenuity. As is always the case, however, in discussions of such a character, a wider difference of opinions results, instead of confirming one opinion or the other in the public mind."

Paul Working at Tents.

THE APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.

The apostle of the Gentiles was happily fitted for that mission by his personal habits. Offering the "unsearchable riches" to a people who would not readily appreciate them, he had often to fall back on his own resources for bread. We dare say St. Paul was an "excellent mechanic," and one of the best tent makers in Achaia. To this circumstance, and his ready independence to minister to his necessities with "these hands," not a few churches owed their planting.

Rev. G. W. Evans, as the minutes show, was appointed to the Bastrop Colored Mission at the last Louisiana Conference. From the Bastrop paper we take this friendly editorial paragraph. We thank you, with all our heart, brother editor, for giving a helping hand to a poor brother preacher who is brave to help himself:

"We call attention to the advertisement of our highly esteemed friend, Rev. G. W. Evans, who has opened a shop opposite the livery stable for the purpose of carrying on blacksmithing. He is a most excellent mechanic, and we think we can assert, without fear of contradiction, that he is the best farrier in North Louisiana. We bespeak for the reverend a liberal share of the public patronage. Give him a call, his charges are very moderate."

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

TEN DOLLARS!

The distribution over the land of small, cheap publications of a moral and religious character, to be read by the million, to countenance domestic virtue, is an enterprise worthy the age, the land, and the nation. It is truly Christian, truly American, confers blessings well as the hands of the liberal and good. It is probably impracticable to make a better investment of ten dollars.

In reply to the receipt of that sum, the agent will convey to the donor five dollars worth of valuable books, tracts or tract volumes, at cost prices, and return his grateful acknowledgements in the name of the Tract Society of the M. E. Church South.

"Organ of a Righteous People."

A Compliment to Our Subscribers.

The Southern Standard, a Roman Catholic organ, published in this city, paid us its first visit last week. It is published every Sunday morning. The Journal is dead, as the Catholic Messenger before it. This is their third organ started here since the Advocate's. Yet here is the seat of the Archbishop and the centre of the Archdiocese. Sixty-five thousand are claimed in New Orleans alone, as belonging to the Catholic Church.

The Freeman's Journal, organ of Archbishop Hughes, and published in the Archdiocese of New York, has given notice of probable discontinuance for want of material aid.

The editor says: "We owe money which we must pay; and to be honest ourselves in large sums, our subscribers must be honest in small sums."

A New Orleans paper, (Orleanian, June 8.) remarking on the above, pays a compliment to the Methodists:

"Therefore should the subscribers promptly and righteously pay up; for, as Catholics, they are better instructed, and to cheat the printer is a grievous fraud. How different the conduct of other religionists. In New Orleans the Methodists have a periodical which is said to be the best patronized in the city, and has the largest circulation. It is the organ of a righteous people, for the essence of all righteousness consists in guarding well the rights of editors and proprietors."

We will not decline that compliment to our subscribers; although our books might not apply it to every one of them. A pleasant work it is to be the organ of a righteous people. If a goodly number of this sort, who forget not even small matters, had not sustained this "organ," it would have been in limbo with the Messenger, Journal, &c.

We are sending out accounts. The last two or three months would have been inauspicious for this, inasmuch as many were gloomy in their calculations. Now their prospects are brightened, we hope they will brighten ours.

We have taken pains to make them accurate, and believe they are so.

The Nashville Advocate, speaking to a point whereon subscribers question, if at all, the correctness of accounts, says:

"It more frequently happens, however, that brethren think they are in advance, when, indeed they are in arrears. A case: A brother called at the office, a few days since, and stated that he had paid in advance. We immediately turned to the books, and found that he began his subscription, say January, 1852, and paid in March, 1852; in October, 1853; and again in November, 1854; thus, in three years he had gained nearly a whole year, yet paying once in each year, but failing to pay once in every twelve months. Hundreds have paid, as they suppose, in advance, when, indeed, they have fallen behind little by little, until they are in arrears."

The Charleston Advocate discusses another difficulty, and we avail ourselves of its statement: the case of those who intended to give, or thought they gave, or have given notice of discontinuance to the agent or postmaster, and the notification has never reached the office:

"They have taken it from the office and read it, and have had all the benefit they would have had if they had been paying for it. Now, is it right that the office should lose the money, or that they should pay it? The question does not seem difficult to an honest man."

The preachers will doubtless oblige those whose accounts with the Advocate are in their hands to appriss them of it at the earliest day. Let us bear the banner the Orleanian describes—"Organ of a righteous people."

Hon. W. T. Colquitt.

Rev. Wm. F. Samford writes for the South Christian Advocate an able and appreciative biographical notice of "this honored son" of the State of Georgia, who died May 7, 1855. Impulsive, earnest, sincere; possessed of wit and humor; of quick mental perceptions, and gifted as a popular orator, Judge Colquitt affected the public mind of Georgia profoundly and permanently. It required the strongest moral purpose to stand where he stood. We extract the following, as a distinctly drawn and noble feature of the Christian—as civilian, politician and jurist:

"In 1824 he was converted, and joined the M. E. Church, in which he became a local preacher. He would never take orders, and so assume all the responsibilities of the ministerial office. He steadily refused through his whole life to receive ordination. He became and continued a mere licentiate to preach the gospel, at the urgent solicitation of his brethren, and because, as he said, he felt it a duty on all proper occasions to vindicate the claims of religion, a duty which he was disposed to discharge, with or without license. Thousands are alive who have seen him in the camp meeting pulpit, humbly laying all his honors at the feet of Jesus, earnestly, eloquently, powerfully pleading the cause of the crucified Saviour. He was active in the labors of this altar, and often shouted the praises of the Redeemer aloud in the congregation. The distinguishing traits of his Christian character were, a bright and unwavering faith, that no clouds could dim, a zeal that no waters could quench, a joy that mocked at the toils and persecutions of earth, a pure, precious, priceless pearl of Christian charity, that the bitter, brimful, burning cup of partizan prejudice could not dissolve. From the day of his conversion to the day of death he seemed never to doubt either the resources and promises of the gospel, or his own individual interest in them.

He was often a member of the State Legislature; in early manhood was elected one of the judges of the Superior Court of Georgia, then the highest judicatories in the State; and afterwards represented the State with ability in both branches of the National Legislature. He opened his courts with prayer, and Sir Matthew Hale himself did not better define, by his illustrious example, the character of a Christian judge than did Judge Colquitt. While a member of Congress, he was regular in his attendance upon the services of the sanctuary, often preached in the Methodist Church in Washington city to audiences deeply impressed, and on one occasion ex-President Adams met him, with streaming eyes, as he descended from the pulpit, and, grasping him with both hands, thanked him for the sermon."

The Churches.

M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH.—Rev. B. T. Crouch writes a candid and not very sanguine letter to the Memphis Advocate, concerning the Pacific Conference. His forebodings were previous to Bishop Andrew's visit. Our advices, since the close of Conference, give encouragement. The Bishop's wise counsels and efficient help have been inspiring. On one point we are, and for some time have been of the same opinion, broached by him thus:

"The word 'South' (a very good word in its place, and not at all offensive to me at any time) is, unfortunately, suggestive of sectionalism; and the fact that it is appended to the name of our Church induces many to believe that we are a sectional Church. However unwarrantable this may be, it is unavoidable as long as it is a part of the name of our Church. For the word 'South' has an American and conventional significance, that inevitably, on account of the morbid sensibility of the public mind, suggests the subject of slavery. And I fear that it will ever be the case that where both divisions of the Methodist family exist in the same territory, as distinct organizations, that one will be regarded as a proslavery and the other an ultra anti-slavery or abolition Church by a large proportion of the unreflecting. Much as this may be deprecated, mortifying and unfortunate as it certainly is in this matter, a large proportion of the masses will believe without evidence and jump to this conclusion. And while things are as they are now, we cannot correct and control a misguided public sentiment, born in ignorance and fostered and inflamed by prejudice. I have been reluctant to yield to this conviction, and only submit now because I am compelled by the resistless testimony of facts, learned from personal observation and experience in California."

True. And not only is prejudice created doing mutual injustice to both sections of the Church, but operations are circumscribed. The name "Cumberland" has kept an evangelical body of Presbyterians in one valley, and always will. The Northern division is known as the "M. E. Church in the United States." Why should not dare he the "M. E. Church in America?"

The papers state that Bishop Andrew will start from California for home the last of June. We should be as glad to see the good Bishop as our father; but do not see the use of the Church sending out one of her ablest superintendents, at much cost of money and time, merely to moderate the Conference, make the appointments and return. Especially so as no conferences are to be held for some time in the old States, and the young Conference on the Pacific is in need of all the aid it can get.

M. E. CHURCH, NORTH.—The New York Conference tells out its estimate of a practice not continued to their latitude:

"Whereas, it appears that the practice of reading sermons in the pulpit, instead of extemporaneous preaching, is beginning to prevail in some parts of our work; and whereas we believe that this practice tends to weaken the force of our ministry, and render it less effective and useful: therefore—

Resolved, That this Conference look with deep regret upon the introduction of this practice, and express our disapproval of it as an injurious invention, and recommend to all our ministers the abandonment of this practice, and the continuance of the method pursued so successfully by our fathers, of extemporaneous preaching."

PRESBYTERIAN.—The (O. S.) Annual Assembly lately adjourned its session in Nashville. It was composed of 145 ministers and 99 ruling elders, representing the Presbyterian Church in 28 different States, Maine, Florida and California being unrepresented.

Last year's Minutes report a membership of 525,404 in 2 976 churches, and 2,203 ministers. Presbyteries, 146, covering territory in every State except Maine, in which there is not a Presbyterian Church. Two of these 146 lie in China, and three in North India.

The Domestic Mission Board report 525 missionaries employed last year. Amount appropriated, $74,494.

Much was said on the mode and means of Church extension; whether by a Board, incorporated and permanent, to raise and disburse large sums in building meeting-houses, or by a committee, with less organic power, or by enlarging the functions of the Board of Domestic Missions. We are at a loss to account for the earnestness displayed in this debate for several days. All were agreed as to the thing to be done; but how to do it? Said an opponent of the Board:

"The question was, whether we should take the $100 000 proposed to be raised and build 100 houses, or take it and send out 200 preachers. Where is the use of a house without a preacher? You are reversing the old order, where the minister made the church, and the church made the house. You propose to build the house, and see if the house wont build the church. The children ask for bread, and you give them a stone—it may be wood, but the principle is all the same."

On the other hand, Dr. Rice, the Moderator, advocates the distinct house-putting-up organization:

"He favored Church extension, as a good church edifice will be the means of making a church self-supporting, in half the time otherwise. A man who will give $50 to a pastor in a good church, will not give anything, perhaps, to go to a court-house. He does not wish to go there at all. He (Dr. Rice) had preached in court-houses, but as often as he did so he wished never to have to preach again in such a place. A court-house is the meanest place in the world for a man to be converted in. We therefore want something. We need a Board or a Committee, he cared not about the name."

The Assembly finally established in St. Louis a Committee of Church Extension. The Committee, so far as we can see, is clothed with the full authority of a Board, but is not to receive the title.

The question as to who was entitled to vote for a pastor was largely discussed, and widely varying opinions expressed in reference to it, and then the whole subject was laid on the table, without any decision on it.

So important a point would seem to have deserved a definite enunciation of principle and practice. Some were for communicants only voting; others, all baptized members of the congregation; others, all pew-holders; and it appears that in different places all these practices obtain. Dr. Plumer gave a case in which the pastor—an evangelical man—had been ousted by members of his congregation not communicants. They did not relish his style.

An interrogatory came up for settlement—viz:

"Whether, when a pastor and congregation agree upon the salary of the former, it is competent for the Presbytery to refuse to install upon the ground that the salary is inadequate?"

The committee to whom it was referred reported affirmatively.

Judge Banks opposed the report, denying the right of the Presbytery to so interfere between pastor and people. He would acknowledge no such sentiment in this country.

Dr. Boardman, the previous Moderator, said it was only necessary to read the law on the subject, which showed the whole subject to be in the hands of the Presbytery. The position of Judge Banks was very good Congregationalism, but not good Presbyterianism.

The report of the committee was adopted.

Resolutions were adopted endorsing and cordially approving the effort by the Presbytery of New Castle for the establishment of a school for the thorough classical education of colored young men of piety, with a view of fitting them for the work of the ministry, and for preaching among the destitute colored population of this country and Africa.

The Board of Publication published during the year (April, 1854-55) 37 new books, of which 84,750 copies have been printed; 8 new tracts, of which they have printed 23,000 copies.

Spece of trouble passed over the sky as the delegates of New England Associations, with whom the Assembly is in correspondence, made their speeches. All of them lectured the body on its duty as to slavery. So much is this privilege of "correspondence" abused this way, discontinuance of relations is thought of.

The NEW SCHOOL Assembly met simultaneously in St. Louis. They profess a jealousy of the ecclesiasticism of the O. S. body. The N. S. call their Boards Committees, and the O. S. call their Committees Boards. This Assembly established in Philadelphia a Church Extension Committee, with a view to the more vigorous prosecution of domestic missions. This is the initial step to separation from the Congregationalists in sustaining the A. H. M. Society. It is fortunate for both these bodies that they have little or no interests in the New England States. It would be well for our National Union if there were a landslide from Sandy Hook to the St. Lawrence.

Methodism would this day have been one in America but for its New England extension. Jesse Lee broke up sorry ground there. Some wheat it produces, but more tares.

BAPTIST.—The Journals of the denomination have about completed the history of the biennial May Convention in Montgomery, Ala. It embraces (like the M. E. Church, South) the slave States all. Able men took part in the proceedings; men who would be peers in any house, civil or ecclesiastical. Lack of inducement or deficiency in the system of representation made it very unequal. There were no delegates present from Texas, Arkansas or Missouri. The 40,000 Baptists in North Caroline only furnished one. Alabama, in which State the Convention was held, furnished a large proportion of the list, Georgia was also well represented. Virginia sent twenty, and South Carolina nearly the same number. Eleven States and the District of Columbia were represented.

Indian Mission operations on the part of Southern Baptists, heretofore conducted by an association, will hereafter be conducted by the Convention. A committee was appointed to take into consideration the expediency of establishing a general theological institution for the Baptist denomination in the Southern States.

A meeting on this subject was held, in which it was—

"Resolved, That a Convention be called of those favorable to this object, to meet at Augusta, Ga., on the Wednesday after the fourth Sabbath in April, 1856, and that the committee above named take measures to secure, if possible, the attendance of representatives from our various colleges, educational societies and conventions."

For Foreign Missions, $86 274 48 had been collected, and $31,549 11 expended, leaving a balance in the treasury of $4,725 33. The report represents the Foreign Missions of the Convention to be in a prosperous and encouraging condition. It was—

"Resolved, That the Board of Domestic Missions be instructed to occupy Kansas as a field of missions, as soon as practicable."

The publishing interests are located in Charleston, and though small in capital, is active, and measures were taken to increase the capital to $25,000.

Rev. Mr. Roberts, of Tae-ping-wang notoriety, was thrown overboard. This man made a great blow about his having taught the rebel chief of China. All moonshine.

The Convention refused to grant its meeting-house for a "Bible Revision meeting;" they would not commit the body to the measure. Still a Revision meeting was held, and well attended. We regret to see the discord this is introducing among the Baptist brethren.

The Richmond Religious Herald, of May 10, in an article on the "Revision Movement," says that it exhorbenges with all the Baptist papers in the United States, one excepted, and that the Baptist journals of the East and Middle States are almost without exception opposed to the revision of the Bible, as urged by "certain nineteenth century reformers."

A motion of the Hon. W. P. Chilton, which offered seats in the Convention, as witnesses, to the evangelical ministers of every orthodox denomination, created long and warm discussion. The plain issue was made, with some complication, however, which affected the vote, whether Pedobaptist ministers were to be recognized. The High Church party, of whom Mr. Graves, of the Tennessee Baptist, is leader, opposed fraternization; but there was too much solid piety and largeness of soul in the Convention for such narrow views to be entertained. Judge Chilton's motion, with some amendments, prevailed.

Mr. Graves thus comments:

"We say, in view of all the uncommon efforts put forth to crush the advocates of scriptural consistency and simplicity, and put a quietus upon the question henceforth in the South, they only carried their end by a bare majority! Gaining only a bare majority of forty six in the Southern Baptist Convention, in which, not two years ago, not a dissenting voice was heard! This is an instance of a rapid change in sentiment that is unexampled in the history of a religious people! We regard the result of that debate as a triumphant victory in favor of old landmark principles. It is evident that the Southern Convention has invited Pedobaptist and Campbellite preachers to seats in their body, as gospel ministers, for the last time, and for this hope we bless God."

The editor of the Southwestern Baptist, Tuskegee, Ala., holds similar language. He evidently regrets that the courtesy was extended at all, even by a small majority:

"No Pedobaptist would ever take a seat against so large a minority. Disguise it as we may, an affirmative vote on such a resolution amounts to this: To respect the feelings of Pedobaptists more than the conscientious scruples of Baptists. It is to be hoped then, that the recent large minority has settled this question forever, and that it will not again be introduced."

As for Mr. Graves, he is past hope—without respect in the world or confidence in his own denomination. But to find our neighbor of Tuskegee tracking after such a file leader does pain and surprise us. The Baptists of Alabama are a numerous, intelligent and excellent people. We covet their good neighborhood and friendly co-operation with our own and other Churches. There is a great work to do, and the Christians there have influence, numbers, wealth on their side. But if such firebrands are he thrown in among them as that brandished here by Rev. Messrs. Graves and Henderson; if they are to be poisoned in their charities and taught to hold each other off at Jew and Gentile distance; then, we say, we should not like to be the editor that helped to do it.

The Southern Baptist, 6th inst., a high-toned religious journal, of Charleston, S. C., treats the matter differently, giving us more truth and love. The editor says:

"We are constrained, by a sense of justice and a love of truth, to set this matter right, now once for all, in order that the Baptist denomination may not be misrepresented."

After giving the extract above from the Tennessee Baptist:

"The first error is, that the vote of the Convention was a "bare majority," and further on it is called "a bare majority of forty-six." The truth is that the majority was fifty-six, and not forty-six. The majority declared by the Moderator was 99 to 43. And this we personally and experimentally know was the true vote. * * * The resolutions proposed by Judge Chilton were modified by amendments which raised several issues and complications, aside from the simple question as to the original intention of courtesy and good neighborhood as towards Pedobaptists; and this was the real ground of the minority vote being anything nearly as large as it was. As to the so-called "old landmark principle" of disowning all Christian and ministerial recognition of pious people and preachers of other orders, we are sure that not twenty votes could have been found in the Convention if the issue had been on that bare question."

The trophies taken by the English in the present war with Russia are very few, but they make the most of them. We see that there is on exhibition in a museum in Dublin, Prince Menschikoff's coat, captured in his carriage after the battle of Alma, and the keys of the fortress of Bomereund.

BOYING LAND WARRANTS.—An offinor of the Department of the Interior inquires whether the recent circular issued by the Secretary of the Interior, reprobating the practice of speculating in land warrants by officers of the government, will preclude him from purchasing one or two land warrants to locate for his own benefit. In reply he was informed that a fair and legitimate investment is not regarded in the character of speculation, which implies buying and selling, and is, therefore, not inhibited.

Some grave and twaddling gentleman thinks (in the Journal of Commerce) that "it is thus sportsmen had done killing fish for enjoyment." This rouses the wrath of a piscatorial gentleman, who eases his mind as follows:

"In the name of sense, man, if God made fish to be eaten, what differences does it make if I enjoy the killing of them before I eat them? You would have none but a fisherman by trade do it, and then you would have him utter a prayer, and a pious salutation at each cod or halibut that he killed; and if by chance the old fellow sitting in the boat at his work, should for a moment think there was, after all, a little fun and a little pleasure in his business, you would have him take a round turn with his line and drop on his knees to ask forgiveness for the sin of thinking there was fun in fishing."

A SHOWER OF FROGS.—One of our subscribers informs us that about 5 o'clock yesterday morning, when in the cars on the Hamilton and Dayton Road, there was quite a heavy shower when near the Middleton station, at which place the cars were stopped for several minutes. On going outside it was perceived that the ground was completely covered with little frogs or toads about one inch long, which had evidently been rained upon the earth; and strange to say, they appeared all to be alive and kicking. HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

GREENWELL SPRINGS, LA., June 11, 1855.

Four weeks since, a new church frame was dedicated in the name of the M. E. Church South, to the worship of God. The house is situated two miles from this place, on or near Sandy Creek. It is large enough for the congregation; seats, pulpit and altar well arranged. You have no more comfortable pews in New Orleans than are placed in this house. It occupies a knoll in one of the loveliest groves you ever saw. A fine spring about fifty yards below. Brother Thomas Price is in charge of the Circuit, Miss. Con., and at the time of dedication was assisted by Bro. Early, of Livingston, and a local preacher. The congregation on Sabbath was large; Bro. Price administered Baptism before and the Supper after the sermon, which was preached by the local brother, and Bro. Early preached in the afternoon to an interested congregation.

The result of the meeting, six accessions to the Church, all, or nearly so, heads of families. We have preaching every two weeks. Yesterday, Bro. Price preached again; received five more accessions; again, heads of families with one exception. I like to see husbands and wives walk up together and join the Church, as was the case yesterday. They have talked the matter over at home.

The house is paid for, so, should you ever pass this way to preach, you need not fear the Sheriff's closing the door. There are no wealthy people here, all are considered poor, and I'll tell you how they built their house: they never had a Church in the neighborhood before, and some two or three determined to have one. There was only one male member of the Church, Isaiah Tucker, he took the subscription, got 1, 2, 5, 10, 15 dollar subscriptions, only one person giving more than the latter sum; he then took subscriptions for hauling lumber,—17 miles; some 1, some 2, some 4 loads; when all was ready, a neighbor hired a carpenter, and undertook the contract, at just enough to pay. One or two gentlemen furnished 17 pair window sash, glass, etc., all in. The result—the gentleman who took the contract, joined the Church the day it was dedicated; his wife already a member; three or four neighbors joined with him; yesterday, his brother and wife came up together, and all had a happy time.

Three of the gentlemen who joined, have been subscribers to the N. O. Advocate for more than a year, and I know paid in advance. Now Sir, any neighborhood in the State, can build a most comfortable Church, by pursuing the course of these people. If there are one or two refractory ones—who will not help—who must have a free church, just let them alone,—four or five neighbors working harmoniously, can do more than twenty pulling any way.

As the Advocate was here a year before the Church, I would suggest it as a pretty good pioneer for a good country Church.

Yours,

W. H. CRENSHAW.

MT. ZION CIRCUIT, ALA. CON.

Our Second Quarterly meeting is over, the year is half gone; the harvest will soon be past, the Summer ended; and who will or will not be saved? We had an interesting meeting on Sabbath. The congregation listened to the ministry of the Word, with great earnestness; the whole assembly at the close of preaching, was suffused in tears; and when an invitation for mourners was given, though the house was crowded, yet many made their way, tramblingly, to the alter of prayer; others knelt, on request, in the congregation. After prayer, three joined the Church, and then the Sacrament was attended to, and never did we see the people of God more ready and eager to partake of the emblems of the broken body, and shed blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, thereby shewing forth his death till he come again; it could but remind us of that joyful communion around the table of the Lord, when we shall drink the wine anew in our Father's kingdom.—Many souls left the Church exulting doubtless, in that sweet promise, "They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength, etc." Wheat harvest is on hand, and we could not protract the meeting; we trust, however, lasting good has been effected.

The long drought in these parts has ceased; we have had fine rains all around my work. The growing crops are promising. Wheat has been much injured, in places, by winds and hail. The people generally, seem much more cheerful since the rains. O, that the goodness of the Lord might lead men to repentance.

Rev. L. J. Schoolar, writes from the neighborhood of Columbus, Mi., 11th inst.:

Will the friends of Zion pray for us. I feel restless until I see the arm of God made bare, and his power revealed in the eyes of the people, that in the day of eternity we may see that our labors have not been in vain in the Lord.

In reference to the prospect for missionary collections; I intend to begin my operations in the month of July, but how I shall succeed I cannot tell as yet.

The pressure of the times, occasioned by the short crop last year, and the absence of sufficient river to carry off what was made, will prove a serious barrier to my success, but I will do the very best I can, hoping that the great missionary cause will be regarded as the work of the Lord, and that debt paid before the extravagancies of life are indulged in.

MIDWAY, ALA., JUNE 4, 1855.

We have recently had good times on Bibour Circuit, at Spring Hill. At one of our regular appointments, six joined the Church. And such interest was manifested, that we had Church at night.

The meeting was kept up for two weeks and at the close, forty six had joined, and about the same number professed conversion. Six have joined since. Nearly all of the converts are grown, and some old. Brethren from the itenerent and local ranks gave us much help. Pray for us.

"H. P."—ARMAGEDDON.

Mr. Editor.—Your unassuming correspondent, "H. P.," deserves a pleasant compliment for his modest notice of Armegeddon, together with his ex-cathedra condemnation of the Tennessee Conference, the book agents, the ignorant public, and all others concerned. It is rare to meet with such a pearl, in even a world full of oyster-shells, or to get sight of such a shining lump of ore, this side of El Dorado. Armageddon, as a true theory, is based upon the veritable premise by which all obscure prophecies relating to primitive Christianity are shown to be realized. It has been most critically examined by quite a number of distinguished theologians and jurists, and pronounced to be logically correct so far as it relates to our country. The Tennessee Conference recommended it to the people, the book agents have engaged in its sale, and thousands believe it to be a judicious exposition of prophecy. But notwithstanding all this array of numbers, intellect and scholarship, common sense and piety, H. P. tells us, in substance, that the theory is an unparalleled burlesque on biblical exposition, a reproach to the Tennessee Conference and that the book agents and the people who receive and endorse the book are a set of stultified fools. A la Jupiter Tonans, he assumes to possess more intelligence, more sense, learning, critical acumen and piety than the whole Tennessee Conference, the book agents, jurists, statesmen, scholars, and the public combined; He sits upon Olympus

"Assumes the god, affects to nod,
And seems to shake the spheres."

A modest Jupiter is this H. P.; entirely free from lordliks nod patronizing airs. Solomon had wisdom, the Pope has arrogance, as Delphi was oracular, but H. P. has taken the palm from the first, the tiara from the second and the tripod from the Pythoness; and his tacit claims to omniscience will never be jeopardized in future. His glossy mane and voice of melody indicate him a lion of the tribe, nor do pluming auriculars disclose the secret respecting his apparel. He is simply a modest lion—a natural one. His article suggests his affiliation, by blood or association with certain chaps who, on a certain 8th of January, were entertained by Gen. Jackson near New Orleans, with "Hail Columbia" and politely escorted out of the country to the music of "Yankee Doodle." Without proof or provocation, H. P. has made grave charges against a large body of dignified and learned ministers and gentlemen, and is liable to be denounced as a reckless "accuser of the brethren."

A more supercilious, dogmatic, ex cathedra, egotistic, arrogant, presuming and subjective decretal of vanity than that of H. P. rarely to be met with. Is he a youth whose brains have time to harden? Is he an oracle? Let him show some sense. Is he a lion? Let him exhibit less of the soliped.

Gen McCauley's Instructions.

In consequence of the many idle speculations [illegible] Instructions given to Com. McCauley by the Navy Department, when placing him in command of the squadron, the Union publishes them in full. We give the following extract, which contains the whole substance of the document:

Recent events in Cuba, and on the high seas in the vicinity of that island, are of a character calculated not merely to attract attention and excite the solicitude of this Government, but to call for constant vigilance on your part, in order that the rights of our country and the interests of our commerce may be neither compromised nor carelessly disregarded. It is hardly necessary that I should undertake to recite with particularity the circumstances which are worthy of your attention, but I deem it proper to call your attention to the conduct of the commander of the Spanish frigate Mariana in firing at the United States mail steamer "Dorado," and subjecting that vessel to delay, violence and search about eight miles from Cape San Antonio—occurrence which, if approved by the Spanish authorities, is likely to disturb the friendly relations between the two Governments, and a course of proceeding which, if persisted in, cannot but provoke collision.

I need not remind you, Commodore, that the right of visitation or search of our vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, the existence of which the United States have never refused to recognise, and the exercise of which they have often enforced even after refusing to tolerate.

The President instructs me to say to you that the officer in command of a ship of war in the present case committed an outrage of the character hereinbefore mentioned in firing upon and subjecting to delay, violence and search about eight miles from Cape San Antonio—an

Deaths.

Another faithful child of God has been removed to the Paradise above. With sadness we are called upon to record the death of our much beloved sister, SUSAN W. PAYNE, who departed this life May 27, 1855, after a lingering and painful illness, aged about 55. The deceased has long been a faithful and devoted Christian. For attention to the afflicted she was unsurpassed by any, and endeared to herself by the strongest ties those among whom she resided. Calmly and sweetly her happy spirit winged its way to the saints' everlasting rest. G. A. S.

DIED—In Clayton, Ala., May 24th, 1855, Mrs. JULIA A. TALLEY, wife of Rev. G. R. Talley, of the Alabama Conference, in her 37th year. She embraced religion in early life, and joined the M. E. Church. Only six months since she entered upon the toilsome and responsible relation of an itinerant preacher's wife.

DIED—In Madison, Ga., May 13th, Miss REBECCA J. KEY, daughter of Rev. C. W. Key, in her 16th year.

DIED—In the parish of West Feliciana, La., April 5, of scarlet fever, Mrs. JANE WALSH, in the 23d year of her age.

Sister W. was retiring in her manners, and showed to the world but little of that devotion to God which characterized her more private habits. She joined the M. E. Church at an early age, and lived a consistent member to the time of her death. She was not able to tell the place where, nor the time when she was converted, but years before death professed the "forgiveness of sins."

DEMOCRACY IN EUROPE.

The celebrated work of M. De Tocqueville concerning "Democracy in America," bids fair ere long to want a companion and counterpart treating of "Democracy in Europe." The signs of the times are all inscribed with the coming event and every nerve in the political world points to its speedy appearance. The learned Frenchman who made the constitution government and institutions of this country the objects of his researches and reflections, would more nearly have touched the truth had he spoken of Republicanism rather than Democracy in America. The writer concerning Europe can justly designate his work, however, only as a history of democracy—a democracy not so pure, perhaps, nor so complete as that of Athens, but approximating more closely to a form of government in which the supreme power is lodged in the hands of the people collectively, than to a commonwealth, like our own, where the sovereignty is exercised by representatives. The change to take place in England will probably be less notable and less extended than in other European countries, and some form of limited and imperfect republicanism may be grafted on or super-imposed upon the present anomalous mixture of monarchy, aristocracy, democracy and representation. The political movements and revolutions of that country have always been of a guarded character. Great changes have taken place in her government at different times, but always in a cautious and conservative manner—always with brakes and machinery to prevent too high a velocity from being acquired.

Such, however, is not the case with other countries where political changes are sudden and radical, from the extremest despotism to the extremest democracy, from the unlimited rule of one man to the unbridled control of all monsover. In these latter nations, when the element that has been so long fermenting and only kept down by the pike, the bayonet and the guillotine, breaks out and becomes supreme, there is reason to believe that the strange liberty acquired will operate upon its possessors like strong wine, and that under its influence the monarchies now existing will all crumble to dust. Of the republican element in England, we have already spoken, with a notice of the various and unmistakable signs which betray its presence. The democratic tendencies of other countries are less marked and apparent, but are nevertheless perceptible enough to those who look for them, while the results that may be, can be easily judged from the sentiment that is. In France, where the will of one man—an adventurer, a child of chance, a political waif and estray—is as omnipotent as that of the Great Czar in Russia, and when from the imperial palace the declaration of Louis, "I am France," is re-enunciated by constantly recurring acts of absolutism as decided as those of Charles Martel or Charlemagne, there is a growing feeling in favor of democracy; not such an imperfect democracy as the ons which Lamartine headed and Hugo defended, nor such an excessive one as Robespierre, Murat and Danton were elevated by, but a democracy that Kings cannot crush nor Presidents over-ride—a democracy that is democratic. This sentiment, checked and curbed as it is by the imperial power, continually displays itself, sometimes in rabid red-republican clubs and radical gatherings, sometimes in literature and sometimes in attempted assassinations. As Victor Hugo says, it only bides its time and that time draws steadily nearer. If Louis Napoleon were to-morrow taken off, the revolution would come to-morrow, and neither the empire nor the dynasty of the Orleans family would find favor in its sight. What bounds and limits it might have cannot be told, but it would be supreme.

The same sentiment is alive all over Italy, even with French and Austrian bayonets at its neck and Mazzini and Garibaldi and it strong enough to nourish a hope for coming success. Kossuth yet preaches the renewal nationality of Hungary, but it is a nationality without Kings—a nationality of the people. In Spain, the movements of the last revolt under Espartero and O'Donnell, only checked in its progress by the ignorance of the people and the popularity of the leaders, shows how far the sentiment has spread in the Kingdom of Castile and Arragon, and how little is needed to overthrow and annihilate the existing government. Austria and Germany are confessedly on the verge of a great popular revolution which may any time take place, and which, taking place, will be surely successful and permanent, for there the people are more intelligent and have more definite ends in view than on any other nation. Thus, all over Europe the democratic element—not well nor clearly understood, and in many instances wholly misunderstood—has spread and grown until the opportunity alone is wanted to give it birth. When that opportunity comes we shall see much that is strange, crude and incongruous in political economy; hear many theories not to be acknowledged as either sound, feasible or even desirable, and witness some attempts at government-making equally poised between the ridiculous and the rascally. But out of the great chaos of overthrown governments there will doubtless come some results compensating for troubles which gave them birth, and from the ruins of the old will be erected political fabrics fresher, stronger and more symmetrical, better adapted to the welfare of the people and the progress of the world, than those rotten and moss-grown creations of the middle ages that now totter under the weight of their own incompetency. These coming events, that have been so long and so slowly ripening, have received new vitality from the great struggle that is convulsing Europe, and may at almost any moment be announced as born. However remote the day of their advent may be, it is, nevertheless, certain to come. [Crescent.

THE LIQUOR RIOT IN PORTLAND, MAINE.—We received a telegraphic dispatch a few days ago announcing that a riot had occurred in Portland, Maine, in which one man lost his life. It appears that Neal Dow, the Mayor, had purchased $1600 worth of liquor for the City Agency, anticipating that the Council would pass the necessary resolution taking it off his hands. This was neglected by the Council, and the liquor remained his property. Complaint was made against him by several citizens for holding liquor contrary to law, and a warrant of science was issued. The Mayor then called a special meeting of the Council, and a resolution was passed to purchase the liquor for the city. Much indignation was felt, and a mob assembled about the building of the Liquor Agency and attempted to break in for the purpose of destroying the liquor. Two military companies were called out, and at a late hour the mob broke into the building when the military drew up on the opposite side fired a volley, killing Ephraim Robbins of Eastport, second male of the bark Louisa Eaton, of Portland, and wounding several others, some of them seriously. A squad of the Rifle Guard then charged with bayonets and the crowd rapidly dispersed. One old gentleman who was said to be quietly on his way home received a severe bayonet wound.

A few arrests were made. Another man was reported dead on the following morning.

A dispatch of the 4th inst. from Portland says:

The excitement here to-day is intense. Business is almost entirely suspended. A public meeting has been called for the purpose of instituting measures to prosecute those who gave orders last night to fire into the citizens and spend their blood without, as it is alleged, just cause.

NEAL DOW ACQUITTED.—Mayor Dow has been acquitted on the liquor charge. Judge Carter decided that no liquor agency had been established, as no agent had been appointed; but held that the statute did not specify whether it should be purchased before or after the agent is selected; and that as, subsequently, the liquors were turned over to the city, there was no evidence of criminal intent on the part of the Mayor.

THE TURF OF VIOLETS.

Julia S* was a beautiful girl. She had just finished her studies and returned home to receive a splendid birthday party. Early in the morning of this long-looked for day, she arose to gather some flowers before the sun had stolen their freshness, that they might be woven in garlands or grouped in vases to adorn the rooms. "I am to be queen, to-night," she exclaimed aloud, as she passed from flower to flower, "and will choose the fairest of these garden beauties to wear in my hair. I will adopt as my motto, and so obtain the peculiar beauty for which it is most admired, that I may be called Julia the rose, Julia the tulip, or whatever flower I may choose."

Thus talking to herself, she passed among the flowers, culling the fairest and stopping occasionally to catch the kisses of the morning, wafted to her by the gentle zephyrs. Though all were beautiful, none seemed worthy of her special choice. Suddenly she stopped before a marble basin, whence issued a little fountain, and gazed upon the beautiful profusion of flowers that surrounded her. Just at her feet, and almost covered by the long grass, was a turf of deep blue violets, with the flowers imbedded in soft green leaves; the dews of morning yet trembled upon their delicate blossoms, and their perfume arose like an incense of gratitude from the freshened sod. Julia looked upon them and said, "You are winning in your gentle loveliness, sweet flowers of spring, and I would fain resemble you—but other flowers are fairer and perchance as sweet. Won by their superior charms, I might regret my choice, and, neglected, you would wish to hide yourselves amid your leaves. If I find none lovelier, I will return."

"I wish to be loved," continued Julia, "but I must also be admired. Surely there is some other flower which combines the sweetness of the violet with more brilliant charms!" Won by the magnificent hues of a tulip, she stooped to admire it. "Here is a beauty that will attract all beholders," thought she; but as she bent over it, no breath of perfume welcomed her—the splendid flower was void of fragrance. "What avails beauty without sweetness!" she murmured; and, sighing, sought a more perfect flower. The waving mignonette, the brilliant languil, the drooping lily, each in its turn attracted her; but there was in each something which she did not care to imitate, and still she found not what she sought.

Suddenly she paused with a cry of delight, for, bathed in the morning dew, the graceful rose unfolded her rich petals to the sun, and perfumed the air with her breath. "Behold perfection!" she exclaimed, putting forth her hand to cull the tempting flower. But as she clasped the delicate stem, a thorn pierced her finger, and she started in disappointed surprise. "These thorns would pierce the hearts of those who love me," sighed she; "beautiful, yet I dare not choose you as my emblem, for I desire not to attract by loveliness and sweetness, only to wound by hidden stings." Wearied with her fruitless search, she threw herself upon a shaded bank, and thoughtfully compared the varied charms of all the brilliant flowers she had seen. Then she remembered the gentle violets, and eagerly sought the spot where they bloomed. The sun had mounted high in the heavens when she reached the fountain, and saw the turf at her feet. "Fairest and sweetest!" she said, "I have sought in vain amid all the flowers; and there are none like you. I find beauty without sweetness, elegance without gentleness, brilliancy without modesty. You in your gentle loveliness excel all others." She knelt to cull the flowers, but they were withered—unable to bear the heat of the day, they had drooped and faded. Her choice had been too long delayed, and now they would bloom no more: a fading breath of perfume was all that remained to tell of their wasted loveliness and decay.

SUSAN PINDAR.

"THAT'LL DO."

Oh! that expression, "that will do"—why was it ever invented? Who took the mean between half-learned and well-learned, and denominated the expression to be applied to that recitation, "that will do"? Anything must be thoroughly studied, and every portion mastered, or else it will not have received a proper share of attention. "That will do!" Why not "very well?" Because, in truth, it would not apply—would not suit at all; therefore we employ an expression midway between knowledge and ignorance. If it will only do, why not learn it over again? "That will do," plainly intimates that it is far from perfection. Then may it not be applied to aught with which we are connected; let it be one of the by-gones, to be classed with "Don't care," "I can't," etc. Let it take its flight to the regions of boundless space and there abide, leaving "Very well" to occupy its former position. We need assign to ignorence no particular place; it is always near, in close proximity, a constant attendant with whom we must do battle on our way to the field of knowledge. Then let us seek for "Very well" as a reward for each effort, and try to merit its honors. Keep "Very well" and its enemy "That'll do," constantly before your view, and there will be needed no stimulant to exertion. The hopes of the one and the fears of the other will be sufficient to arouse even the most dormant energies.

LUCILLA.

PETITION.

I, a member of the Third Course of the Girls' High School, First District, appeal to you, the honorable Board of Directors of said school, in behalf of its pupils, to supply our teacher with a new desk, for sundry excellent reasons. First of which is, the antiquity of the present desk; secondly, its unprepossessing external and internal appearance; and last, though not least, it having within the last few weeks given unmistakable signs of gradual decay, by its rather rickety sound, thus giving good proof that its understandings are rather weak. Notwithstanding this is an age of progression, it seems that we have not yet advanced far enough to supply our instructresses with a suitable desk; for the one we have now shames this noble institution. Added to this it occupies the most conspicuous position in the room, and in such a place it should not disgrace its fair possessors, which it actually does at present. I hope, gentlemen, you will not permit this subject to drop here, for it is considered by us a weighty matter. Hoping you will take it into consideration, I subscribe myself,

A MEMBER OF THE THIRD COURSE.

MOBILE.—M. Godard made his first balloon ascension from Mobile on the afternoon of Monday last. He rose to the height of about 4,500 feet, and after remaining in the air about fifteen minutes descended near the residence of Mr G. N. Stewart, on the Bay shore, three miles below the city. He was accompanied by one person.

The Register of Thursday last has the following paragraph:

The steamer Eliza arrived yesterday from Gainesville with a list of memoranda on her manifest as long, more or less, as the history of one of Captain Cook's voyages—all interesting news, however, to cotton dealers. The Eliza passed some forty-odd flatboats laden with cotton slowly wending their way to the city. The aggregate amount of their freightage is set down at some 10,000 bales.

FURTHER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE WASHINGTON.

The mail steamship Washington, Captain Cavandy, arrived at New York on the 6th. She left Southampton on the 23d ult. The news is but so late as that brought by the Africa, at Halifax, but the details are four days later than received by the previous steamer, and are highly interesting as affecting the great European question.

Operations have commenced in the Baltic. Revel has been carefully reconnoitered and will shortly be bombarded. The Magicienne has already thrown some shells into the outworks. Admiral Dundas had reconnoitered Sweaborg.

According to the Constantinople papers, all the troops concentrated at the camp at Maslak were about to sail for the Crimea, on board of fourteen ships of war, and an immense fleet of transports with vast supplies of provisions and munitions of war, and the expedition is destined either for Odessa or the Lower Danube.

All the French and nearly all the Sardinian troops had left Constantinople for the Crimea. The cholera had disappeared at Constantinople. Six thousand men were promised at once for the Turkish contingent.

The Trieste papers publish the following dispatch, dated Lupatoria, May 4:

Eight thousand Russians are menacing Omar Pasha. Their cavalry is endeavoring to cut off the allies' communication by land. The bulk of the Russian army, 150,000 strong, having taken up a position near Simpheropol, is in uninterrupted communication with Sebastopol.

A letter from Frankfort of the 17th ult., in the Allgemeine Zeitung, says:

A new Austrian note has just been dispatched to the German States, declaring that Austria remains faithful to the alliance of the Western Powers, but that the Cabinet of Vienna has not given up the hope of seeing peace re-established. It is said that the question of mobilization is again brought forward in this dispatch.

Accounts from St. Petersburg of the 18th announce that Constantsilt is declared in a state of siege. No person can hereafter enter the place without a special permission from the Governor.

The recent new combinations of Russian troops and some newly created commands have led to some changes in the designation of the corps d'armee. The army under the command at Prince Paskewitch will henceforward be called the Army of the West, Prince Gortschakoff's the Army of the South, General Rudiger's the North, and a new corps in the course of formation at Kiess and in Volhynia will be called the Army of the Center.

Letters from Odessa state that the artificers of the dock yards at Nicolaieff are working early and late for the new ships for the Russian Black Sea fleet. Each vessel will have a screw propeller.

It is calculated at Berlin that the addition to the Russian army to be made under the last ukase, will consist of—about 250,000 men. Twelve in a thousand is the ratio, and the levies include the most populous governments in the Empire.

On the 21st instant, a complete elucidation of the views of Austria on the third point of the Vienna negotiation was forwarded to London and Paris.

The London Times of May 23 says: The City of Montreal, which arrived at Liverpool from the United States on Saturday, has on board a cargo of ice for the hospitals at Scutari, whither she will proceed without loss of time.

THE KNOW-NOTHING NATIONAL CONVENTION

We take from the New York Herald the following item concerning the National Know-Nothing or American Council at present sitting in Philadelphia:

FIRST DAY—PROCEEDINGS AND OPINIONS.

PHILADELPHIA, June 5th, 1855.—The Grand National Council of the Americans convened at 10 o'clock this morning, at the Assembly Rooms, corner of Tenth and Chestnut streets.

New York, Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Louisiana, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Iowa, Wisconsin, California, Kentucky, District of Columbia, Missouri and Michigan have sent their full quota.

On the question of the Presidency of the Convention great unanimity pervades the members. No reasonable doubt exists whatever of the re-election of James W. Barker. The entire South and West, as well as the Middle States, are fully entered of his nationality, and will give him a hearty and generous support. New England alone seems disposed to lead the opposition to him—at least a portion of it—and on the ground of his opposition to their peculiar sectionalisms. But one sentiment seems to pervade the minds of the members generally, and that is that the great American party cannot be otherwise than a national party, and that the period has arrived for the full, open and expressed declaration of the principles by which it is guided and governed.

The attendance was full and imposing, presenting the general but desirable if almost respectable, dignified and intellectual body. All its proceedings are strictly secret, it is quite a dull nit matter to get access to such details as will interest the public mind, or give a clue to the proposed action of the body in reference to the vexed sectional battles of the day.

It seems to be conceded that the salvation of the cause depends wholly upon the body taking the most liberal national ground, and in such a shape as to preclude the possibility, even of any misunderstanding. This appears to be the fixed purpose of the large majority and on special pleadings will divert it from this paramount object and duty.

Wilson, of Massachusetts, and his trained choirs, are here ready to battle to the death for "negrodom," but the "sober sense" of the nationals is wide awake to the interests of the cause, and will administer such a deserved rebuke as will consign the "agitator" and the "pseudo negro philanthropist" to the tender mercies of his morbid instincts.

An excuse at this city, headed by Mayor Conrad, propose to give, on Thursday evening, a grand banquet to the Grand Council.

SECOND DAY.

PHILADELPHIA, June 6, 1855.—The Convention assembled to this morning. The Credential Committee made a partial report, which, being received, the case of Ohio, which had not recognized or acted upon the "Union" to a third degree, came up for adjudication. Upon the delegation proffering to take the degree, (which was admitted to be) and giving satisfactory pledges to the Convention they were admitted and seated.

The state of Mississippi was next considered. It appears that the regular Order had no legal existence in that State, but that under the name of "The Stars and Stripes," some thirty thousand natives had enrolled themselves and appointed a delegation to this body. Being disinterred to be of the right stripe, the whole Order was recognized and the delegation admitted, but not, it would seem, without a severe contest—the ever heavy interests opposing, and the nationals advocating their admission. The vote was a decisive one, more than three to one voting in the affirmative.

The State of Louisiana was then brought before the Council. It is affirmed that two sets of delegates are in attendance, one representing a mixed constituency of Catholics and Protestants, the delegation being composed in part of Catholics—the other a somewhat pure Protestant constituency, represented by anti-Catholics. The disposition of this State will probably occupy the remainder of the day's session.

California is here with a double set of delegates. One or two other States are probably in the same predicament.

The sentiment of nationality is the prevailing sentiment, and notwithstanding the intricacies of the slave question, the Union sentiment will be nobly vindicated.

OUELOUSAS RAILROAD.—The work on this road is progressing rapidly, and it is confidently reported that the month of October next will witness the tramping of the iron horse and his train into Tigerville. The weather has been so at favorable for the work in progress, and we are glad to learn that the company has made good use of it. The completion of the road even to Tigerville, is under the present state of our navigation, looked for with increasing interest in our parish, and we hope will stimulate all interested to renew their energies and lend a helping hand to carry it with as little delay as possible to Berwick's Bay. This would open an extensive trade, which would quickly replenish the Company's coffers, besides being of incalculable value to the citizens of Attakapas and the country beyond it.—Franklin (St. Mary) Planter's Banner 7th inst.

This is good news, strengthening the opinions we hear advanced every day respecting the energy and efficiency with which this great work of internal improvement is being pushed forward. The management have taken advantage of the favorable seasons and have done wonders, all the circumstances considered, in working through the awful "devil's swamp," beyond the Lafourche crossing, as well as further along on the line. The completion of the road to Tigerville will be fraught with many advantages, conveniences and benefits, and will add greatly to the present large business of the Company. But, Burwick's Bay is the important point to be reached, and were we not assured that the managers of the road are doing everything in their power to expedite progress, we would beseech them to do so. As the matter now stands, all we and our country friends have to do is to wait, hope, pay up our subscriptions promptly, and extend all the assistance we can, with the full assurance that nothing will be left undone by the directory which industry, zeal, prudence and faithfulness can effect.

The Washington correspondent of the New Hampshire Patriot says that it is not improbable that the successor of Mr Buchanan, as Minister to England, will be Col. Greene, of the Boston Post.

LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER ATLANTIC.

NEWS FROM THE CRIMEA.

Advance in Cotton.

THREE GREAT BATTLES.

The following telegraphic dispatches to the Associated Press we take from last evening's papers:

Liverpool Cotton Market.

The circulars of Messrs Milligan, Evans & Co., and Brown, Shipley & Co. quote an advance in cotton of fully one-half of a penny with sales during the week of fully 152,000 bales, of which 81,000 bales were to speculators and 6,000 bales to exporters, leaving 67,000 bales in the trade. The sales of Friday the 1st inst., were fully 20,000 bales, of which nb 10,000 bales were in the trade, and the balance on speculation and for export.

The market closed steady at the following quotations: Fair Orleans 5d, and Middling 4 15-16d per pound.

The stock of cotton at Liverpool is estimated at 520,000 bales, of which 332,000 bales were American.

London Markets.

Messrs Baring Brothers & Co. quote the Sugar market firm. Breadstuffs generally unaltered and dull.

Money Market.

The London Money market was easier, and Consols had advanced. Bullion quoted them at 91 1-16@1/8, for account, and 92¼ to 92⅜ for money. Money was abundant.

American stocks were unchanged and slightly advanced.

The Crimea.

The news by the Atlantic is the most important, since that bearing the intelligence of the battle of Alma. It comprises three distinct successes gained by the Allies, viz:

Firstly, the French in a series of sanguinary conflicts, lasting the whole night of the 22d and the day of the 23d, took and maintained an important position of the Genoese, placing them nearer to Sebastopol than ever, and within eight thousand men were killed or wounded, mostly by the bayonet. Secondly, the Allies made a rapid advance, and seized and retained the Russian lines on the Tchernaya without much loss, the Russians retreating to the hills.

Thirdly, the Allied forces of expedition has obtained easy possession of Kertsch, and has the entire command of the Sea of Azoff, in which are now concentrated fourteen Allied steamers.

The Russians on the approach of the Allied fleet burned four steamers and thirty transports, and half a million sacks of breadstuffs.

The Russians also blew up all the forts.

The Latest.

The French have established an entrenched camp at Tchorlonm.

The Conferences.

Further conferences are being held at Vienna, and strong hopes of peace are said.

Belgium.

It is now said that 15,000 men will contribute twenty thousand men to the Allied army.

The Evening Post says the following particulars which are to some degree of a conflicting nature:

The Allies, it appears, have completely destroyed the Russian forces in the Sea of Azoff, have captured one hundred guns in the port of Arabat, and have destroyed one hundred Russian merchantmen.

It is also rumored that there has been a great battle between a portion of the Allied forces and those of Liprandi, who had been compelled to surrender after having lost 8,000 of his force.

It is reported that the Czarowitz has been wounded in one of the engagements which have taken place.

A terrible conflict took place at Sebastopol on the 23d ult., in the entire Russian works were attacked by the Allies. The Battle lasted all night and the Russians were defeated with enormous loss. They fell most heavily, however, chiefly at the point at the terrible bayonet.

From the very latest intelligence from Sebastopol it appears that 20,000 of the Allied forces, under Gen. Sir Colin Brown, landed at Kertsch on the 24th ult., and that on the same day 35,000 more of the Allies advanced on the Russian position on the Tchernaya, and occupied it.

The Allies succeeded in capturing the Russian batteries on the coast of Kertsch and Yenikale. The Russians themselves burned three of their steamers, thirty iron punts and trading vessels.

They also burned their magazines at Kertsch, containing 150,000 sacks of oats, 300,000 sacks of corn, and 100,000 sacks of flour.

Spain.

From Spain we have news only by the Atlantic of a Carlist insurrection having broken out and been checked. The Government, however, had been compelled to apply to the Cortes for additional powers.

LATER FROM MEXICO.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ORIZABA.

The steamship Orizaba, Capt. Forbes, arrived Monday afternoon, bringing dates from Vera Cruz to the 8th inst, and from Mexico to the 3d.

We have not much news of interest nor importance by this arrival. The papers declare that the mission of Santa Anna to Michoacan had been crowned with complete success. The Comercio states that the presence of the invincible General President upon the theater of the war had proved the sentence of death to the insurgents, the first great step to peace for the nation, and a firm guaranty of the Michoacane of security for the future; it had already or would shortly throttle the monster anarchy, for routed and vanquished at all points, the rebels were fleeing in terror and were almost entirely at the mercy of the conqueror. The papers of the capital announce that it was expected every day that the steamships purchased by the Government in England and at St Thomas, would arrive in the Pacific, when the blockade of Acapulco by sea and land would be immediately established.

The Universal furnishes an account of an engagement at Tizayuca, between the revolutionists under Degollado, and the Government troops under General Tavera. Fearing an attack upon this place, the General had augmented his forces by arming the inhabitants to the number of six or seven hundred. Expecting to meet but a small force, Degollado had counted upon an easy victory, but his was surprised and utterly defeated. The numerical strength of the rebel force on this occasion is not mentioned, but it is stated that after the battle forty prisoners were shot by order of General Tavera. Later news from Zumpango, whither Tavera had retired with his troops, states that Degollado's forces had completely disbanded, and were making their way by different routes for the department of Michoacan. Their chief was not accompanied by more than a hundred men.

On the 21th ult., Santa Anas left Patzcuaro with his forces, and marched towards Ario, ten leagues distant, where it was said a force of 2000 rebels had assembled. The result of this movement was not known.

Jose Maria Rogel, one of the rebel chiefs, was executed in Tehua on the 26th ult.

A party of forty men, of Arandas, Department of Guanajuato, organized on the 26th ult. and pursued a band of robbers who had been committing depredations in that vicinity. The robbers, it is said, numbered eighty, but they were overtaken and defeated—four of them killed and six made prisoners. The latter were shot.

A singular grave stone had been dug up at Merida in the course of some excavations. It was a simple slab, bearing—engraved in the center—an escutcheon of arms, and on the lower part the date 1541, with a skull and cross bones; it bore also an inscription, but time had so defaced it that it was entirely illegible.

On the 25th ult., the authorities of Cholula dedicated a monument which had been erected in that place to perpetuate the memory of his Serene Highness Santa Anna.

FURTHER TEXAS ITEMS.—The Galveston News of the 9th, says:

About One Hundred Immigrants arrived in our city within the last week, and nearly all of them have left for the interior. These immigrants are principally Polanders from Prussian Poland, Bohemians and Swiss, with some few Germans from Silesia. The voyage seems to have been a pleasant one, only one person having died, and that an infant. One man, who was deranged, jumped overboard in the neighborhood of the West India Islands, and one sailor fell from the mast in sight of Galveston—both lost.

The Houston Telegraph of the 8th gives an account of a fiendish murder, perpetrated at the residence of Mrs. Wolfe, about six miles from Houston.

Four wagoners—one named Lung, and two named Ohlenhaus—entered Mrs W.'s house and acted very improperly when a German who was sleeping there interfered whereupon the wagoners fell on him and beat him so that there is no hope for his recovery.

Three of the wagoners fled and one of them was arrested.

The Austin State Gazette refers to some springs on the Northern frontier, to which the name has been given. The oil drops out of the rocks with water, and collects on the surface of the pool beneath. In cases of chronic rheumatism and inflammatory swellings these springs have been found very successful.

Weather and Crops.

The Mansfield Times of the 31st ult. says:

On Monday last we were favored with a small demonstration of meteorological kindness in the shape of a slight sprinkle of rain. The weather continued pleasant, and invigorating breezes prevailed until yesterday morning, when we were blessed with a small shower. Last night it rained again, and for the present, we are in the happy realization of prosperous and agreeable weather. The evil foreboding of short crops etc., to which the former rainy rabie suspicions of the season gave rise, are now happily removed.

We are reminded of the prospects of the growing cotton plant this morning by receiving a bloom from Mr. Thos. Prine, plucked from the fields of Mrs. Hogan, about ten miles north of Mansfield. Mr. Prine says: "This neighborhood was blessed with five rains last evening, and this morning I owe the pleasure of sending you a cotton bloom; our prospect for a cotton crop is very flattering. The corn crop looks well, but, of course, has suffered with drouth.

The Montgomery (Ala.) Journal of the 11th, says:

The Stand—The late rains have been very general throughout the State, and the crops are everywhere improving. Says the Huntsville Advocate:

The rain the glorious rain, ever blessed and reviving rain came down gently copiously and soothingly on last Wednesday night. It fell for about thirteen hours, and so gently that all was absorbed by the thirsty earth. A better rain for the crops we never knew. It was all over the Western country for we have exchanges from the Wheat crop is a splendid one. Corn is most promising. Cotton looks well, but the lice have not to this appearance upon it as we hear.

The Red River (Alexandria) Republican of the 9th says:

Another copious and glorious rain we write. It laid the old fashioned dust completely to bed, to the delectation of the good. Should it continue, as we pray, we can see no end to crops. A consummation devoutly to be wished for."

The Natchitoches (La.) Chronicle of the 5th says:

Notwithstanding the gladdening rumors which reached us during the past week, relative to a heavy rise in Red River, it seems that the rumors resolve themselves into rather a trifling matter after all. The Dodds arrived on Saturday, the 24 inst., says that the river has then only about two inches at Shreveport, and a rise of six feet is reported at the mouth of the Rhondehl.

After long months of anxious expectation, we can announce that our parish has been blessed with a good, respectable rain. On Wednesday night, the long expected visit made its appearance, and we are glad to say, that the weather indicates a continuance of rain. The temperature which will accrue to our people, are almost beyond calculation, removing every fear of that direful future, which we were preparing ourselves to undergo.

The editorial article of the same paper contains the following statement:

Within the memory of the oldest inhabitant such a season of distress, suffering, privation and actual want, as this has never before been known. The protracted stagnation of water, rendering the river almost entirely unnavigable, and the scarcity of provisions and supplies, which, in the existing state of things can not be removed, are the cause of the hard times of which we speak. There are families of white, and slaves upon plantations in this parish, who have not had bread of any sort or description for several weeks, corn can not be had for love or money—it is not here—and the difficulties of navigation retard the arrival of that which has been sent for from the city. In very many instances even pork is out, and, as it necessarily sequence want, hunger and suffering have come upon the people. Even here, in the town of Natchitoches, the scarcity of provisions, every day becoming greater by even a limited consumption, is assuming some thing of a serious appearance. We are indulging in no exaggerated statement, what we say is a truth, solemn and mournful.

Provisions destined for Natchitoches, and long since shipped from New Orleans, are detained at various points below, Alexandria boats being unable to transit—while they can not be brought in any considerable quantities by land, for the reason that the roads are impassable in hauling can not be procured on the road.

The most exorbitant prices prevail, and altogether, the season is a most melancholy one.

If ever the necessity of a railroad to New Orleans or some point which would immediately connect us with that city, was fully exemplified—it is done now. Even admitting that the existing state of affairs is unusual and of the rarest occurrence, what casualty have we like it may not again occur, and similar self ring result from it. The amount paid by citizens of our parish in the increased prices of provisions, freights and supplies during the last twelve months would have built quite a respectable portion of a railroad. If our present condition will not arouse them to a sense of the importance of a road, then our people are struck with a blindness beyond the reach of cure.

The Shreveport (La.) South-Western of the 30th ult has the following items:

The navigation of Red River has become tedious and difficult. On arriving at Alexandria passengers and freight are taken aboard. To ascend on to Shreveport, a distance of 120 miles, is not without its influences on our locality. Rates of good commercial paper ruled to-day from 9 to 9½ per cent., with only a moderate amount of paper in the hands of brokers; in fact several of these, needful a mile between borrowers and lenders have taken their departure for the sea-shore, northward, and we believe some are so fortunate as to find it convenient to take an European tour. The quality and amount of paper on the market locally issuing, and we should not be surprised to have to quote as long second class paper as 10 to 11 per cent. with a scarcity of first rate, which would be pleased at 8½ to 9—

There was rather more enquiry for Sight Exchange on New York, and the market closed to-day with marked firmness. The banks have made sire to draw for large sums. Foreign bills were in some request, and we learn of sales in the extent of 3000 bales cotton on London, at 9 to 9¼ prem; which, of course, is evidence that business is far from being closed for the season. France are without change. Our rates embrace all operations. We quote this evening—

[illegible] days on London, Sight Bills.....10@10¼ per cent. premium

There have been some few sales of stocks to-day, say 40 shares of Bank of Louisiana, on P. T., but supposed to be high on towards 150, and 50 shares of Bank of New Orleans, in two parcels, supposed to be at 95¼ or 96c.

The quietness of our city was about noon to-day much relieved by the receipt at Adriens by telegraph of the arrival of the Collins steamer, Atlantic, at New York, with nine days later intelligence from Liverpool, with accounts of an advance in cotton of a half penny per pound. Unconscionable and common prudence have lost empire in Liverpool, we are constrained to look on these accounts with the greatest distrust. If the days of 1825 are encouraged by the cotton houses in Liverpool and Manchester, we appeal to the great depositor of events to intervene in the action and movements on this side of the Atlantic and not set the community, as it were, crazy. We again repeat the time to pause and if cool reflection has arrived.

Our dates from New York to-day are to the 7th inst. The letters by the Washington from Bremen were received. The money articles of the New York papers are filled with remarks on the failure of Page, Benon & Co. With all deference to our contemporaries, we think enough has been said about this house. Wm. H. Aspinwall, the attorney of New York financiers, has got secured, and we can only hope that

WORK FOR THE MONTH—JUNE.

June (Latin, Junius) was from Juno, one of the fabled goddesses of the Romans and wife of Jupiter, their chief deity. It answers to the Jewish Tammuz, the tenth of their civil and fourth of their sacred year. It had several names with the Saxons, as the Sere-month or dry month; also Barn-Time or Former-mild-month, and also the Midsummer, or Midsummer month.

PLANTATION.

Continue to plant corn at all favorable opportunities, ploughing up deeply a few acres after every rain, and putting it into the ground in the best manner. Ourselves and many others in various parts of the country made very fair crops last year after the "latter rains" of June and July; but the sooner you plant now the better. After the first hoeing, give your corn a top-dressing of gypsum, ashes and salt—ten parts of the first, four of the second and one of salt. It will be of great benefit in a dry season, and no injury at any time. Try it, if you can obtain the plaster. (See remarks on plaster or gyp in Answers to Inquiries.) Work your early corn as often as possible, giving the roots a deep mellow bed in which to extend themselves, and leaving the surface level and well pulverized.

Plant plenty of cowpeas, using plaster as a top-dressing, after they are well up. It will act like magic in lands deficient in lime. Plant, also, plenty of pumpkins among your corn, or in a separate patch. Milch cows and hogs relish them greatly, and they are quite fattening when boiled up with meal or bran.

Cotton will need constant and unremitting attention during the present month. Scrape and mould the plant as soon as possible; keep the weeds down, and the ground in a state of fine "tilth."

Sow, in the drill, in your richest land, large quantities of corn and millet for fodder. Sweet potato slips should be transplanted now as soon as possible. Dip the root in a thick batter, made by stirring fine leaf mould and scrapings from the unwpen into water, plant them pretty deep, and shade the ground around them with a few handfuls of leaves, and they will grow off finely, even in thirsty weather. Just before sundown is the best time for this operation with "slips." Wheat, oats and early millet may now be cut and stacked up carefully on a platform of rails raised several inches above the ground; or, which is still better, put under cover immediately.—Southern Cultivator.

Efficiency of the Paris Police.

[From "Bella Smith's" Book on Paris.]

We had been in Paris but a few months when the discovery was made that our domestics had very improper notions upon the sacred rights of property, and appropriated various little articles to herself. We, of course, dismissed the offender; and about three weeks after Lucy announced the fact that a piece of jewelry, not worth in itself over a hundred dollars, but valuable to others as a keepsake, was among the missing. The poor child was in tears, and, at her earnest request, D. went to the police with the grievance. To complain of our late domestic was absurd, as the article had been missed so long after her departure. We were satisfied she had taken the pin with her, but had no evidence. The official listened patiently, asked numerous questions, made a few notes, and then, in answer to some inquiries of D., shook his head and said nothing. D. again called on him, indignated by friends, who assured us the police would not let it rest, but received no encouragement, and we let the matter drop. Some time after, so long indeed that we had forgotten the domestic, police and all, Lucy suddenly rushed into the dining-room with the missing jewelry. She had found it carefully wrapped in paper lying upon the table in her room. Between the time of the loss and recovery we had removed to a distant part of Paris from our first residence and again changed our domestic. D. immediately called upon the police officer, who smiled when he saw him enter, but gave no explanation of the mysterious return of the missing trifle.

Another instance was related to me lately. An American lady hired a coach she met in the street and kept it four hours. After returning to her hotel she found she had lost a valuable watch and chain, and, satisfied that she must have dropped it in the coach, she gave information to the police, but could not remember the number of the carriage, and, as she had engaged it in the street, had consequently no clue to the stand or stable. She could not even remember any peculiarity about horse, carriage, or driver. The officer said only the part of the street where the coach was first engaged and the fact that the driver, on being dismissed, had turned round and driven in an opposite direction from the one he came. This was exceedingly slight material to go on, yet in five hours her watch and chain were returned uninjured. Mrs. R. while walking on the Boulevards dropped her pocket-book. She missed the article in five minutes of its loss, and going immediately to the nearest police station stated her troubles. At the conclusion of her short description the officer quietly opened a drawer and handed her the missing portmonnaie. It had but a few moments before been brought in by a street cleaner, contents untouched. Residents and visitors of Paris will give you any quantity of instances such as these; but it is a political machine that the system appears the most startling.

Above all one hears is to put faith in nobody. We do know, however, that suspected persons have no secrets, and no life out of the keeping of the powers in existence. His apartments are open to the police; when the lodger is out they are in. His property is closely inspected; his trunks, drawers, writing-desk, cupboards, and in fact every recess known or attempted to be hidden are opened, and written documents, carefully copies of all papers made for the inspection and consideration of their masters. Nor will any attempts at ordinary concealment serve the purpose. The suspected cannot take a walk to the post-office that the spies are not at work—piercing clothes with long needles, knocking at the furniture, pounding on the walls, and rattling at locks. Should mousseure, being suspected, return unexpectedly, the concierge keeps him in conversation on some trivial pretence until the agents escape. F. P., our friend, who took so active a part under the Republic, and is now in consequence an exile, said the Provisional Government made some startling discoveries; and he, to his astonishment, found even copies of his love-letters on file. What was remarkable under Louis Philippe is twice so under the present Emperor. [Exchange.

MORE FILIBUSTERISM.—We find the following in the Mobile Advertiser:

The bark Magnolia lies in the stream at the foot of Government street, in readiness for the clearance of Uncle Sam. If reports are true, she is a rich prize and has on board more things than Col. Kinney could possibly have made use of in his agricultural expedition to Nicaragua. We hear that she has mostly her deck the armament of a very respectable little corvette, far outnumbering any force that Col. Kinney was ever suspected of leading to Central America. What, for instance, could he have wanted with 2000 rifles? 800 Colt's revolvers, 6000 pounds powder made up into musket cartridges, 1000 pounds of lead in bar, 1000 pounds round fixed ammunition, 1000 pounds battery of brass field pieces, all complete, with harness equipment complete and shot to match, lots of pikes and sabres, a quantity of clothing and 500 sets! All this looks as if it were a part of another and more important and bolder expedition—as if, indeed, it was intended that the Captain General Canalla should have an interest in all this preparation. We suppose that will be rebelled, and then these will be an exhibit against us.

Tour d'Auvergne, the First Grenadier of France.

No life had ever been crammed to better account than that of Tour d'Auvergne, the child, declined, in manhood years to figure as a distinguished soldier. No soul could be more generous, no heart more courageous and disinterested. The hero of modern days equaled in his plainness the warriors of ancient times. Like Æschylus—at once a writer and a soldier—Tour d'Auvergne knew how to handle the pen as well as the sword; and the same hand that in the morning had grasped the sabre, was in the evening devoted to writing works of erudition.

In the year 1781, Tour d'Auvergne was admitted as a volunteer into the army of Spain that besieged Mahon, then in the power of the British. He refused to accept of either rank or recompense, although he contributed materials toward the success of the enterprise. He signalized himself by acts of great bravery; nevertheless, he only sought an inward satisfaction rather than the praise of his superiors, or the applause of the crowd.

On another occasion, being surprised and taken prisoner by the English, the officer wanted to deprive him of his cockade; but Tour d'Auvergne indignantly snatched it from his cap attached it to the point of his sword, exclaiming: "There it is! Tell him to come and take it!"

At the period of the French Revolution, Tour d'Auvergne was made a captain, his modesty and simplicity dictating the refusal of a colonelcy which was offered him; and it was at the head of the company afterward distinguished as "The Infernal Column" that he led the assault, and on several occasions routed the battalions of the enemy. At length, old and fatigued, he quitted the army and returned to Paris, where he learned that a son of his friend was about to depart for the war as a conscript. Tour d'Auvergne, however, without a moment's hesitation, engaged himself as a substitute, and enrolling himself once more as a volunteer, hastened, with knapsack on his back, to rejoin as a private in the army in which he had fought as a superior officer.

France was at that time at war with Austria. Tour d'Auvergne, now fifty years old, found the opportunity of again displaying his energy and boldness. A party of Hungarian grenadiers were desirous of seizing upon a wind-mill, in which had been placed a store of arms and a quantity of gun-powder; and so sharp and deadly was the fire kept up from within that the Hungarians were compelled to retire, with much loss. At length, after many hours of heroic defence, the besieged garrison in the mill demanded permission to capitulate; a window opened, and a soldier presented himself. It was Tour. "We desire," said he, addressing the enemy, "to evacuate our quarters with all the honors of war; with arms and baggage, drums beating and colors flying."

These conditions were acceded to by the Austrian chief, who accordingly drew up his men in two lines, to receive the devoted garrison of the wind-mill. Tour d'Auvergne then slowly descended the steps of the mill with musket shouldered, and passing between the double ranks of the enemy's bayonets, presented himself before the Austrian officer.

"Well!" observed the commander, "where, then, is the garrison?"

"Here it is!" replied Tour d'Auvergne raising his hand a la militaire to his cap.

"But where is it, then?" demanded the officer.

"Here!" replied Tour d'Auvergne.

"What? you alone!" observed the commander.

"I alone was in the wind-mill," rejoined the veteran; "I was the only garrison!"

It was then that Napoleon, admiring the courage of the soldier, and not knowing how to recompense him worthily for his gallant deeds, conferred on Tour d'Auvergne the title of "First Grenadier of France!" sending him at the same time a sabre in compliment of his services. The brave grenadier, desiring still further to show his appreciation of the honor thus conferred on him, persisted, in spite of his age and suffering, in remaining with the army of observation.

"I ought not to die in my bed," said he to his friends; "I ought rather to perish on the field of battle, in the midst of my brave comrades!"

These heroic words of Tour d'Auvergne were fulfilled on the 25th June, 1800. He fell, mortally wounded, having been pierced with a lance. The old soldiers of the army—they of the gray moustache and furrowed brow, who had never shed a tear since the days of their childhood—wept for their illustrious companion-in-arms, and went into military mourning for his loss. His sabre of honor was deposited amid pomp in the Hotel-des-Invalides in Paris, and he became retained on the regimental roll. His heart, enclosed in a golden case, was intrusted to the senior sergeant, whose post was that next to the ensign, bearing the colors of the forty-sixth demi-brigade; and every day at parade, at the call of the name of "Tour d'Auvergne," the oldest of the grenadier company responded: "Died on the field of battle!"

How much more affecting than any monument of brass or marble is this strange tribute to the memory of a heroic soldier!

MAY ON MOUNT WASHINGTON.—While the warm sun and refreshing rains are infusing life and beauty into the verdure of the valleys of New Hampshire, the snows and frosts of winter still cling cheerless and forbidding around her mountain-tops. A correspondent of the Coos Democrat gives the following account of an ascent of Mount Washington on the 9th inst., one of the earliest ascents on record:

The second and third miles we found the snow from two to four feet deep, and with sufficient crust for snow-shoeing. At the old "half-way camp" we left our snow-shoes, and proceeded on an icy crust so solid that a heel-stamp would scarcely dent it. All the high mountain-streams are yet fettered by the strong chain of winter, and in several places we were compelled to cut stepping places in the ice with our hatchet, that we might advance. In this manner we at last arrived at the foot of the highest crag, when trumpeted along by the deafening roar of high wintry wind, a frost-cloud came over us and shrouded us in white. We found our house yet firmly resisting the destructive power, that freely moves around them in this exposed latitude, and, after much difficulty, succeeded in entering the Tip-top House by a back window. The doors and windows of both houses were securely covered with a glistening crust of thick frost, and against the door snow was banked up so solid that, even with a good axe and spade, I think we could not have lived to cut away an entrance, with the wind and sleet so strong against us. I can say truly, that, entering as we did on a side sheltered by rocks from the wind, we were compelled to make constant and active exertion to keep from freezing, with thick gloves and heavy outside coats; in short, we went prepared with a thorough winter dress.

MONSTER SNAKES.—The long drought, it would appear, is acutely felt by the snake tribe, forcing their snakeships from their lurking place to travel over the country in search of water. A short time back a large rattlesnake was killed, near the head of Evans's mill pond, seven feet in length, and eighteen inches in girth. The track of another one has been seen in the same neighborhood, supposed to be much larger, his track measuring eight inches across. The track of a still larger one has been seen regularly in August of every year, for the last thirty-years, crossing the Cahaba road about four miles west of this, in the direction of a swamp, which is supposed to be his regular hiding-place. The track of this monster is thirteen inches across. Repeated attempts have been made to capture this patriarch of the snake tribe, but as yet without success. He crossed on his usual track last August. [Greenville (Butler) South Alabamian.

HORN SNAKE.—The Eaton (O.) Register says that a gentleman living some miles west of that place, lately killed a "Horn Snake," a reptile often talked of, but rarely seen. It is said to be a most venomous snake. The Register thus describes it:

The monster killed measured four feet in length; and the horn at the end of the tail, through an almost imperceptible hole from which the poison is ejected, was about an inch and a half long, spiral, sharp at the point, and so hard as to defy the effort to cut it with a knife.

A WHIRLWIND AT SEA.—The brig Charlotte, at Greenport, L. I., from Rio Janeiro, was struck, May 12th, in lat. 27 deg 10 N., long. 68 deg. W., by a whirlwind and lightning at the same time, which stripped her of everything but her lower masts.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

POPULAR IGNORANCE.—The Morris Jerseyman insists that a boy named Henry Herring, aged about thirteen years, while performing some duty a boat, fell over into the Morris Canal in which was immediately given a hunt-hook procured, and the boy taken out. He had been in the water only about five minutes, and it is stated that his eyes were open, and that he had every appearance of coming to life; but his rescuers tied a rope around his neck, and threw him back into the canal, where he remained until morning, they alleging as reason for so doing, that they thought the law required him drawn in the water until an inquest could be to rebold!

PRUSSIAN CAVALRY.—In the Globe of May 2 we find the following characteristic information:

"A letter from Kiel states that Prussia is having large purchases of horses made in that country, some dealers having orders for upward of 3000.

Now, if the horses are "made" in that country, they must be either rocking-horses, or clothes-horses—just the kind of horses that Prussia is calculated to lead into the present war. King Frederick William, seated on a monster rocking-horse, rocking backward and forward, between the East and West, would, by-the-by, form an admirable subject for a grand allegorical picture of "neutrality." To complete the meaning, the king, pattling his favorite horse de combat, might be painting to Sebastopol in the distance, and exclaiming, in the old war-cry of Bluther, "Vorwarts!" [Punch.

It is the current report, says the Boston Post, that all the principal liquor dealers have agreed not to sell to the State agent appointed under the new law. In that case this offer will find it very difficult to supply the town agents with a pure article, suitable for medicinal and mechanical purposes. If he undertakes to import from abroad, there will be some little obstacles in his way, no doubt; at any rate, considerable time must intervene before his supplies can come to hand. And it is "against the law" to bring liquors by steamboat, railroad or wagon from other places! It is feared that this state of things will occasion much suffering to sick temperance men and quondam legislators in want of medicine.

MRS. PATTERSON TO BE DIVORCED.—The Boston Times announces that the real Mrs. Patterson has turned up in Lowell. She is a California widow who has been suspected of some improprieties by the friends of her absent lord, but against whom nothing tangible could be found until the Hiss affair transpired. On Saturday last the lady was taken before a court to some preliminary proceedings for divorce, instituted by the relatives and friends of her husband, and confronted by the clerk of the Washington House, who testified, under oath, that she was the lady who was entered as "Mrs. Patterson," at that hotel. It is expected that the real facts in this ourlous case will now be developed. Her real name is said to be Moody; and since the Hiss affair, she has been missing until about a week ago, when she again made her appearance.

ARREST OF A MURDERER.—A man named Wilson, who murdered his brother-in-law, Frederick Grymes, in Loudon county, Va., in October, 1853, has lately been arrested. Every effort had been made to secure him previously but without success. A few days ago it was ascertained that he was in his mother's house, where he had been secreted ever since the commission of the crime. A party of men immediately repaired to the place, and found him in an upper room, from which he refused to be taken until they were about to remove the furniture from the lower floor and fire the building. He then gave himself up, and was lodged in the jail at Leesburg. The murder is said to have been one of peculiar atrocity.

"WASHINGTONEA GIGANTEA."—The clipper ship Thomas Watson, just arrived from San Francisco, discharged yesterday the bark of the "Washingtonea Gigantea," the largest tree in the known world. The tree was 21 feet in diameter at the base, (or nearly 100 in circumference;) 303 feet in height, and 160 feet to the first limb. The tree is said to be perfectly proportioned, the diameter being the same each way, and the body as straight as an arrow. The bark has been taken off to the height of 116 feet, at which point the diameter is 16 feet 6 inches. The bark is 1 foot 6 inches thick at the base, and gradually tapers out toward the top to 2 or 3 inches. [N. Y. Times.

A SACRILEGIOUS REMARK.—The Works of God.—A profound writer in the Wilmington (N. C.) Herald, says:—Love the Moon, for she shines in the night, to give us light in the dark, whereas, the sun only shines in the day time, when there is a plenty of light, and his assistance is not wanted." Sir Boyle Roche could hardly have beeten that.

Mary Ann Wilkinson, eighteen years of age, residing with her parents at Saratoga Springs, was poisoned a few days ago by taking a dose of acid by mistake for a preparation for a cold. She had dressed herself to attend church, but the dose quickly laid her in the arms of death.

Dr. Eldridge of Leroy, (Ill.) druggist, waking from sleep one night recently, went to the shelf to get some morphine, and took instead a large dose of strychnine, causing his death in a few moments.

THE ZODIACAL LIGHT.—It is said that one of the results of the Japan Expedition is the discovery that the Zodiacal light is a belt extending entirely around the earth, after the manner of Saturn's ring. The matter has excited a good deal of interest among the astronomers, and Prof. Pierce, of Cambridge, considers the fact established by the observations taken.

FAMINE IN LOWER CANADA.—The editor of the Montreal Commercial Advertiser has been shown letters from ministers and others in the eastern and western townships, which describe the amount of want existing among all classes, from the scarcity of breadstuffs, as frightful in the extreme. In some parts scurvy has made its appearance.

MRS. E. M. CHAMBERS has sold her interest in the St. Louis Republican. Mr. George Knapp who entered the office in 1837 as an apprentice, is now sole proprietor of this wealthy newspaper establishment.

The editor of the Southern Democrat exclaims that he is "acquiring flesh." If he is, we come he steals it from the butcher or from some neighbor's meet-house. [Louisville Journal.

GREAT FISHING.—They tell great stories about the fishing in Kansas. It is said that near Keosh lately a man baited a hook with a whole duck, and sunk it in the river over night. The next morning he hauled in his line, and found that a six pound fish had seized the duck, and that a seventy pound fish had got hooked while attempting to seize the six pounder. He hauled the whole upon the bank—two fishes and the duck upon a single hook—and did not need to go a-fishing again for a week.

A WEDDING PARTY POISONED.—A correspondent of the Petersburg Express, writing from Emory and Henry College, Washington county, Va., gives the details of an outrage which was perpetrated at the residence of Mr. Kuhn, in Scott county, on the 23d ult. E. S. Kane, Esq., had married on the previous day a daughter of Col. Anderson, of Scott, and on the evening in question a party was given at his residence, which was very largely attended. At a late hour in the evening many of the persons present became suddenly ill, and general consternation prevailed. Physicians were immediately sent for, who soon ascertained that the sickness was confined to those who had partaken of some custard, which was among the things prepared for the occasion; and, on analyzing this, it was found to be strongly impregnated with arsenic. The correspondent continues:

I have been unable to obtain the names of the parties, but regret to state, that at latest accounts, some twenty or twenty five of those who partook of the custard were not expected to live. The young and beautiful bride was among the number most seriously affected.

As yet, my informant states, no one has been suspected, the servants being all sick, as they had also eaten freely of the poisoned delicacy. The greatest consternation and excitement prevails in Scott and the adjacent counties, and persons were too much overcome at the idea of such a wholesale taking of life to institute any investigation, or adopt means for the detection of the villain, or villians, who perpetrated this horrid deed.

Punch on the British Army Officers.

We are half ashamed to advert to the malignant sarcasms of the plebians who have the impertinence to suggest that soldiers of the class which produces such men as those honorable and gallant members of Parliament who so coldly chastised the libellous Layard are mere drawing-room warriors, and that their military zeal is all affectation. But, as the immortal Milton expresses it, "Mark, now, how a plain tale shall put them down." The modesty for which the soldier of fashion is remarkable would be offended did we allude personally to the honorable and gallant members who must prominently figured upon the occasion in question.

But, as Herodotus remarks, remeditur a seculis, and we are sure that we shall run no risk of wounding the delicacy of the Noths, Peels, Knoxes, and other military ornaments of our Senate, if from the records of the services of the class of whom they are illustrious types we extract a few details in order to confute the ignorant malice of their detractors. From amongst the number of gallant officers who have distinguished themselves by services which not one of their plebian and pothouse assailants would have known how to render, we take some names at random, for, light where we will, we find courage, chivalry, and devotion. Captain Guffaw happened to be the first whom we recall, and we mention him before his superiors in rank to show how base and mean is the accusation that merit is not appreciated by the aristocracy, and those who, like ourselves, humbly represent them.

Capt. Guffaw's services date as far back as the Tamburine affair, when that gallant officer went into the opera pit without orders (being on the free list), occupied a place in front of the trenches, or rather benches, and kept up a most damaging fire of Yah-yahs against every foreigner who dared to present himself, until physical exhaustion made it necessary for him to retire, and recruit himself with pale ale. He then undauntedly returned to the attack, and having purchased a pint of nuts in Haymarket, continued to throw shells against the curtain of the fortress, until an officer of the A division, appreciating his character, removed him to a station where his peculiar talents were better placed. For this exploit Capt. Guffaw received the Order of the Fine of Forty Bob.

Another of the gallant men of the same adamantine class, Col. Spooney, distinguished himself during the arduous Jenny Lind campaign, when he took some boxes at a less sacrifice than any officer in her Majesty's service, besides once, on a wet opera night, mounting the box of a carriage, and cutting out and outting in, after a style which, though ignorantly construed at the time by those who are afraid of any spirited course of action, opened a communication between the Dowager Lady Slobgolliot (then besieged by the linkaea) and her servants, and so enabled her to go home and throw supplies, including oysters and malcira, into herself, at an earlier date than she had expected. For this he was rewarded with a clasp of the hand by her grateful ladyship.

Of the services of Col. Blokey it is needless to speak. He was entrusted by a friend with the difficult duty of conveying a note to an heiress who sat in the center of the stalls on a crowded night, and who was guarded by two vigilant sentinels in the form of aunts. The adroit stratagem by which he contrived to effect this (by making his way to one of the aunt's stalls, claiming it as his own, searching his pockets for his ticket, and creating a confusion in the midst of which he managed to stoop and squeeze up the note into the young lady's pocket handkerchief,) is a matter of history at Doctors' Commons. He occupied a stall under the late Duke of Wellington, whose attention, when in his box, the Colonel more than once attracted, but the Iron Duke's habitual reserve, prevented his taking any particular notice of the young officer.

He was also engaged in several actions, and in one of them, at the suit of a landlady, he lost all his baggage, and two guns, double barrels, but he speedily recovered his loss by his skilful management of a canon (at billiards,) by which, and a bold stroke over a bridge, he completely defeated the enemy.

Lastly, we have to mention Captain White Choker, an officer of true British mould, and well known as a stormer, having stormed at his servant every morning for thirty years, until that menial declared he could no longer face such a storming party. When Mr. Hope, M. P., could not find his carriage one night, Capt. Choker led the forlorn hope to the very place where it was.

At the siege of Badajoz, at the Surrey Zoological Gardens he lost the sight of one eye through some dust getting into it, but from this he recovered rapidly, but only to lose the pocket handkerchief with which he had wiped it out. He was never actually engaged with the French, but has often fought cocks, which are the Gallic symbol, and those who have observed the extreme testiculousness with which he selects his dentifrices, if stupid, would not again assert that he never smelt powder in anger such are the men who are ridiculed and despised by a plebian press and public for their exertions in putting down the Nineveh nuisance. [London Punch, May 19.

CHILDREN HAVE LUNGS.—The fact is either not known to parents, or very little regarded. The first thing a baby wants is fresh air, and plenty of it. From the moment a child is born, it should have air and light; and neither be shut up in a dark room, nor have its head covered up in a blanket.

The other morning, making my first call on a lady after her confinement, I saw a heap of blankets lying in a rocking chair beside the bed, but there was no baby in sight. When I inquired for the newly arrived, the nurse came, and after taking off fold after fold, there at last was the poor little half-smothered baby gasping for breath. Mother and nurse got a lecture that time.

Returning in an omnibus, a pretty woman got in, with her babe completely enveloped in its blanket. Perhaps it was none of my business, but I think it was. The babe has as good a right to breathe and to have the purest air to do it as any body, and, as there was nobody else to take its part, I did. "Madam," said I, "you are smothering that child."

She smiled and shook her head—she did not believe a word of it.

"You are making it breath its own breath over and over again; and no air is fit to breathe but once. I am a physician, and can't let you make your child sick."

She uncovered the baby's head; it took a long breath; and, if it had been old enough to talk, and been up in its manners, it undoubtedly would have said "Thank you, Doctor."

Major Burr Porter, of Newark, New Jersey, who left that city some months ago to join the Turkish army in the contest with Russia, is now serving in a regiment of the Sultan's cavalry, at Eupatoria, and commands one thousand men. He is considered one of the bravest and most efficient of the foreigners in the service of the Sultan.

FROM SALT LAKE—Doings in the Den of Iniquity.—From a letter in the New York Herald, dated Salt Lake City, March 23 we extract the following:

Some disgraceful scenes appear to have been transacted lately in Utah. Since Col. Steptoe has been installed as Governor, the Deseret News, Brigham Young's organ, has been treating with pasquinades on the "gallant 70 one's" and Orson Hyde, the Chief of the Twelve Apostles, has declared to the universal world that "Colonel Steptoe is a gentleman." Those who were not previously aware of the fact, now know it for a certainty, and it is endorsed by the venerable Apostle.

But while the most fulsome praises of the Colonel have been circulated by the columns of the church paper merely to deceive persons at a distance, the officers and men of the Colonel's command have, on several occasions, been publicly blackguarded and insulted in open day. As a sample, a party of officers of the army were lately riding out with some ladies, in Salt Lake City, when they were set upon by a mob of Mormons, among whom were the sons of Brigham Young, and Heber C. Kimball, President of the Church, and two others, Huntingdon and Moore.

These men rode by the party at full speed; waving their hats and shouting the most opprobrious epithets and vulgar oaths in hearing of the ladies, and endeavored to frighten their horses. One of the ladies, the daughter of the Hon. Judge Kinney, Chief Justice of Utah, was only saved from being thrown from her horse and injured, by the coolness of one gentleman, who seized the bridle and with difficulty restrained her horse.

As the officers wished to proceed lawfully, instead of putting a few lawless through the chief factions in this civilized affair, the case was represented to the Mayor, Jedediah M Grant. A mock trial was gone through, and though the conduct of the mob was in direct violation of the city ordinances, it was discovered that the lodividuals stood too high in the church to be punished; the case was dismissed, and the costs of the court, amounting to an almost fabulous sum, were thrown upon the plaintiffs. During the trial, the ladies, who were present as witnesses, were grossly insulted by a low fellow, a witness for the defence.

The greatest excitement prevailed during the trial; nearly two hundred armed Mormons being collected in and about the Mayor's office.

A young American lady, who became acquainted with a Russian in Italy, was followed by him to Marseilles. It seems that the police are not deaf to appeals which concern our common nature; for, by representing himself to be frightfully in love with the young lady, he was admitted into France. The police of Paris, less tender than they of Marseilles, would only allow him the time strictly necessary for the performance of the nuptial ceremony. This took place early in the morning, and the happy bridegroom left for the frontiers alone at 2 o'clock. I may add, as a supplementary detail, that the mother did not quit her daughter's side once during the few short hours of her wedded bliss. Such is the effect of war!

About fourteen years ago, a Mrs. Eberle, who was noted for corpulency, died and was buried in a cemetery of Philadelphia. The other day the remains was disinterred for the purpose of placing them in a vault, when lo! the head had decayed and fallen away, while the rest of the remains were completely turned to stearine. The phenomenon is supposed to have been caused by the chemical action of certain medicine, or persistence in the consumption of a particular class of food.

☞ DR. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by Dr C. M. Jackson, are justly reckoned among our most valuable medicines. In cases of Dyspepsia it acts like magic, strengthening the tone of the stomach stimulating the digestive powers, and giving ruddy health to the cheek, and brightness to the eye. There are thousands in this community who can testify to their virtues and thousands will hereafter add their testimony.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference to all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gile gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth:

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

S. GRISWOLD & CO.

We have used for our season Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and make well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability; in short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be.

Memphis and Charleston Railroad—Stage Coaches—The Crops and Weather—Pontotoc and Toroadoes—Memphis—The Memphis Advocate.

Since my last letter, I have had other travel than steamboat. The secondly and thirdly of inland transit came next in order and in fact. The Memphis and Charleston Railroad is now completed to Salisbury; a place of some four houses, half-completed, and new as a chicken just hatched, sixty miles distant from Memphis. The style of this road, lettered on the first cars, looked as missionary as the Czar's sign-board pointing towards Constantinople; but the progress of the past shows that the enterprise is not a dream, but a reality. In one or two years the connection will be completed, and the Mississippi will be brought within a few hours of the Atlantic coast. This is probably amongst the best, if not the very best road in the South. The grading is well done; the rails are of the heaviest kind, and firmly laid, and the cars and conduct unexceptionable.

Such is the broken nature of the country that the cars are mostly moving above the surface considerably, or just as considerably beneath it. When above, you have opportunity of, not seeing finely, but of taking a rousing birdseye view of things. At times, the trees seem to bend their tall heads and run to meet you, and the little hills skip like lambs. The imagery of some of David's Psalms might have been picked up from the windows of a car. The fences, specially those zigzag stake-and-rider constructions which make the simple of country fences, look like streaks of wooden lightning, whilst the noise of your progress helps to the illusion that a dry thunder storm is raging around you. Everything we pass is on its legs, going the opposite direction, and hurrying out of the way. The waving wheat fields, the green-bladed corn, and the slopes of grazing herds, are all endowed with locomotion. The speed and variety are exhilarating to mind and body, and your whole system is penetrated and infused with the spirit and consciousness of enterprise. The goaheaditiveness of the age quickens the pulse, sends the warm and ruddy circulation with flood-like impetuosity to the surface and extremities, and the inspiration tingles in your fingers' ends. It is a baptism into the youth, vigor and confidence of the nineteenth century. Flying, leaping, gliding, rolling, you exclaim with Saxe:

"Bless me, this is pleasant, riding on a rail."

"The first shall be last." The old stage coach is not yet obsolete, but like some of our rare old English words, is almost unknown to many of the younger people of the day. This institution, with grave decrepitude, retires before the advance of a later and more intense civilization, and it is a reflection of pleasant sadness that its days are nombered, and that the places that now know it will soon know it no more forever. One of these visions of the olden time confronted us at the eastern terminus of the railroad. The heavy, lumbering vehicle, with a body shaped like an egg, the same old boot behind, and the pooket and driver's seat before, covered atop with smaller trunks, baodboxes, carpet-bags, and all that endless variety of shapes and things called baggage. The prancing horses, roaring, plunging, pawing the ground and snuffing the air, as in duty and in education bound; the driver, gruff and stalwart, with his double reigns and long lashed whip in hand; and the blast of the stage horn, as its notes rise and fall upon the ear, and wind around amongst the neighboring hills; the hurried seating and packing as per "way bill;" another blast of the horn, a crack of the whip, all aboard, and the stage rolls away upon its strong and dogged wheels.

This is a scene our fathers were accustomed to, and its novelty and impressiveness struck me as a resurrection of "Lang Syne." Here you must be sociable. The subjects are few, but the juxtaposition is intense; and a brief hour suffices to bring about tolerable intimacy and friendship. A volume of stage talk, truthful and select, with accompanying facts and incidents, would be immensely taking and pleasant. Has anybody essayed the task? In reviewing the various modes of travel, I would not part with any. Let us here the spice of variety in this as in everything else, till the world ends. And especially let us not anathematize the old fashioned stage. For the good it has done, for the pleasant memories it recalls, and for the associations, grave and gay, sacred and secular, solemn and humorous, which belong to it, let it live kindly in the remembrance, and have a peaceful burial at last.

Crops in West Tennessee and also in the vicinity of Memphis are backward, but promise moderately well. Cotton is small; a good deal of it is just out of the ground; but the stand is good. Corn is improving of late, and the planters anticipate an abundant supply for the coming year. I have never seen fields of finer wheat than are between Memphis and Salisbury, just in the line of the railroad. It stands thick upon the ground, and is well headed. The farmers are in the midst of harvest at this time. North Mississippi, from the State line to Pontotoc, is inveterately and incorrigibly hilly. It is up hill and down hill all the way. The soil looks red and poor, and judging from the crops it does not belie its looks. The planters in this section, besides the soil, have had to contend with drouth, hail and hurricanes. With the pressure of all these casualties, the prospect is a gloomy one. The oat crop is almost an entire failure in Tennessee, North Mississippi and North Alabama. For the past week these sections have been visited with copious rains, and the crops look a hundred per cent. better than they did ten days ago; and I need not add, the spirits of the planters are a hundred per cent. more buoyant and hopeful.

Pontotoc is a little village, with a court-house, several churches and a jail. The houses and homes of the people sit round about on the wooded hills, very much like the men on a chess board when the game is half played. On the night of the 10th of March this place was visited by a most destructive tornado. The marks of it yet remain. The ruins of the Baptist Church and of the Male Academy, both substantial brick buildings, attest its fury. Shortly after the storm of the 10th March, the country was alarmed by another of less power; and again, on Sunday evening of the 27th ult., a fearful thunder storm, accompanied with high wind and hail of incredible size and quantity, occurred in the town and several miles in the country adjacent. The path of a tornado is as the footsteps of Omnipotence. It traverses forests, crushing its oaks and hurling them to the ground; some it snaps asunder midway from the top, others it uproots, and others are left upright, but scathed and blasted by the lightnings which play in its wake or lead in its van. Can science tell why the tornado so loves the hills of Pontotoc? This was once the happy hunting ground of the Chickasaw; is the Great Spirit angry with the pale faces?

The Baptists have here a female college, numbering, if I remember rightly, about two hundred pupils. There is also a male school, and the academy for boys destroyed by the tornado will be soon rebuilt and put in successful operation. We had a refreshing Sabbath worship with the united congregations of the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches. How good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity; where Esau and Jacob cease to vex one another! And how glad would it make us all if this miniature of Christian brotherhood was sweetly and truthfully expanded over the world!

Memphis is on the Nile of the New World, and its position promises a career in wealth and importance perhaps relatively equal to its namesake. Its population is now estimated at twenty thousand. It is for the most part well built, and altogether a pleasant city. The stores and shops quite equal those of New Orleans in the splendor of their appointments, and in the richness and variety of the wares which they display. Private residences are handsome and tasteful; many of them vie in elegance and finish with your most palatial mansions. It is a place of trees; almost every street is well shaded, and the only public square that I have noticed retains the primal forest growth—oaks upon which centuries have looked, and which still retain their native grandeur and sturdy independence, seeming to live as an act of condescension, and to spread their head and protecting arms over a people that has the good sense to cherish and appreciate them. The streets and buildings are not unlike the First and Fourth Districts of New Orleans. There is here no France, no Spain, no Old World, as with you; but it is an American, Western city on the Mississippi—just such a city as one likes; and such an one as is likely to become a metropolis. On Main street—the Camp street of the Crescent City—is the office of the "Christian Advocate." So the passer-by is notified by a narrow signboard, painted white, with black lettering, which stretches across the banquette, over his head. Your cotemporary is a story higher than yourself. The sanctum is on the third floor; fixtures neither better nor worse than your own, and having very much the same dry, newspaper air and appearance. I did not see Bro. Cobb, and cannot, therefore, institute any comparison between the occupants of the tripods. Over head and a story higher is the printing office. Everything here is exclusively for the Advocate. One of Northrupt's hand-presses has been installed since the fire, and their weekly edition of between four and five thousand is worked off in a little more than six hours. All this looks very well, and very snug, and very prosperous for so young a paper, and one that has contended with misfortunes, and has been in peril amongst its friends. Here it is, planted in a most felicitous location, spreading its wings over Arkansas, North Mississippi and West Tennessee. May its shadow never be less, but increase more and more.

BIGOTRY.

"Tis a base abandonment of reason to resign
Our right of thought."

Bigotry is defined by lexicographers to be a "blind zeal," a bitter prejudice. It is most generally applied to the bitter prejudice and blind zeal displayed by religious sectarians. The disciples gave the world a specimen of this spirit when they said, "Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and forbade him, because he followeth not us." Just so; he was doing a good work, to be sure—casting out devils; and he was doing it, too, on proper authority—in thy name. But—But what? Why, he did not follow us, and that was cause enough to take away his license to minister in public, even in good works.

This emanation of the devil, hoary with the frost of eighteen hundred years, still exists, and stalks with its hideous face and frown through the land; aye, through all the land of Washington, shielding itself under the "stars and stripes." We think, however, that there is far less intolerance than in former times, because there is a wider and more general dissemination of intelligence and gospel charity; but still there is a great and constant need to give heed to the lesson, "look not every man on his own things, but on the things of others also." Surely, for they have rights and interest as well as ourselves. We meet with instances in which we fear this excellent rule is forgotten—not so much, it may be, in religious, as in political differences. Professed Christians are too well instructed in the nineteenth century to say to that Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian or Romanist, I forbid your doing good, unless you follow me. No, they would be ashamed to do that; but they show the same temper and spirit in another way. They are bigots in politics, and take the most unmanly and paltry way of showing it.

If by possibility an editor of a strictly neutral or religious journal pens and prints a thought that by any process of torturing and twisting can be brought in collision with the political bigot's opinions, he at once proceeds to write a personally offensive letter, and in high indignation orders his paper to be discontinued; which says, as plain as an act can say, I will suppress all opinions that do not coincide with my own; think as I think, or I will starve you out; or, as Douglas Jerrold better says it, "Friend, love the Lord; but if you don't, I'll punch you on the head." That is the idea, starve these poor editors into conformity. So the old inquisitors used to say; "Take your choice—the real presence or the rack."

Take another exhibition of this spirit. A minister of the gospel, a modest gentleman; no one dare accuse him of being a brawling politician; but he is suspected of entertaining political opinions different from his hearers, or a portion of them. This is quite too much for the forbearance of these model saints. Such an exercise of the "right of private judgment" is not to be tolerated. What's to be done? Why, as the rack and the wheel and other pleasant instruments of physical suasion have become antiquated, and as the minister is poor, starve the obnoxious opinions out of him; deny him the rights of hospitality; and thus compel him, if possible, to fit the iron bedstead, and establish political conformity upon a solid basis.

Now I suppose these professed followers of Jesus do not see this in its true light—proscriptive and intolerant bigotry. If they did, I must think they would shrink away from it with horror. Why, my dear brethren, this is the very spirit that led Nero to say he wished that the Romans had but one neck, that he might strike it off at a blow; that animated Simon de Montfort in his bloody and exterminating war against the Albigenses for a religious difference; and the same that animated the ferocious bosom of Thomas de Torquomeda, Grand Inquisitor of the most Christian Kingdom of Spain.

If, my brethren, you do not shrink from this proscriptive spirit, this wolf with the sheep wool off and the hrindled hide exposed, if you can still go to the length of starving, as far as possible, a fellow-man, and even refuse to pay him an honest debt, because he dares differ with you in opinion, then the Lord help any who are unfortunate enough to be in your power, and yet differ with you in politics.

The writer of this belongs to no association or party, save the Methodist Church, South; he is not identified with Whigs, or Democrats, or Know-Nothings, but he holds that he has a right to belong to any one of these parties, and that if he did, it would be his own private business, and no man under the sun would have the slightest right to say one word about it. Did I belong to any one of these parties, I would consider it personally offensive and grossly impertinent for any one to make any disparaging remarks about me in view of such connection. And does not every other honest freeman feel the same? Then, if the right of private judgment is so dear to us, let us remember that it is equally so to others. And while we claim the right to think, let us allow to others the same privilege. We always admired the answer of Davy Crockett when some one asked him, at an election, how he voted. He replied, "I voted like every gentleman there voted." "How was that?" "Just as I pleased."

In our political opinions let us be correct, but let us also be tolerant. Christianity and good citizenship alike require this of us.

J. B. W.

PRAYERFULNESS.

"He continued all night in prayer to God."—Luke 6:12.

We speak of this Christian and that Christian as "a man of prayer." Jesus was emphatically so. The Spirit was poured upon him without measure, yet he prayed! He was incarnate wisdom, "needing not that any should teach him." He was infinite in his power and boundless in his resources, yet he prayed! How deeply sacred the prayerful memories that hover around the solitudes of Olivet and the shores of Tiberias! He seemed often to turn night into day to redeem moments for prayer, rather than lose the blessed privilege.

We are rarely, indeed, admitted into the solemnities of his inner life. The veil of night is generally between us and the Great High Priest, when he entered "the holiest of all;" but we have enough to reveal the depth and fervor, tenderness and confidingness of His Heavenly Father. No morning dawns without his fetching fresh manna from the mercy seat. "He wakeneth morning by morning; He wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learned."—Isa. 1:4. Beautiful description! a praying Redeemer, wakening, as if at early dawn, the ear of his Father, to get fresh supplies for the duties and trials of the day. All his public acts were consecrated by prayer—his baptism, his transfiguration, his miracles, his agony, his death. He breathed away his spirit in prayer. "His last breath," says Phillip Henry, "was praying breath."

How sweet to think, in holding communion with God, Jesus drank of this very brook! He consecrated the bended knee and the silent chamber. He refreshed his fainting spirit at the same great fountain head from which it is life for us to draw and death to forsake.

Reader, do you complain of your languid spirit, your drooping faith, your fitful affections, your lukewarm love? May you not trace too much of what you deplore to an unfrequented chamber? The treasures are locked up from you because you have suffered the key to rust; the hands hang down because they have ceased to be lifted in prayer. Without prayer! It is the pilgrim without a staff, the seamen without a compass, the soldier going unarmed and unharnessed to battle.

Beware of encouraging what indisposes to prayer—going to the audience chamber with soiled garments, the din of the world following you, its distracting thoughts hovering unforbidden over your spirit. Can you wonder that the living water refuses to flow through obstructed channels, or the Heavenly light to pierce murky vapors!

On earth, fellowship with a lofty order of minds imparts a certain nobility to the character; so, in a far higher sense, by communion with God, you will be transformed into his image, and get assimilated to his likeness. Make every event in life a fresh reason for going to him. If difficulted in duty, bring it to the test of prayer; if cowed down with anticipated trial, "fearing to enter the cloud," remember Christ's preparation, "Sit ye here while I go and pray yonder."

Let prayer consecrate everything—your time, talents, pursuits, engagements, joys, sorrows, crosses, losses. By it rough paths will be made smooth, trials disarmed of their bitterness, enjoyments hallowed and refined, the bread of the world turned into angels' food. "It is in the closet," says Payson, "the battle is lost or won."—Zion's Herald.

EASY TO BE LOST.

Oh! how many ways are there to be lost, while there is but one to be saved! If the sinner does not like one way, he may take another—he may take his choice of a hundred. Or he may just sit still and float down the current to the bottomless pit, and he will certainly be lost, and that forever, as certainly as if he were to ply the oar with all his might. But to be saved, he must strive to enter in at the straight gate. He must wrestle, he must "fight the good fight of faith." "The Kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." Let every reader ask himself, am I in the way to be saved, or in the way to be lost—which?

THE PAST AND THE PRESENT.

NO. IV.

THE CONTRAST.

Bro. McTyeire—The faculty of retrospection, or the power of looking back, is not inspired, although in my 84th year. The exercise of this faculty, to one worn out, retired and solitary, is both pleasing and melancholy. When I look into the volume of bound "Minutes of the Annual Conference," and retrospect the history of the past, the names of preachers, times, seasons, &c., of the deepest interest are revived in my recollection. The pioneers of itinerant Methodism were a peculiar, a laborious, and self-sacrificing race, and the Methodist societies then raised up and "trained to holy discipline" were "a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Plainness, simplicity and earnestness were the common characteristics of the itinerant preachers, as they labored day and night with tears, preached a plain gospel, "with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven;" and so ardent, constant and onerous were their labors and duties, that few constitutions were able to bear up many years under the pressure; hence the frequent appearance and disappearance of the names of men professing to be "moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the gospel." Many sunk down with shattered lungs, and not a few to an untimely grave. I took sweet council with many of these—knew their worth and witnessed the hardships of many, for whose support the Church did not or could not provide. In my early and extensive itinerant career I found many of them, in Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, &c., who stood as waymarks to Heaven, and as pillars in the House of God. Few, if any of them survive the wreck of time; their names (only to be found in the bound Minutes) and their "deeds of noble daring" are lost and forgotten.

There was a period in the history of the primitive Church when Mr. Wesley says, in substance, "A cloud of fire and brimstone from the bottomless pit arose, when riches and honor was poured upon the Church, and especially upon the clergy." When I compare the past with the present, I think of the remark of a quaint writer respecting the preachers before and after that period: "Before, they preached golden sermons in wooden pulpits; and after, they preached wooden sermons in golden pulpits." In time past, the preachers became worn out, broke down by excessive labor, hardships, &c.; at present, there is much more danger of their rusting out, or becoming drones in the hive. What! a preacher wear out or break down by preaching once a week, holding no class or prayer meetings, and making no real pastoral visits? He may, indeed, wear out with the people; his chaffy discourses, void of holy unction, may become stale and insipid, and the flock may starve for want of spiritual food administered by a really spiritual pastor. "From such apostles, O ye mitred heads, protect the Church."—Cowper.

Fifty or sixty years ago, the annual allowance of a traveling preacher, "and the fishops," was $80, and the same amount to his wife, if he had one. This amount was seldom realized, and often not more than one-half, or even one-fourth of the allowance was raised. No marvel, then, that names should disappear from the minutes. But now, on a circuit with only Sabbath appointments, from $500 to $800 are claimed, and the people assessed to raise it. These are the days of progress. I know the man, who fifty years ago presided over a district which embraced the whole settled portions of the Southwest, south of of Green river, in Kentucky, and west of the Cumberland Mountains—large circuits, long rides, hard fare; few preachers, and they young and unordained; had a small family, and did not receive the amount of $200. In the centre of that district the D.D.s are now luxuriating. The same man presided over a district, some twenty-five or thirty years ago, embracing Nashville, Tenn., some six years, at different times. That district covered as much ground as is now contained in four or five districts. Was much from home; had a chargable family; and scarcely received $200—not a cent for table expenses. There is contrast between this and small districts, with $1,000 salary. Times are changed. That man now dwells in a cottage, labors with his hands, loves Methodism as it was, admires the itinerating system as it was, and holds an itinerant general superintendency in high estimation, as it was.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FURTHER PARTICULARS BY THE ATLANTIC.

The Atlantic arrived at New York on the 18th. The Baltimore Evening Patriot of that date publishes the following telegraphic account of her news:

New York, June 18.—The American steamer Atlantic, with Liverpool dates to Saturday, 21 inst., one week later than former advices, arrived here this morning at 8½ o'clock.

The war news is important.

Cotton has considerably advanced.

Breadstuffs are unchanged.

The Allies have taken Kertch, on the sea of Azoff, and the Russian Camp on the Tchernya. They have also met with great success before Sebastopol.

Important Successes of the Allies—Sanguinary Engagements.

The news is the most important yet received from the seat of war since the battle of Alma. The intelligence comprises three distinct successes of the Allies. First, the successes of the French in sanguinary conflicts lasting the whole of the nights of the 22d and 23d of May, in which they took and still retain an important position of defiance in the place d'armie before Sebastopol. Not less than 8000 men were killed or wounded, mostly by the bayonet.

Secondly—The Allies made a rapid advance and seized and retain the Russian lines on the Tchernaya, without incurring much loss—the Russians retreating to the hills.

Thirdly—The Allies' secret expedition has obtained possession of Kertsch, and now command the son of Azoff, in which are now fourteen allied steamers. The Russians, on the approach of the Allies, blew up the forts and burned four steamers and thirty transports, with half a million sacks of breadstuffs.

France and England have declined further conference at Vienna, as proposed by Austria.

The Latest.

The French have encountered a camp at Tchergoun.

It is said that Belgium will furnish twenty thousand men. Hopes of peace still prevail.

The French before Sebastopol.

By the last advices we had a brief announcement that the French had driven the Russians from their strong position of defence, or place d'armie before Sebastopol. The affair occurred on the nights of the 22d and 23d, and was the most sanguinary engagement since the battle of Alma. The place was defended by nearly the whole garrison. The total losses on both sides, in killed and wounded, is set down at 8000 men!

General Pelissier says the Russian loss was enormous, and that of the French troops considerable, though much less than that of the enemy. The French, at the latest accounts, retained the position thus won.

Prince Gortschakoff's account of the affair is this:—Yesterday evening seventeen battalions of the enemy, with reserves, attacked the trench of the counter approach commenced the day before, in front of bastions five and six. The combat was sanguinary, and lasted during the whole night. Our twelve battalions lost nearly 2,500 man in driving back the enemy.

General Pelissier telegraphs as follows: May 25th, 10 o'clock, P. M.—To-day we have occupied the line of the Tchernaya. The enemy were not in force, and offered little resistance, retreating rapidly into the hills. We have definitely established ourselves, and in the works carried on the 22d and 23d.

An armistice was agreed upon for burying the dead, and this enabled us to estimate the loss of the enemy. It must be from five to six thousand men in killed and wounded.

May 26th.—The enemy have not yet made a demonstration either in front or against the lines on the Tchernaya. The works of the fortification of Kamiesch are progressing. The sanitary condition of the army is good.

May 27th.—The expedition against Kertsch, on the strait of Yenikale, commanding the entrance to the sea of Azof, has been attended with complete success. The enemy fled at the approach of the Allies, and blew up their powder magazines.

It was rumored at Paris that Gen. Pelissier had attacked and routed Gen. Liprandi's force. Gen Canrobert is reported to be wounded, and another General killed, but this is regarded as doubtful.

Lord Raglan telegraphs as follows: May 27th. We are masters of the sea of Azof, without loss. The troops landed at Kertsch, on her majesty's birth-day, the 24th. The enemy fled after blowing up the fortifications on the sides of the straits and destroying their steamers. Some vessels and fifty guns had fallen into the hands of the Allies.

Lord Raglan further telegraphs that on the 25th, Gen. Sir George Brown reached Yenikale, having on the previous day destroyed the Russian foundry, near Kertsch, where shot and shell and minnie balls were manufactured by the Russians.

Another dispatch from Lord Raglan, dated May 30th, says: Letters from Sir George Brown and Admiral Lyons, on the 29th, announce the destruction by the enemy of four Russian war steamers, and large depots of corn. The allied troops succeeded in blowing up a magazine at Arabat, and in destroying about one hundred merchant vessels. Only one Russian steamship remained in the sea of Azof.

Advices from Gen. Brown, dated May 28th, state that the troops continued healthy.

Five vessels laden with corn, ran into Kertsch, not knowing that the place had been taken, and were captured by the Allies. The number of guns found by the Allies exceeds one hundred.

The French accounts say that the Russians burned 80 transports, as well as their four steamships, and destroyed 900,000 sacks of corn, and 100,000 sacks of oats, and 100,000 sacks of flour.

Fourteen Allied steamers entered the Sea of Azof. Reinforcements were daily arriving at Constantinople.

The occupation of Gulntz, and an attack upon Ismael and Reni were confidently spoken of.

The garrison of Sebastopol drew most of their supplies from Kertsch, and its capture therefore must exercise a speedy influence on the siege.

Fifty cases of cholera and 20 deaths are reported among the British forces before Sebastopol, and some cases had occurred among the French.

The Sardinian contingent had been landed in splendid condition, well supplied with all the material of war.

Warm weather had succeeded the heavy rains in the Crimea.

Large convoys of provisions and supplies had entered Sebastopol from the north side. The Russians were working vigorously on the north side of the harbor, in erecting earth works, &c.

The Allies have completed their fourth parallel, and the British were moving all their heavy mortars into their advanced parallels.

Two deserters from Sebastopol reported the garrison as being very strong numerically, but the wet weather was causing sickness.

From the Baltic.

It was reported at Dantzic, on the 23d, that the first division of the Russian gun bate stationed at Swesburg, had made a movement towards the opposite coast in the direction of Riga.

The French squadron sailed from Kiel on the 22d to join the English fleet, which was last reported beyond Nargen.

The Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs has issued a circular respecting the blockade of Finland ports, in which he says that England has departed from the principle that the flag covers the cargo, and warns neutral vessels of the circumstance.

The Vienna Conference.

The expected resumption of the Vienna conference had not taken place, and it was doubtfully reported that the new Austrian propositions had been peremptorily negatived by England and France.

Austrian negotiations were, however, more active than ever.

Egypt.

The Viceroy of Egypt has given orders for the construction of a railroad across the Isthmus of Suez.

Russia.

Prince Menschikoff had returned to St. Petersburg, and was well received by the Emperor.

Seven hundred and forty-six Russian prisoners are in the hands of the English, while the Russians have but one hundred and eight privates and ten officers belonging to the English.

Greece.

A conspiracy to assassinate General Church, the Greek Minister of War, had been discovered at Athens, and some arrests had been made.

England.

The British Parliament was not in session.

The British shipping returns for April continue to exhibit a considerable decrease in the employment of tonnage.

France.

The French Exposition was beginning to attract more attention, but was still far short of the expectations entertained. The first free day attracted 30,000 visitors.

The King of Portugal was in Paris.

The Very Latest.

London, Saturday Morning.

Memel, May 20.—When the steamer Driver was sent into the Baltic ports, to serve the vessels lying there with official notice of the blockade, she found among other American ships, the Samuel Appleton, of Boston, which was also served with a warning to clear out within six days. A day or two afterwards, when out cruising, the steamer fell in with the Appleton, and an officer was sent on board, who examined her papers and found them perfectly in order. Whereupon the officer demanded to see the bills of lading. The American captain objected, and began to make difficulties, but the officer insisted, when it turned out that Appleton had just landed at a Baltic port 50,000 rifles and 10,000 revolvers, besides about 800 bales of cotton, as the ostensible part of her cargo. The ship was then carefully overhauled, but nothing contraband of war was found.

The Vienna papers publish a consular dispatch from Varan, according to which the number of Allied troops landed at Kertsch under General Brown amounted to 20,000. The advance on Tchorunya was made on the same day by 35,000 men.

A private dispatch also from Varna states that the Allies are in possession of Tchernaya on the right bank of the river. Two Russian batteries and several battalions detached from the north of Sebastopol were advancing to support the retiring force.

The English funds opened on Friday at a further slight reduction, but a gradual recovery took place, and the market closed with renewed promises of a decided improvement in the afternoon, attributable to the satisfactory accounts of the progress of the Allied squadron in the sea of Azof, coupled with the report of the Grand Duke Constantine having resigned his position of Grand Admiral of the Russian Navy, and that the peace party were in the ascendant in St. Petersburg.

The stock of bullion in the Bank of England has increased £417,005.

Spain.

A dispatch from Madrid states that the Cortes had granted the extraordinary powers demanded by the Government, by a vote of 124 against 49.

Thirty-five insurgents have been captured at Diregmse, and twenty-five have surrendered at Caspe.

From India—Expedition against Persia.

Letters from Bombay to the 30th of April, state that an important and powerful expedition consisting of 15,000 men and an extensive fleet, was ready to proceed to the Persian Gulf, to commence offensive operations against Shah.

Italy.

The new Sardinian Ministry has at length been recomposed.

The eruption of Mount Vesuvius has subsided.

From China.

Dates from Shanghai to the 9th of February represent that all was quiet, and the troops were withdrawn towards Nankin. In the interior, matters have assumed an unfavorable change. The insurgents were making such advances as led to fears that they might stop the export trade of Shanghai.

Famine threatened the people of Canton, and food riots were apprehended.

A British fleet of eight vessels of war was at Japan, and were to proceed to the Russian settlements to the north.

The U. S. ship J. P. Kennedy was at Canton; the Vandalia at Whampoa, and the Powhatan at Singapore.

Capt. Adams, of the U. S. Navy, proceeded homeward by this mail, with the ratified Japan treaty.

Markets.

Liverpool, Friday, June 1.—Milligan, Evans & Co. quote: Cotton—There has been an active speculative demand, and prices have considerably advanced, say ¼. The week's sales amount to 81,500 bales, including 5,000 bales for export. The sales to-day amounted to 20,000 bales, half of which was taken by the trade. The market closed steady. Orleans fair, 7¼; middling 6 11-16; upland fair 6¾; middling 7-16. Stock in port 529,000 bales, including 332,000 bales of American cotton.

Breadstuffs are generally unchanged, and the market closed dull.

American stocks closed with an active demand—prices slightly advanced. Consols have advanced to 92¼.

Barings' London Circular quote consols for money at 92¼ to 92¼, and on account at 93 to 93⅛; but other circulars quote 92¼.

Money is abundant.

Saturday, June 2.—The Liverpool cotton market is excited at an advance in prices of ¼.

Breadstuffs are dull, and provisions are unchanged.

The leading commercial circulars agree with the quotations furnished by our Liverpool agent; but the Brokers' circular quotes cotton as advanced 1 to 2d., and full prices for flour offered sparingly.

Lake Bistineau Covered with Grass.—We find the following paragraphs in the Bienville (La.) Times of the 7th:

The lake is very low, and has been all the winter and spring. Thousands of acres of land usually under water, often ten or fifteen feet deep, have been bare so long that grass has sprung up, and now affords the richest pasture we ever saw, sufficient, it is said, to fatten many thousands of cattle. It is green and tender, and in many places from twelve to eighteen inches high, and as thick as it is ever seen in a New England meadow.

We are surprised that our planters do not fall in with their grass blades, while they have little to do on their farms, and make oceans of the cleanest hay for their cattle next winter, besides for the New Orleans market. It certainly would pay handsomely. It could be dried and baled up in the neighboring cotton presses, and then be shipped to New Orleans, where it would command from $25 to $30 per ton. Many in consequence of the scarcity of corn, have lost their horses and mules thinking to fatten up till it rains to give them work on their farms. Numerous herds of neat cattle may be seen upon the luscious carpet of green, almost fat enough to glisten in the sun. Hogs, too, are fat upon the nuts of a grass which abounds in some places, which are sweet and nutricious, having very much the taste of a sweet almond.

The crops are beginning to fall rapidly. Much of the corn is now ready to put forth tassel and shoots, and will be lost beyond recovery in a few days. In some parts of the parish, and in parishes east of this, the rains have been better, and the crops can hold out a little longer.

The Water We Drink.

The New Orleans correspondent of that [illegible] literary paper, the Southern Times, (Montgomery, Ala.,) makes an unreliable complaint of the contents of our "inexhaustible water tank," the Mississippi river:

"There is much brant of Mississippi water. Some call it sweet, salubrious, the best in the world. It may be to those who use it only; but a change from any other to it is apt to derange the system. Think what a dose a gallon of this water is! The western slopes of the Alleghanies, and the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, and the southern slope of the North [illegible] are all drained by one [illegible]. Springs, hot and cold [illegible], chaly[illegible] waters, salt springs, lime springs, oil springs, and every other variety meet and mingle in the bed of the Mississippi River. One must have a keen taste that can tell the predominating ingredient. I am neither doctor nor druggist, but my opinion is that Mississippi water is cholera mixture; and so long as it is used for drinking, the cholera will be a fixed institution in the Mississippi Valley. Our planters are beginning to [illegible] customs and use rain water instead, and the effects are seen in the improved hygiene of their plantations."

We feel like hunting for a spring among the rocks after reading that. And yet something more might be added. It is literally the sewer of the continent. Cold streams from the Northern lakes flow into it, the clear of Ohio, the muddy of Missouri, and the red of Arkansas. Lower down, it receives a frequent contribution from the bayous. Finally, it is a liquid olla podrida.

HOME CIRCUIT.—Third number received. What are our people doing for it? They will do well for themselves to get it.

ANNUAL REPORT.—The Missionary Secretary is informed that we have had no copy.

TOBACCO-CHEWING CLERGYMEN.

Rev. Rufus E. King has been giving the Methodist ministers of the Black River Conference, through the Northern Christian Advocate, a gentle hint that it is not quite decent or civilized to spit tobacco juice over the floors of the houses where they chance to be guests. We give his letter below:

To the Members of Black River Con.:

DEAR BRETHREN.—The time of another Annual Conference is drawing near. I well remember meeting you at Camden, the seat of our Conference last year. In connection with others, I approached our ever beloved and venerable brother Gary, (now, I trust, in Heaven,) to be directed to my place of entertainment during the session of our Conference. Brother Gary looked at me with an expressive look, and said: "Brother King, do you use tobacco?" I said: "No sir; I should be ashamed to use it." Said he: "Go to Brother Gifford's. Sister Gifford said to me, if we had three preachers in the Conference that did not use tobacco, to send them to their house." Brethren who use tobacco do not know the amount of trouble they make many of the kind families by whom they are entertained at Conference. Not many years since, at one of our Conferences, after the preachers had all been appointed to their places of entertainment for the session, the stationed preachers found it absolutely necessary to remove and change some of the preachers, in consequence of their inordinate use of tobacco. Oh! brethren, is it true that ministers professing to be examples of purity and holiness, will indulge in a habit so filthy as to render it necessary to remove them from Christian families! I do hope our beloved brother Dunning, at Woodsport, will be put to no such disagreeable necessity this year. RUFUS E. KING.

West Martinsburg, April 27, 1855.

This letter is suggestive. On the return of our religious anniversaries, it is usual for clergymen to request their people to throw open their doors for the entertainment of strangers, reminding them of the apostolic intimation of the possibility of entertaining angels by mistake. Some of our people resent the intimation, as did a lady in Connecticut, at whose door a tramping beggar called very early one morning, and asked for cider. She refused him, and ordered him to go on. He ventured to remonstrate against her decision, and referred her to the command of the apostle not to be forgetful to entertain strangers, for some had thereby entertained angels unawares. She said she was not [illegible] this case of losing such a privilege, for she never heard that angels were in the habit of going around begging cider before breakfast!

On the same safe ground our ladies who hate the tobacco-phobia insist that the use of the vile weed is a conclusive argument against the angelic character of clergymen or others who would enjoy their hospitalities. Many of these excellent women have far greater aversion against a chewer of tobacco than one who has not taken the tee-total pledge. When the prohibitory liquor law shall have driven the wine cup out of [illegible], we may look for a grand crusade against tobacco, and it will require no great ingenuity to construct a better argument against chewing tobacco than using wine.—N. Y. Observer.

If there be a pleasure on earth which angels cannot enjoy, and which they might almost envy man the possession of, it is the power of relieving distress; if there be a pain which devils might pity man for enduring, it is the deathbed reflection that we have possessed the power of doing good, but that we have abused and perverted it to purposes of ill.—Bacon.

Never listen to loose or idle conversation.

What I Ought, Wish, and Hope to Be.

It was one of the joyfullest thoughts of the Psalmist, "Thou wilt perfect that which concerneth me." The Christian's defects and wants are not to be forever. He is not a discontent or malcontent; yet he is not satisfied and never will be fully, till he awakes in his Saviour's likeness. Even Paul, though far from willful, could conceive of a condition "far better" than the one he was in. This hope hath the Christian—to be presented at last without spot or wrinkle, or any blemish.

John Newton, in his old age, when his sight had become so dim as to be unable to read, hearing this Scripture repeated, "By the grace of God I am what I am," paused for a few moments, and then uttered this affecting soliloquy: "I am not what I ought to be. Ah! how imperfect and deficient! I am not what I wish to be. I abhor that which is evil, and would cleave to that which is good. I am not what I hope to be. Soon I shall put off mortality, and with mortality all sin and imperfection. Though I am not what I ought to be, what I wish to be, what I hope to be, yet I can truly say I am not what I once was, a slave to sin and Satan; and I can heartily join with the apostle and acknowledge, 'By the grace of God I am what I am.'"

And the top stone will be carried up, crying grace, grace unto it. When we are all we ought to be, wish and hope to be, still "By the grace of God."

Curiosities of Literature.

The Farmer, published at Carrollton, Ala., R. R. Osborne, editor, Joe Thomas, printer, is now in course of its first volume. The Farmer is a reality.

Specimens or two from the editorials of June 11:

"Readers, I will begin my confabulation with you this week, by letting you know that I have had my corn work out at last, and since the rain g-r-a-c-i-o-u-s-l-y how it does grow; and it would do you all good to see my squash and cucumber vines," &c. &c.

The Farmer is on delightfully intimate terms with its patrons. Our cotemporary is alive to his responsibilities:

"In turning over the leaves of our subscription book, we see the names of persons of the highest order of mental strength and cultivation, men of scholastic attition; some are presiding over Schools and Academies giving bent to the young buds of our land—training them up to something that will ornament and refine society; others occupy the sacred desk, and by their pious & holy lives adorn the gospel they teach;—some are physicians of eminence; some are Lawyers of distinction. We frankly admit that we have no expectation, in that we write or select for our paper of contributing to the intellectual wants of such gentlemen—yet we hope to be able to furnish them something which will amply repay their kindness, and loss of time in examining our little sheet. These gentlemen doubtless make necessary allowences for us. Knowing our responsibilities in this matter we design to put forth our entire energies and to exert our best abilities to make the Farmer an interesting and valuable gazette."

We infer from the following that somebody has been talking who had no right to:

"——Readers I am happy to inform you that I am recovering from my distraction. Although I have loosed a great portion of what little sense I once had; I have yet a great deal more on board than the one who put in circulation such a report."

TEMPTATION.

Thy Heavenly Father knoweth with what kind and measure of trials and temptations it is fit that thou should be exercised; it is his work to permit, and bound, and order them; it is thy work to beg his grace to overcome them, and watchfully and continually make resistance, and in trial to approve thy faithfulness to God. "Blessed are they that endure temptations; for, when they are tried they shall receive the crown of life." If he will try thee by bodily pain and sickness, he can make it turn to the health of thy soul; perhaps thy diseases have prevented some mortal soul diseases which thou didst not fear. If he will try thee by men's malice, injury or persecution, he knoweth how to turn it to thy good, and in season to bring thee out of trouble; he will teach thee by other men's wickedness to know what grace hath cured or prevented in thyself, and to know the need of trusting in God alone, and appealing to his desirable judgment. He that biddeth thee, when thou art reviled and persecuted, and loaded with false reports, "for righteousness sake," to rejoice and be exceeding glad because of the great reward in Heaven, can easily give thee what he doth command, and make thy sufferings a help to this exceeding joy. If he will try thee by Satan's molesting temptations, and suffer him buffet thee, or break thy peace by melancholy disquietments and vexatious thoughts from which he hath hitherto kept thee free, he doth but tell thee, from how much greater evil he hath delivered thee, and make thy fears of hell a means to prevent it, and call to thee thy Saviour to seek for peace and safety in him.—Baxter.

DYING THOUGHTS.

What number of souls, says the dying man, there are now in the world in my condition, surprised at the summons to the other world! Some taken from their shops and farms; others from their sports and pleasures; these at suits of law, those at gaming tables some on the road, others at their own fireside; and all seized at an hour when they thought not of it, frighted at the approach of death, condemned as the vanity of all their labors, designs and projects, astonished at the folly of their past lives, and not knowing which way to turn their thoughts to find any comfort; their conscience flying in their faces, bringing all their sins to remembrance; presenting them with the sight of the angry Judge, the worm that never dies, the fire that is never quenched, the gates of hell, the powers of darkness, and the bitter pains of eternal death.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

CLARK CIRCUIT, ALA. CON:

It may not be aninteresting to you to hear that the Lord is doing wonders in this part of the country, especially on my circuit. I am keeping the cause of missions before the people. At three appointments where I have held missionary meetings I have received in cash and good subscriptions about $150. Nine other appointments to operate at. By certificates, I have received into the Church, up to this time, about seventy-five members, and about twenty-five probationers. Fifteen new subscribees have been procured for our valuable New Orleans Christian Advocate, and as soon as we can get a mail by the railroad to this point, and we can get our papers in anything like a reasonable time, I expect largely to swell that amount. This, I understand, will be done in July. I have collected near $50 for Sabbath school books, and organized within the bounds of my circuit eleven Sabbath Schools, all in a flourishing condition. Now if you will look at the minutes and see what Clark Circuit did last year, you will say this is pretty well.

ROCKY SPRINGS, MISS. CON:

There is nothing of very great interest here in the Church. Our people seem to be as cold as icebergs. I expect most of the prayers that go up are for rain! We have had but precious little in this region for upwards of three months, and what has fallen has been very partial. Many of the owners complain, not having more than enough to lay the dust since the 5th of April. Their corn crops are exhausted.

WHY THE WICKED ARE CALLED FOOLS.

The unconverted are occasionally styled in Scripture, fools; as, for example, "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God;" "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee." A little reflection will suffice to render the fitness of this designation perfectly obvious to any candid mind. A fool is one who acts contrary to the dictates of sound wisdom. Let us see now if sound wisdom will sanction the course of the unconverted sinner. The Bible exhibits such strong marks of divine origin that the greater part of the impenitent who are under its influence yield an intellectual assent to its doctrines. Attention is especially called to the condition of this large class of persons. In the first place, they are unwilling to enter the service of God and be numbered among his people, because, as they think, they must in that case deny themselves the enjoyment of so great an amount of pleasure. They are nevertheless willing to own that the greatest amount of pleasure is to be found in the path of duty; and if closely interrogated, they would even admit that no one comes so near to a perfect discharge of duty as a Christian. Who, then, really practices self-denial? Not the servant of Christ, but the votary of the world. But the blindness of this class of impenitent persons does not stop here. The Bible, which they profess to believe, assures them that there is laid up in store for those who serve Christ faithfully here on earth an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away; a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; a place where sin and sorrow consequent upon it shall be unknown, and where love, peace and joy shall reign unbroken through all eternity. We should expect to see them induced even by their love of pleasure to lend a listening ear to the calls of the Spirit, though no better motive could lead them to do so. But how is it in fact? The voice from the abode of just men made perfect falls upon their ear unheeded. Professedly in pursuit of pleasure, they turn away from unending felicity as a boon not worth the seeking! Such conduct is not even consistently selfish. It cannot be referred to any good reason, and is scarcely referable to any reason at all. Can anything more than this be said of the actions of the insane? But this is only half the folly of which those are guilty who yield a mere intellectual assent to the truths of the Bible. In that book they are also assured that misery awaits the incorrigible; these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal. Knowing this to be true, these men persist nevertheless in slighting the offers of the gospel, and rush with their eyes wide open into the embrace of endless woe! The service of Christ is, in their estimation, a hard bondage, and for that reason they cannot be persuaded to make their peace with God; but in the service of Satan they are willing to lose all that bliss which they might easily secure in Heaven if they would, and submit, instead, to the pangs of an accusing conscience here, and the endless pains of retribution hereafter.

New Publications.

THE HISTORY OF NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, by John S. C. Abbott—2 vols. large 8vo., pp. 1,278. Harper & Bros: New York, 1855.

The readers of Harper's Magazine are prepared for these volumes. They are in Harperian style—clear type, clean paper, an affluence of new maps and illustrations, with binding to suit.

Napoleon's histories, in our language, have been written by his enemies; this by an American, who, like his countrymen, sympathizes with his hero.

Mr. Abbott's narrative style is captivating, and comes into play often and advantageously. In the profounder parts of the historiographer—analysis, insight, estimate of the remote bearing of events and generalization—Mr. Abbott, though less skillful, is not wanting. He brings the reader to these conclusions:

1. Napoleon did not usurp sovereignty.

2. He did not abuse it—was not a tyrant.

3. The wars in which he was so constantly engaged were chargeable to others' arrogance, more than his own.

LE CURE MANQUE, by D'Courcillon. Harper & Bros: 1855.

A curious book. A young man of spirit and parts is designated for the priesthood; educated for it; becomes disgusted with the unnatural and hypocritical life; quits the cassock and turns soldier. Hence the title, "Le Cure Manque"—the unfinished priest. A description of French life, not in Paris, but in the provinces, where the hero was born and brought up. An inside view of the nursery, and the ecclesiastical and educational teaching preparatory to it. Recollections are minute, and detailed with the air of truth. The writer doesn't rail or argue. He simply saw the elephant and left. Doubtless it is the history of thousands who are living an artificial existence, but lack courage, force, opportunity to break through the restraint of custom, education and position, and satisfy their longings to be men. WATSON'S APOLOGY — Stevenson & Owen: Nashville, 1855.

The Agents have put forth a neat edition of this book, so useful in establishing Christians in their holy faith, and counteracting one of the most popular assaults ever made against it. Besides revising the work, the Book Editor has enriched it with one of those biographical prefaces he is so good at, wherein Bishop Watson gets discriminating credit for the service he has rendered Christianity.

Watson's immortal Apology for the Bible was aimed at the Second Part of the "Age of Reason." Paine was the author of other writings, yclept theological, not undeserving attention for their harmfulness. The readers of the Southern Methodist Quarterly Review remember a series of articles by Dr. Summers, "A refutation of the theological works of Thomas Paine not noticed by Bishop Watson, &c." These articles were characterized by able criticism and a popular style, making a fit supplement. They are here, and we are glad to see them—eighty-four pages of the volume. Suggestion for the next edition: that Section 3 be omitted in the Refutation, as it is contained in the preface to the Apology.

The two books are bound together in gilt muslin, price 45 cents; or, separately, Apology, 30 cents; Refutation, 25 cents; 30 per cent. discount to wholesale cash purchasers.

It is with the liveliest pleasure we recognise the services our Book Concern is already rendering the Church, by judicious, well revised and tasteful emissions of religious literature.

BEGIN TO-DAY.

Lord, I discover a fallacy whereby I have long deceived myself, which is this: I have desired to begin my amendment from my birth-day, from some eminent festival, that so my repentance might beat some remarkable date. But when those days were come I have adjourned my amendment to some other time. Thus, whilst I could not agree with myself when to start, I have almost lost the running of the race. I am resolved thus to befool myself no longer. I see no day but to-day; the instant time is always the fittest time. In Nebuchadnezzar's image the lower the members the coarser the metal. The farther off the time the more unfit. To-day is the golden opportunity, to-morrow will be the silver season, next day but the brazed one, and so on till at last I shall come to the iron of clay, and be turned to dust. Grant, therefore, that to-day I may hear Thy voice. And if this day be obscure in the calendar, and remarkable in itself for nothing else, give me to make it memorable in my soul hereupon, by thy assistance beginning the reformation of my life.—Fuller.

THE OBJECT TO BE ACCOMPLISHED.—We should not willingly allow a child to leave our schools without some general idea, at least, of the divine authority of the Bible, and without the testimony of our own conscience that we have carefully endeavored to educate his heart, no less than his mind, in the fundamentals of the gospel.—Bridges.

KIND OF TEACHING WANTED.—There is a difference between teaching and preaching. Sermons are out of place in a Sunday school. Here we want something brief, lively, expository, addressed to the conscience. The catechetical mode is decidedly the most effective to maintain attention, elicit intelligence, convey information, and, most of all, to apply the instructions to the heart.

Missionary Reports.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

OAKMULGEE MISSION, ALA. CON:

Dear Brother—I now send you the report of the first and second quarters. I was appointed to this mission at the last session of the Alabama Conference, and began my work about the last of January, and have attended every appointment since. I have eight appointments, filling them every four weeks; about 80 children catechized; have baptized 60 children and 27 adults; received 58 into the Church. At most of the appointments the negroes seem to be very much interested and attentive. The owners and overseers also take a lively interest in the mission. Several have been converted during the year. Yours, in Christian love,

P. R. McCRARY.

Summerfield, Ala., June 18, 1855.

GERMAN CREEK MISSION ALA. CON:

This mission is embraced in the Tuscaloosa District, and was recognized at the last session of the Conference. I preach to about six hundred colored persons, have seven appointments, have received fifty-seven on probation, catechised one hundred children, and have baptized seven. I should have made my report at the first quarter, but the work being a new one, and arrangements to be made, I had but little to report of interest, and deferred my report until the second quarter, which is now passed. The Lord has been with us. Several have found peace, and an earnest inquiry pervades the greater part of the charge. If it be admissible, I would remark that the planters on this mission are model masters; which is evinced in the general appearance of their people—their being comfortably lodged, well fed and clothed, and all appearing contented and happy, as well as the interest they manifest in their spiritual welfare. A. R. RAMSEY.

June 8, 1855.

CORRECTION.—In the late interesting communication from Dayton Mission, of Rev. Alexander McBryde and Rev. I Taylor, under this department, an error was made in printing eight, instead of three conversions. Also, the company at the dedication was of whites and blacks, including master, mistress, and others, besides the overseers.

NEGATIVE RELIGION.

In these latter days of ease from persecution, a profession of religion may be made and a decent outside may be preserved, without much cost. There is one class of professors, and that by no means a small one, made up of those who have received a religious education, have been trained up to an outward conformity to the precepts of the gospel, who abstain from the open follies and corruptions of the world, but remain quite satisfied with a negative religion.

They do not profane the Sabbath.

They do not neglect the ordinances of God's house.

They do not live without a form of prayer.

They do not take the holy name of God in vain.

They do not defraud their neighbor.

They do not neglect the poor and needy.

They do not run a round of gaiety and folly.

They are not seen on the race ground.

They do not frequent the theatre.

They do not take their place at the card-table.

They do not appear in scenes of riot and dissipation.

They are not drunkards.

They are not swearers.

They do not bring up their children without some regard to religion.

They do not cast off the fear of God.

BUT

They do not love Him.

They do not experience his love shed abroad in their hearts.

They do not enjoy vital, heartfelt religion.

They do not give God their hearts.

They do not delight themselves in him.

They do not esteem his Word more than their necessary food.

They do not love his habitation, and the place where his honor dwelleth, though they attend it.

They do not enjoy the peace of God, which passeth all understanding.

They are not temples of the Holy Ghost.

They are not habitations of God through the Spirit.

They have not passed from death unto life.

They are not new creatures in Christ Jesus.

They have not been translated from the kingdom of darkness.

They are not born again; consequently cannot enter into the kingdom of God.

O that such would now stop and examine their hearts and their hopes; and let them seek the Lord while he may be found, and call upon him while he is near.—English Presbyterian Messenger.

PROFESSOR J. R. THOMAS.—The Press (Sparta, Ga.) says: "This gentleman, after a long absence, has recently been on a visit to his old and early friends in this county. We are glad to perceive that his health, which for several years has unfitted him for active duty, is now better. We are pleased also to find that he has accepted the editorial chair of a campaign paper, to be published in Macon, advocating the claims of the prohibition candidate for Governor, and sustaining legislative action for the suppression of grog-shops."

If any one speaks evil of you, let your life be so virtuous that none will believe him.

QUARANTINE ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Since the establishment of the Quarantine on the Mississippi and elsewhere in this State, the city press has devoted much space to editorials and communications on the subject. Nearly all of these articles are unfavorable. The spirit of fault-finding has so controlled the writers, as to lead them, in nearly every instance, into errors. We are of opinion that the law and its benevolent objects have not been fairly treated; that injustice has been done the Board whose duty it is to administer it; and that these writers have been betrayed by an undue regard for certain interests, into statements and opinions inconsistent with the consideration which the public have a right to claim from them.

When the act establishing Quarantine became a law, the time had long passed when its restrictions should have been directed against those diseases which are so frequently introduced here at the opening of summer. But it was hardly known that the Board of Health had organized, when its asserted tardiness of action was complained of! The Board could not hope to have the different stations, with their hospitals, warehouses, &c., established much before the beginning of October; and until this was done, it would be impossible to carry the intentions of the law into full and complete effect. But it seems to have been assumed that the simple passage of the law furnished the Board with all that was necessary to put it into immediate and effectual execution. They at first recommended that it should be vigorously enforced. The first manifestation of the required vigor was hailed with a shout of indignation at proceedings, a perseverance in which, they declared, must inevitably destroy the commerce of the city. And every act of the Board, or of its officers, that has had the appearance of a disposition to relax the stringency of the law, or to apply it in the ratio of their present means of administering it, is charged upon them, either as a disregard of duty, or as the evidences of weakness and vacillation in their councils.

These gentlemen have been led into other declarations and assumptions, as to the operation and effect of Quarantine at this port, which are worthy of refutation. We are told, in general terms, that the result of a Quarantine will be the destruction of its commerce. Let us consider this assertion a moment.

The principle embodied in the Quarantine law is recognized and enforced in every other commercial city of the known world: this is the only great commercial city on the globe that has not long since availed itself of the protection afforded by quarantine. All the commercial cities of the United States but this one, admit the correctness and value of the principle, and carry it into effect. The Government of the United States, (see acts of Congress of May 27, 1796, and of Feb. 25, 1799) recognizes its expediency and requires its officers to co-operate in its enforcement whenever and wherever required. By what process of reasoning it is made to appear that Quarantine—a system of utmost universal observance, and elsewhere deemed essential even to commercial prosperity—would produce contrary results here, even to the extent of ruin, we have been unable to discover. If they receive aright, the trade of all other cities should be languishing to death, and ours alone enjoying a state of great and growing prosperity. But the fact is, that pestilence, and nothing under heaven but pestilence, has prevented New Orleans from being at this moment the first commercial city of the Union; and it is equally clear, that most of the diseases which, from time to time, have spread death and destruction among our people, have been transmitted here from abroad. The great mass of our trade, and the business which results from it, has reference to exports. Compared with these, our whole foreign trade is insignificant, and that portion of it chiefly affected by Quarantine is not equal to three per cent. on the value. Yet, when, through the agency of this foreign trade, a deadly and far-reaching disease is let loose upon our people, commerce of all kinds is put an end to. And, without taking into account the irreparable loss which an extraordinary mortality of from 3,000 to 13,000 a year among our people inflicts on us, the disasters thus occasioned to our principal business would exceed the advantages resulting from our foreign import trade, for ten years.

We are also told that the detention of vessels at the Quarantine will involve a ruinous loss to all interested. The Quarantine law contemplates the detention, for any considerable length of time, only those vessels, the arrival of which at our levees might endanger the public health. It decrees that the practice of introducing from abroad, without restraint or question, every deadly disease among our people, as heretofore, must cease.

But the assumption that, as a general rule, the shipping interest would lose either time or money by such detentions, is entirely erroneous. The revenue laws allow a vessel under 300 tons, 15 clear days' time to discharge. A vessel over that tonnage is allowed 20 days. Most of those vessels come here with partial cargoes, which could be readily discharged in from two to four days. It is well known, they nearly always take the maximum time allowed by law, and often they avail themselves of the full privileges of the act. It is also well known that the great bulk of the shipping arriving here seldom commence discharging until some seven days have elapsed, and often from ten to twenty days pass by before they begin unloading. This being the case, the result is, that so far from sustaining loss by the detention at the Quarantine, the regulations of the revenue department, to be made in conformity therewith, will render such vessels positive gainers to the extent of the difference between the expenses at Quarantine, and those from wharfage, etc., here.
